

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. HARPER'S

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

VOLUME X.

DECEMBER, 1854, TO MAY, 1855.

NEW YORK:
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
329 & 331 PEARL STREET, FRANKLIN SQUARE.
1855.

ADVERTISEMENT.—VOLUME X.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE has now reached the close of its Tenth Volume. During the five years of its existence, its prosperity has been constant and uninterrupted. It has not been checked even by the disaster which fell upon the establishment of the Publishers, or by the period of general depression from which the country is now emerging. Its circulation has regularly increased with each successive Volume, and is now larger than at any previous time. The Publishers have spared neither labor nor expense, not only to maintain, but to improve the character of the Magazine in all its departments. It has been their purpose to furnish a larger amount of the best literature of the day, presented in a more attractive form, with more profuse embellishments and at a lower price, than has ever been attempted by any periodical publication. While they have not neglected the rich stores of foreign literature, they have gradually enlarged the list of their Editors and Contributors till it includes the names of a large portion of the most popular writers of the country, and nothing has been wanting to induce them to contribute their best productions to the Magazine. The Publishers have received abundant assurance that their efforts have been successful to render the Magazine in some good degree worthy of the favor which has been accorded to it. Not a week passes in which they do not receive contributions, every way worthy of insertion, sufficient to occupy their pages for months. The task of selecting from this immense mass of matter that which is best and most attractive has been laboriously and faithfully performed; and the Publishers are confident that no article has found its way into the Magazine to which any just or reasonable exception can be taken.

The Publishers would offer their sincere acknowledgments to the numerous writers of whose contributions they have been unable, from want of space, to avail themselves. To the members of the Press, also, they would renew their thanks for the generous and cordial approbation they have always accorded to the Magazine. They only, from their position, can be aware of the difficulty of preparing the successive Numbers of a popular periodical, and to their kindness Harper's Magazine has been largely indebted for its success. The Publishers again thank the Reading Public throughout the country for their unintermitted support, and add their assurances that the encouragement which they have received during the five years that are passed shall stimulate them to renewed exertions for the future.

VIRGINIA ILLUSTRATED.

ADVENTURES OF PORTE CRAYON AND HIS COUSINS.

Who looses to live at home, yet looks abroad,
And know both passen and unpassen road,
The wonders of a faire and goodlie land,
Of antres, rivers, rocks, and mountaines grande, Read this.

THOMAS MACARNESS.

MISS FANNY CRAYON had just finished reading the Blackwater Chronicle to a brace of attentive and delighted cousins, when, throwing the book upon the table with a pouting air, she put forth the following reflections on men and things:

"It is really neither generous nor just that men should arrogate to themselves all the privileges, while we poor girls are condemned to eternal needlework and housekeeping; or, what is still worse, a dull round of insipid amusements—dancing, dressing, and thrumming the piano. What opportunities have we of seeing the world, or of making heroines of ourselves? Instead of planning pleasant jaunts and inviting us to grace their parties, no sooner does the summer weather set in, than away they go with their guns, and such quantities of provision that one might think they were going to Oregon. Then in two or three weeks they are back again with their clothes all torn and appetites that are a disgrace to civilization. To see them at table, you would suppose they had eaten nothing during their absence; and then such bragging all among themselves, they don't even give us a chance to talk; and if occasionally we manage to slip in a word edgewise, it receives no more consideration than the whistle of my canary bird."

"Indeed, Cousin Fanny," said Dora Dimple, "I think with you entirely. It would be so romantic and delightful for us to take such a trip. But then, with the rains and the wild animals, we should be so drenched and frightened."

"Well! I want to be drenched and frightened!" replied Fanny, with spirit; "I am tired of this humdrum life."

"Good gracious! what is to prevent uth from going if we choothe?" lisped Miss Mignonette, or, as she was generally called for short, Minnie May. "Let's make Porte Crayon take uth traveling or bear hunting with him."

"Pshaw!" replied Fanny, pettishly, "Brother Porte used to be very kind and obliging, but of late he has become such a bear in his manners, and such a sloven, it's shameful! You might really suppose, from his talk, that he thought women had no souls; and as to listening to any thing they say—whew! he's entirely too high for that. The fact is, he got to reading the Koran some few years ago, and I don't think he has been quite right since."

"Nonsense! it's all affectation; he listens to me always," rejoined Minnie, with confidence; "and I'll go now directly and make him promise to take us somewhere. I can coax and flatter him into any thing." And without more ado, she started on her embassy, while her companions followed on tip-toe to hear the result.

Porte Crayon sat with his legs comfortably stretched on a bench in the veranda which shades the front of the family mansion. Aroused from an apparently deep reverie by the rustling of a silk dress, he acknowledged Cousin Minnie's presence with a nod, and his hard face lit up with a smile.

"Cousin Porte," said she, abruptly, "we want you to take us somewhere." Mr. Crayon's only reply was a slight elevation of the eyebrows. "Yes," continued she, resolutely, "Fanny, Dora, and myself want you to take us traveling somewhere with you in search of adventures." Mr. Crayon's eyebrows disappeared under the visor of his cap, and his mouth puckered up as if about to whistle. "Indeed, Cousin Porte," continued Minnie, coaxingly, seating herself beside him, "we've been reading the Blackwater Sketches, and we're all crazy to see some wild life. I don't mean exactly that we wish to live in the woods like gypsies, or be starved or exposed to the rain or wild beasts, or— Indeed, I don't know precisely what we want; but you are so clever you may plan us a pleasant trip yourself. Besides, it would be such a privilege for us girls to have you as an escort—you are such a genius, you know. Come, you can't refuse; it will be so delightful—we won't give you a bit of trouble." Mr. Crayon's countenance had by this time relaxed considerably. "With any ordinary person we would not wish to go," pursued the embassadrice; "but you know you are so talented, it would afford us such rare opportunities of improvement."

At this point Crayon heard some giggling inside of the hall door. "Stop, Minnie, that will answer—I'm sufficiently buttered. Now just ask specifically for what you want."

THE LISTENERS.

Minnie clapped her hands exultingly. "Come, girls, come—we've got him—he has promised—it's all arranged!"

Here the listeners made their appearance, and all three were so vociferous in their thanks that Crayon was fain to affect an air of sternness. "What's arranged? I've promised nothing."

"Why, Cousin Porte, didn't you promise to take us a jaunt, and to plan it all yourself?—Didn't he, Fanny?"

"I didn't hear precisely," said Fanny.

"Didn't he, Dora?"

"Indeed," replied Dora, "it seemed to me he did; or, at least, he was just going to promise, and that's the same thing."

"To be sure," said Minnie; "didn't you both hear him say, 'just ask specifically for any thing you want, and I'll do it?'"

"Certainly," cried both girls, eagerly, "we heard him say 'specifically.' We did, indeed."

"You did! Then my case is a bad one. It is proved by three credible witnesses, supposed by courtesy to be sane and in their right minds, that I said 'specifically;' and being duly convicted of the same, it is in your judgments fairly deducible from the premises that I promised to take you somewhere on a pleasure excursion."

"There," cried Minnie, "didn't I tell you? Bless me, what a lawyer Cousin Porte would have made if he had taken to the bar instead of the fine arts. But come on, girls; let us go and get our traveling-dresses ready. Cousin Porte is the soul of honor; he never broke a promise, especially one made to a lady."

And with the sweetest and most gracious curtsies the young ladies took their leave.

"Begone, you pests, and leave me to reflect on the absurd scrape I've got into."

A voice from the hall replied with a couplet from Tom Bowling:

"Tom never from his word departed,
His virtues were so rare."

"Hum!" soliloquized Porte, reseating himself; "what the deuce have I done?—Promised to take three women traveling. Ha! ha! they want to go to the Blackwater, do they? ho! ho! by all that's preposterous! Kid slippers—lace collars—silk dresses! If the sun shines, they're broiling; if the wind blows, they're freezing; never hungry except when every thing eatable is out of their reach; always dying of thirst when they're on top of a mountain; afraid of caterpillars, and lizards, and grasshoppers!—Let me see—the first of October—snakes are about going into winter quarters; well, that's one comfort at least. And then their baggage; each of them, to my knowledge, has a trunk as big as a powder car.—Finnikin, frivolous, whimsical creatures, where do they learn the art of coaxing?—They don't acquire it at all, it is a natural gift. If any man had approached me in that way I should have felt bound to pull his nose; but that little lisping minx makes me promise what she pleases.

"Tis an old maxim of the schools,
That flattery's the food of fools;
Yet now and then your men of wit
Will condescend to take a bit."

No! no! it was not that—I'm too old for that—but it was a piece of the most barefaced wheedling and imposture, and now they're doubtless giggling over their success." Mr. Crayon shook for some minutes with silent laughter, and it was long before his countenance settled into its accustomed gravity.

While he is thus sitting, let us sketch him. In person Mr. Crayon is about the middle height, of slender make, but well knit and tough. His face is what would be usually termed "a hard one"—angular and sunburned, the lower features covered with a beard, bushy and "Broke as though it were a spade."

This beard he has worn from time immemorial. Old-fashioned ladies, who can't endure this savage taste, frequently tell Mr. Crayon he would be remarkably handsome if he would cut off that horrid beard. He laughs, however, sotto voce, in such a manner as to encourage the delusion, and modestly disclaims any desire to be remarked for his personal beauty. Crayon is neither old nor young;

"But on his forehead middle age Has slightly pressed its signet sage."

His dress is usually so little a matter of concern to himself, that it is in consequence the oftener remarked by others. At present his wardrobe in active service consists of a double-frilled shirt, a sack of Weidenfeldt's cut, stained corduroys, and a pair of stringless shoes, which exhibit to advantage his socks of gray yarn, darned with white and blue. This careless incongruity of dress is not altogether an eccentricity or individualism of Mr. Crayon, but belongs to the State to which he owes birth and allegiance. Nothing is more rare than to find a Virginian solicitous about his dress; and although he may sometimes affect the sloven, he is never a dandy.

An itinerant phrenologist, who had the faculty of discovering the springs of human action by feeling the bumps on people's heads, ascertained, while traveling through the State, that this characteristic is the offspring of a noble aristocratic pride, a lofty disdain of trivialities; and the candid expression of this opinion gave much individual as well as public satisfaction, and brought the skillful man of science many a dollar. Indeed, in one instance we were personally cognizant of the dollar. A remarkably dirty gentleman of the legal profession, who, it was confidently believed, hadn't a second shirt to his back, borrowed a dollar of us to pay the aforesaid itinerant for saying the same of him and putting it in writing.

But to be fully impressed with Crayon's personale, he should be seen as he sometimes appears at a masquerade, in ruff and doublet, with a slouched hat and plume. One might then swear the great Captain John Smith had reappeared to look after his government, and was ready, as of yore, to do battle with "Turk or salvage"—to thrust a falchion between the infidel ribs of Bonnymulgro, or kick his Royal Highness, Opeckancanough, in face of his whole tribe, into the payment of the three hundred bushels of corn. We shrewdly suspect Crayon of nurturing a vanity on this subject, and have several times heard him allude to the resemblance himself.

While this sketching has been going on, our sister has been deeply philosophizing. "Man," thought he, "occupies a queer position in civilized society. By right of superior physical and intellectual endowment, by right of a direct appointment from Holy Writ, by the advice and consent of St. Paul, he is lord of creation. But of what avail is his empty title? He is practically no more than a nose of wax, to be modeled into any shape by women. What matters it, whether he is tied with a hempen cord or a pink satin ribbon?—he's tied. What difference whether he is bullied out of his free agency or wheedled out of it?—the tyranny is equally odious, equally subversive of social order and of self-respect. Man can't even wear the clothes he may happen to fancy" (here Crayon glanced at his coat). "Hunting-jackets have a rowdy look—so Miss Minnie thinks—chick-a-dee.—These Yankees are a wonderful people; full of energy and resources—they regulate the women up there—the men have the upper hand, as nature designed—at least I infer it, from the bobbery and noise the women are making there about their rights. Egad! I'll travel in that country some day to learn how they manage. But, after all," continued Crayon, breaking into soliloquy, "Che giova! sian nati a servir, we on the south side can't help ourselves, and we might as well put the best face on matters. It is not so unendurable, neither, this bondage of the heart, nor yet so very unbecoming to a gentleman. In the days of chivalry it was the proudest boast of knighthood. What is it but the willing tribute from generosity to weakness? When a command comes disguised as a prayer, who would not obey? When a beseeching look compels, who can resist? O, fair southern land, long may thy daughters continue to reign, imperious in their loveliness, strong in their gentleness!"

Here Porte Crayon leaped from his seat as if electrified, and clapping his left hand to his side, with his right he drew an imaginary glittering sword, and flourishing it about his head, went through the broadsword exercise in brilliant style.

"Cousin Porte," cried a voice from the window, "what in the world are you doing?"

"Nothing in particular," replied Porte, looking rather sheepish.

"Then don't do it any more. It looks too ridiculous for one of your age to be prancing and capering in that unmeaning way."

"Look you, Miss Minnie, mind your sewing, and don't be troubling yourself about my capers or my age.—I'll pay her for this—I'll lead her into blackberry thickets, stick her fast in marshes, and put lizards in her reticule. I'll tease and frighten her into a proper appreciation of herself. She need not then visit the capitals of Christendom to see by what small people the world is governed."

During the week that followed Porte Crayon entered into the business of preparation for the proposed jaunt with alacrity and cheerfulness. He was in frequent consultation with the maps and Gazetteer of Virginia, and made copious notes therefrom, but was very silent and mysterious withal.

"Where are you going to take us, Cousin Porte?" Minnie often inquired.

"Never mind, child; stitch away at your traveling dress; get yourself a pair of stout shoes, and don't ask me any more questions."

"I'm afraid Cousin Porte doesn't enjoy the idea of making this trip with us," modestly observed Dora.

"Fiddlestick!" said Minnie, in an under tone. "He's delighted. He has been in a fever ever since I proposed it to him. Just listen to his lectures, and make believe you appreciate them, and pretend to let him have his own way in every thing, and he's one of the kindest and most manageable creatures in existence."

Crayon, who, with characteristic contempt of rule and order, was moulding bullets in the breakfast room, looked up sharply.

"What was that I heard about lectures, and good, manageable creature?"

"Eh! good gracious! did you hear? I was just complimenting you to Dora; saying how kind you were. But, Cousin, let me help you to cut the necks off those bullets, I can do it so nicely."

"No; go along. You'll cut your fingers. I always am in a fever when I see a woman with a pen-knife in her hand."

"Only hear! the vanity of men!" and Minnie quietly took the ladle out of Mr. Crayon's hand, and proceeded in the most adroit and pretty manner to mould up the remainder of the lead.

He looked on at first with amazement, which soon changed into unqualified admiration.

"Doesn't lose a particle of lead; half of them have no necks at all. They are better than mine. Cousin Minnie, you're a gem."

The old carriage having been revarnished, and the roan and sorrel sleeked up to the utmost point of good looks that the nature of the case permitted, Mr. Crayon reported to the impatient trio that on his part every thing was in readiness for the expedition, with the exception of a driver. This important office had not yet been filled. Old Tom, Young Tom, Peter, and a dozen other, had successively been catechised, cross-questioned, and rejected.

"And why won't they do?" asked Fanny; "they are all skillful drivers."

"Tut, Fanny, you know nothing about it. They would answer very well to drive you to church, but the selection of a driver for such a trip as I have in view requires the greatest tact and consideration. Leave the matter entirely to me—"

"As the only person in the world who has the requisite tact and consideration," suggested Fanny.

Mr. Crayon gracefully bowed assent.

One morning a huge negro made his appearance in the hall, accompanied by all the negro household, and all in a broad grin.

"Sarvant, Master," said the giant, saluting, hat in hand, with the grace of a hippopotamus. "Ise a driver, sir!"

"Indeed!" said Porte, with some surprise; "what's your name?"

"Ke! hi!" snickered the applicant for office, and looked toward Old Tom.

LITTLE MICE.

"He's name Little Mice," said Tom, and there was a general laugh.

"That is a queer name at least, and not a very suitable one; has he no other?"

"Why, d'ye see, Mass' Porte," said Tom, "when dis niggâ was a boy, his ole miss tuck him in de house to sarve in de dinin' room. Well, every day she look arter her pies an' cakes, an' dey done gone. 'Dis is onaccountable,' say ole miss. 'Come here, boy. What goes wid dese pies?' He says, 'I spec, missus, little mice eats 'em.' 'Very well,' says she, 'may be dey does.' So one mornin' arley she come in onexpected like, an' dar she see dis boy, pie in he's mouf. 'So,' says she, 'I cotch dem little mice at last, have I?' An' from dat day, sir, dey call him nothin' but Little Mice, an' dat been so long dey done forgot his oder name, if he ever had any."

The giant, during this narration, rolled his eyes at Old Tom, and made menacing gestures in an underhand way; but being unable to stop the story, he joined in the laugh that followed, and then took up the discourse.

"Mass' Porte, never mind dat ole possum. Any how I ben a-drivin' hosses all my life, and I kin wait on a gemplum fuss rate. To be sure dat name sounds sort a foolish 'mong strangers; but you can call me Boy, or Hoss, or Pomp, or any thing dat suits—I answers all de same."

Having exhibited his permit to hire himself,

Mr. Crayon engaged him on the spot: moved thereto, we suspect, more by the fun and originality indicated in Mice's humorous phiz, than by any particular tact or consideration. The newly-appointed dignitary bowed himself out of the hall, sweeping the floor with his cap at each reverence; but no sooner was he clear of the respected precinct than his elephantine pedals spontaneously commenced a grotesque dance, making a clatter on the kitchen floor like a team of horses crossing a bridge. During this performance he shook his fists—in size and color like old hams of bacon—alternately at Old and Young Tom. "Ha, you ole Turkey Buzzard! I take you in dar to recommend me, an' you tell all dem lies. You want to drive yourself, heh? And you black calf, you sot up to drive gemplum's carriage, did you? Mass' Porte too smart to have any sitch 'bout him."

Old Tom's indignation at this indecorous conduct knew no bounds. He pitched into Mice incontinently, and bestowed a shower of lusty cuffs and kicks upon his carcass. Tom's honest endeavors were so little appreciated, that they only served to increase the monster's merriment.

"Yah! yah! yah! lame grasshopper kick me," shouted he, escaping from the kitchen; and making a wry face at Tom through the window, he swung himself off toward the stable, "to look arter his critters."

A couple of pipes, with some tobacco, and a cast-off coat soothed the mortification of the Senior and Junior Toms to such an extent that they were both seen next morning actually assisting Mice in getting out the carriage.

"Something new under the sun!" exclaimed Porte Crayon on the morning of the 8th of October, 1853. "A new era is about to commence in the history of women. The carriage has scarcely driven up to the door when all three are ready cap-à-pie to jump into it! I thought the last wonder was achieved when they got all their baggage into one trunk and two carpet-bags; but this latest development surpasses every thing that has gone before. Now fire away with your kissing and leave-taking, and let us be off."

Considering the number of grandparents, fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters, aunts, uncles, cousins, babies, &c., who had assembled to see the party off, and who had each and severally to give and receive from each and several of our travelers from one to half a dozen kisses, it will scarcely be credited that the carriage got fairly under way in something less than an hour from the time of its first appearance.

"But not so fast. Stop! stop!" screamed a dozen voices from the house.

"Something important has been forgotten surely."

"Of course," said Porte Crayon. "Whose head is left behind? Feel in your bonnets, girls."

A negro girl is seen running after them with a large bundle in her arms, and holding up a great dumpling of a baby to the carriage window.

"Miss say you forgot to kiss little Mass' Bobby."

"True! it was an oversight. Kiss him, girls; and hark ye, Molly, tell them at the house, if any one else has been omitted, to telegraph us at Winchester, and we'll come back."

"Bad to turn back now, Mass' Porte, specially sence Aunt Patty done flung her shoe arter us for good luck."

"Oh, if that ceremony has been performed, we must go on at all hazards."

As the man and sorrel passed the Winchester pike, making the stones ring again with their well-shod hoofs, plowman and wayfarer turned aside to see, housewife and maiden hastened to the windows to stare and admire. Mark them well, good people, for it will be many a long day ere you look upon their like again. Little Mice was so sleeked and buttoned up, that he did not appear more than half his usual size; but his hands, encased in a pair of buckskin gloves, which at a moderate computation would hold half a peck each, did not seem to have undergone a corresponding diminution. His head upon his ponderous shoulders looked no larger than a good-sized apple, and was surmounted by a tiny Dutch cap, the effect of which was to increase, in appearance, the disproportion between the head and shoulders. His little bead-like eyes twinkled with delight, while his broad lips were forcibly puckered into an expression of respectful gravity, but upon the slightest inattention on the part of their owner, and even in spite of his endeavors, occasionally they would relapse into their natural position—that of a broad grin. Beside this model of a driver and valet sat Porte Crayon—quite a secondary personage, by the way—in a substantial suit of gray cassimere, a black oil-cloth cap, hunting belt, leathern gaiters, and a short German rifle, which usually hung upon the dash-board of the carriage.

The three ladies occupied the interior. A spirited and accurate description of their dresses was promised the Editor of these papers by one of the ladies; but that having failed to appear, he excuses himself from attempting any thing of the sort on his own responsibility. Men are generally bunglers when they undertake to write upon subjects they know nothing about. That their costumes were appropriate and becoming we can vouch, as also for the fact that they made them all with their own pretty hands during the week preceding their departure. Porte Crayon has drawn Fanny in a black velvet jacket and a skirt of blue mousseline. Minnie he sketches in a dress of some lighter material, fashioned with a basque, and loose sleeves trimmed with ruffles. Dora wore a plain close-fitting gown with a row of buttons in front. All three had neat little straw bonnets, which they generally wore hanging on their shoulders, with the green vails attached to them streaming down their backs, thus giving the sun and wind a long-coveted opportunity of kissing their rosy cheeks when they pleased.—Porte Crayon says this mode of wearing bonnets reminds him of a story told by some missionaries, who, zealous in the cause of civilization, distributed among certain savage tribes a quantity of axes, mattocks, hoes, and spades. On revisiting their friends the following year, they found them promenading in all pomp and dignity with these useful and not at all cumbersome implements hung about their necks by thongs of deer-skin.

Having disposed of the dresses and millinery, let us go on to the equally puzzling but far more agreeable task of picturing the ladies themselves.

Fanny Crayon has a remarkable face. A nose slightly aquiline, full chiseled lips, dark-blue eyes, dark brows, and fair hair. She is about the middle height, straight as an arrow, perfectly moulded, round and full, but active and graceful as a fawn. Her complexion is very fair, with cheeks of the richest rose. The characteristic expression of her face is earnest and serious, easily provoked to merriment, and not quite so easily provoked to wrath. In this we are aware she differs from most of her sex, and especially from all heroines of love stories. But she has, nevertheless, what the world calls a temper of her own. Those blue eyes of hers will sometimes flash, and the rose in her cheek so predominate, that the lily is entirely lost for a time. Well, well! her native spirit is so well regulated by good sense and good feeling, that it rarely shows itself amiss. Fanny, at the age of five-and-twenty, is considered the most accomplished young woman of her neighborhood; for besides her skill in millinery and mantua-making, she is already a famous housekeeper. Every thing goes on like clock-work under her management, and she not unfrequently condescends to do up the more elegant branches of this department with her own hands. It happens sometimes during the mince-pie season that Fanny enters the kitchen with an apron white as morning's milk, and her sleeves tucked up, showing a pair of arms scarcely less fair. Old Tom rises at her entrance, respectfully knocks the fire out of his pipe, and lays it in its niche in the chimney. Aunt Dilly, chief-cook, and her daughter Jane, first scullion, stand on either side, attentive to the slightest sign. "Tray, Jane," says the obsequious Dilly.—"Flour, Miss"—"rollin' pin, Miss"—"butter"—"mince-meat"—"brandy."—The pie approaches completion. Jane holds her breath in admiration. The chief-cook looks on in proud humility—proud of serving such a mistress, humble at seeing herself outdone by one of only half her age, and, sooth to say, not more than one-third of her weight. The great bowl of egg-nog that foams at Christmas is of Fanny's brewage, and when she does condescend, as she occasionally does, by way of special favor to somebody, to try her hand on a mint-julep, it is said to be unrivaled.

The walls of the paternal mansion were once ornamented with neatly-framed specimens of her skill in drawing and painting. There were kittens, and squirrels, and birds, and baskets of flowers, as an old aunt used to say, "as natural as life, and all drawn out of her own head." When Porte came home from abroad he was thoughtless enough to laugh at them, whereupon Fanny quietly took them down and hid them, nor have the united entreaties of the family, nor repeated apologies from Porte, nor uncle Nat's express commands ever been potent enough to induce her to replace them. When Fanny dances (she never waltzed or polka'd), or when she rides on horseback, the negroes all declare "it is a sight to see her;" and when one of them wishes to compliment his dark-browed innamorata for her performance in a husking reel or a kitchen hoe-down, he tells her she moves like Miss Fanny. But of all Fanny's accomplishments none is so universally prized by her friends as her music,

"And of hire song, it is as loud and yerne
As any swallow sitting on a berne."

Then such a store of good old-fashioned songs, she could sing for a week without ever repeating a stanza. At one time Porte undertook to teach her some French and Italian airs, and found an apt and willing pupil; but uncle Nat positively forbade her singing the foreign trash, insisting that it would spoil her voice and vitiate her taste.

Beside Fanny sat Minnie May, with a shower of rich golden curls, and cheeks as smooth and delicately tinted as the lips of a sea-shell, with a slight but elastic figure, and hands so small that she never could reach an octave on the piano, and consequently never learned music. Whether she would have learned if she had been able to accomplish the octave is a problem that will never be solved, for she is nineteen years old, and her hands are not likely to grow any bigger. Indeed Minnie is not accomplished, as the world goes, for she can't sing except a little in concert, and is equally unskillful in fitting a dress or compounding a pudding. If she reads much she seems little the wiser for it, and most probably romances and poetry receive the principal part of her attention. Her character is an odd compound of archness and naïveté, of espèglerie and sweetness. If she can't sing, her voice in conversation is like the warble of a blue-bird, in addition to which she lisps most charmingly. Unpretending and childlike in her manners, she has a quick and original wit, and reads character by intuition. To this power probably, and to some pretty coaxing ways, she owes the unbounded influence she exercises over every one about her. Even Porte's proverbial obstinacy is not proof against it. He flounders and fumes like a humble-bee stuck fast in molasses, and is sometimes heard ungallantly to wish her to this deuce; "for," says he, "when she is about, I can't even choose what coat I may wear." Little Mice already begins to own her sway, when, in reply to some disparaging comments on the horses, he obsequiously takes off his rag of a cap and gently defends his cattle. "Ah! young mistis, some hosses is naterally lean dat way—now dat roan eats my two gloves full of oats every time, but he's ribs always shows; dis sorrel, he put up different; can't count he's ribs indeed! Gin I has dese creeters in my hands a week, dey'll shine; mind dat, mistis."

Dora Dimple was a sweet little body, with round innocent eyes, which were in truth the windows of her soul, and she blushed when any one looked therein. The roses in her cheeks were ever blooming, and, when freshened by exercise or sudden excitement, they had a tendency to turn purple. Dora was but seventeen, quiet, modest, and sweet-tempered, and it never seemed to have entered her head that she lived for any thing else than to please every body and do as she was bid, like the little girls in the Sunday-school books.

As they trotted along chattering, giggling and singing to the accompaniment of the wheels, no wonder that Crayon frequently looked back at his wards, and thought to himself—"After all, this looks as well as going out to the Blackwater. I dare say we'll have a merry time!" No wonder that Mice, with a superb flourish of his whip, observed—"Mass' Porte, dis is a very light runnin' instrument, seems as if it would run along of itself."

The pleasant and hospitable town of Winchester, with its polished society, its flower-gardens, and famous market, savored too much of ordinary civilization to detain a party in search of the romantic and wonderful longer than was necessary to obtain the requisite supply of food and sleep. It was here that Porte Crayon first exhibited a programme of the proposed trip, which was received with such manifestations of approval and delight that he felt himself highly flattered. But our narrative must not lag by the way—Whip up, Mice; up the Valley turnpike as fast as the horses can trot on a bright frosty morning. At mid-day the light-running vehicle, with its light-hearted inmates, was rapidly approaching the Massanutten Mountains. These mountains rise to a majestic height in the midst of the valley between the forks of the Shenandoah river, and about twenty miles south of Winchester. They lie principally in the counties of Page and Shenandoah, and the Eastern Massanutten forms the boundary between the two counties. They are parallel with the Blue Ridge, and run in a double range for some twenty-five or thirty miles, and then in a single range for about the same distance, terminating in Rockingham County as abruptly as they rise. The double range includes a romantic and fertile valley twenty-five miles long, and about three in width; the level of which is several hundred feet above the Great Valley, and which is entered from the north at the Fortsmouth, one of the most famous passes in the Virginia mountains.

A mid-day lunch under the shade of some maples, the fording of the crystal river, and the approach to this imposing pass, kept the animal spirits and the expectant fancies of our adventurers keenly on the alert. Soon they were winding along the banks of a rushing stream, and there scarcely seemed room between its rugged borders and the impending cliffs for a narrow carriage-way. As they proceeded they perceived the mountain-barriers rising on either side, like perpendicular walls, to a stupendous height—the road and the stream still crowding each other as they struggled along, and the gloom of the wild defile deepened by a tall growth of shadowy hemlocks. As the difficulties increased, our friends were fain to leave the toiling carriage to its assiduous and careful governor, and bravely take to the road a-foot. How wild it was! how fresh and beautiful! The joyous stream seemed rushing to meet them with a free, noisy welcome, wimpling and dimpling, tumbling in tiny waterfalls, and anon forming deep crystal pools which sparkled with foam and bubbles. The girls, like wood-nymphs, ran here and there gathering the rich and varied plants of the mountains, and such flowers as had survived the early frosts of autumn; while

Porte Crayon, in the advance, regardless of the probabilities of game, the rifle at his back, or nerves of his fair companions, rent the air with shouts that made the mountains answer again and again. Perceiving at length that he was getting a little hoarse, his enthusiasm abated, and he left off. The stream crossed and re-crossed their path so often, that Minnie declared it was some spiteful Undine who, in wanton mischief, was striving to detain them. "Not so, Cousin Minnie; but rather, the water-sprite has seen something genial in your eyes, and meets you at every turn with the hope of beguiling you to stay and be her playmate." But neither hinderance nor persuasion availed any thing—here by a rustic bridge, there by an opportune drift-log, and where neither lent their aid, by resolutely skipping from rock to rock, they kept on their way, Porte leading the troop, encouraging and giving directions, applauding each successful venture, and laughing loud when some unlucky foot dipped ankle-deep into the water. At the end of an hour's walk, and about two miles from the mouth of the defile, they found themselves fairly in the Valley of Powell's Fort; and here—the road becoming more practicable—they again betook themselves to their carriage. Porte Crayon could not refrain from casting many regretful looks behind him. "What pictures!" sighed he; "what sketches! But we can't have every thing. Burner's is yet full twelve miles distant, and we must reach there to-night by the programme.

BURNER'S.

"Vite! vite conducteur!" "Ya—as, sir," replied the obsequious coachman, looking somewhat bewildered, but licking it into the horses all the while. As they went on winding their toilsome way around the spurs of the mountain, a gorgeous sunset began to work its magic changes upon the extended landscape. But the sunset faded into twilight, and the twilight deepened into darkness, before they reached their destination. Here a hospitable welcome, a blazing fire, and a keenly-appreciated supper were followed by a deep, unbroken sleep of some ten hours' duration.

Burner's Sulphur Springs, or, as they are sometimes more properly called, The Seven Fountains, are, apart from their beautiful surroundings, worthy objects of scientific curiosity. In a small bowl-like hollow, and within a circle whose radius is probably not more than a dozen paces, are these seven fountains, all differing in character. The central spring is a fine white sulphur; within a few feet are two other sulphurs differing in temperature and chemical analysis. A few paces distant are Freestone, Slate, and Limestone springs, each decided and unmistakable of its kind. The seventh is called the Willow Spring; but we do not know what are its virtues and qualities.

Our friends took to the open air, while the frost was yet sparkling on the ground, and, after ranging the hill-sides until the girls were tired, Crayon determined to amuse himself, making a sketch of Mr. Burner's premises. Having chosen his point of view on an open hill-side, he found himself much annoyed by a brilliant sun which took him directly in the face. The girls, seeing his difficulty, with prompt ingenuity spread their broad shawls over some leafless bushes, and thus contrived, in a few minutes, a perfect shade and a highly picturesque canopy. This unexpected and graceful service awakened in Crayon that grateful surprise which the Lion must have felt when delivered from the toils of the hunter by the Mouse. He laid down his sketch-book deliberately:

"Pon my soul, girls, this is enchanting! I'm really beginning to think that women are not such useless creatures after all."

"How delicately he compliments!" said Minnie; "no coarse flattery; not he. It requires a shrewd refinement to extract the honey from the flower. Isn't it worth while, girls, to make canopies, just to hear Cousin Porte speak so encouragingly of us?"

In the afternoon the party, including Mice, went hunting; and although they found some game, Porte Crayon, either from distraction, or over-anxiety to exhibit his address with the rifle, missed every thing he shot at. Minnie at length began to grow quizzical—at every shot she insisted that the birds were hit; she saw the feathers fly; hinted that the powder might be bad, or the sights accidentally knocked out of place. In all this she was earnestly seconded by Mice, who ran, like an over-anxious pointer, at every crack, to pick up the game. Finding nothing, he looked much perplexed and mortified, and finally suggested that the gun was bewitched; he had seen an old black woman looking at it very hard that morning before the party were up. The girls got into a titter, and Crayon bit his lips but said nothing. A pheasant, a squirrel, and a couple of crows had already heard his bullets whistle by their ears, and had gone off in great alarm. Presently a fine rabbit sprang up, and after running about fifty yards, stood up to see who was coming. Porte took deliberate aim and fired; the rabbit disappeared, and every body but the rifleman ran to find him. On examining the spot they could see nothing; but Minnie having slyly gathered half a dozen wild turkey feathers, which she found in the thicket, showed them triumphantly, exclaiming, "There! I was sure he was hit; look at the feathers." Crayon quietly reloaded his piece, and commenced looking about for a lizard. Although this search was unsuccessful, he did not wait long for his revenge. As they neared the edge of the wood, a large black animal suddenly stepped out of a thicket. "Heavens!" cried he, whipping out his knife, "a bear!" A trio of shrieks echoed through the forest, and Porte suddenly found himself bound neck and hands by three pair of desperate arms. "Don't, don't choke me to death," he gurgled. "Help, Mice!"

"Why, Mistissee," said Mice earnestly; "dat ain't no bar. Mass' Porte jis foolin'."

"Pshaw!" said Minnie, it's only a great black ram. Oh, Porte, you ought to be ashamed of yourself!"

"Indeed," said Fanny, recovering herself, "I do wish it had been a bear. Such an adventure!"

"Ke, he! I 'specs, Miss, if he was a sure-enough bar, den you wish he was a sheep agin."

THE BEAR.

After this excitement, the ladies felt nervous and fatigued, and requested Porte to conduct them home by the nearest route. Like all wise men, he enjoyed his triumph moderately. He was uncommonly good-humored and polite during the rest of the evening, and was contented that no further allusion was ever made to the shooting of that day.

In passing from Burner's to Woodstock—six miles distant—on the western descent of the Massanutten Mountain, our travelers were delighted with a magnificent view of the county of Shenandoah, which lay as it were a map spread out at their feet, checkered with field and woodland, dotted with villages and farm houses, and watered by the north fork of the Shenandoah river, which glistened in its doublings and windings like a silver serpent, inclosing many a fair and fertile meadow in its beneficent folds.

As for the town of Woodstock, it doubtless has, like many other little towns in Virginia, the merits of a singed cat, that of being much better than it looks. At any rate, our travelers did not tarry long enough to appreciate it, but finding themselves once more upon the turnpike they pushed on rapidly. At noon they stopped as usual to refresh. At Crayon's request to serve something cold and without delay, the landlord looked considerably perplexed. After some circumlocution, however, he frankly acknowledged that there was nothing in the house—neither bread, nor meat, nor vegetables.

"We had a fine dinner, sir, said Boniface apologetically; "but the stage-passengers were so delighted with it they left nothing. It was a splendid dinner, sir, if your party had only got in before the stage."

Crayon felt his curiosity piqued. "What had you?"

"A squirrel pie," said Boniface, rubbing his hands; "a squirrel pie, and-er-ah a fine squirrel pie. The fact is, stranger, my old woman is sick, or I wouldn't have been caught in this fix. You know young women ain't of no account anyhow."

This coincidence of opinion soothed Mr. Crayon's disappointment, and the party good-humoredly lunched on ham and sugar cakes, which they found in their carriage-box, and went on their way rejoicing.

Following the Valley Road they passed the night at New Market, and dined on the next day at Harrisonburg, the county town of Rockingham. One mile south of this place they left the turnpike, and drove twelve or thirteen miles, over a pleasant country road, to Port Republic, a forlorn village on the Shenandoah, whose only claim to notoriety is the fact that it is only three miles from Weyer's Cave.

"There, girls!" exclaimed Porte Crayon, pointing with animation to a hill which rose abruptly from the broad meadow lands skirting the river, "there is Cave Hill!"

This news caused quite a flutter among the inmates of the carriage, and furnished a subject of animated conversation, until they drove up to a neat-looking country house at the foot of the hill. The prompt landlord met them at the gate with a cheerful welcome, and the interior of Mr. Moler's house proved as agreeable and well-ordered as the outside was neat and attractive."

"Will you visit the cave to-night, ladies?" inquired the host.

"To-night!" exclaimed Fanny, taken by surprise.

"Oh, yes," lisped Minnie, "by all means; we have the full moon now, and it would be charming to visit it by moonlight. It shows to greater advantage—turning to Mr. Moler—doesn't it, sir?"

"Why, Minnie!" cried Dora, her eyes resembling moons in miniature, "the moon doesn't shine in there; does it, Cousin Porte?"

"Good gracious! I forgot! The idea of going in at all confuses me so; then the thought of a place where the moon don't shine, nor the sun; it's horrible! It never struck me before!"

The girls all became thoughtful, and it required no persuasion to induce them to defer the proposed visit until the morrow.

When they met again next morning around an early breakfast table they seemed still more dispirited. They had had wonderful dreams, and the anticipated visit to the cave had begun to work terribly on their feminine fancies. Porte Crayon's countenance was austere and his manner mysterious, as if something of vast importance was about to be transacted. The proprietor looked grave, and exchanged meaning glances with Mr. Crayon, and their conversation was carried on in broken sentences of hidden meanings, dark hints, suggestive of nameless dangers and terrible things. The girls became uncontrollably nervous, and Cousin Minnie, as usual, broke out first—

"I declare, this is dreadful! I won't go into such a horrible place! I wish to heaven I was at home!"

"Only to think," chimed Dora, "there are ladders to go down!"

"And," said Fanny, entirely forgetting the heroine, "dreadful bridges to cross, with awful pits on each side!"

"And," pursued Minnie, "all down, deep under ground, where the moon doesn't shine!"

"Nor the sun," suggested Dora. "Oh! we've traveled a hundred miles to see the cave, and now we'd go two hundred to escape."

Mr. Crayon here assumed a heroic tone and attitude. "It is too late, young ladies, too late to look back now. What would they say of us at home? Our memories will be covered with everlasting shame, if any one of us fails to reach the uttermost limit of the cave. You, Fanny, that would be a heroine! You, Minnie, that wished to see a bear! You, Dora, that would go any where if Cousin Porte would only give you his arm! I'm ashamed of you. You're no better than a parcel of women!"

"Come on, girls," said Fanny stoutly; "this is all nonsense. I'll go in, I'm determined, and I'll go first;" and Fanny looked, and doubtless felt, very much like the Maid of Saragossa, when she was about to mount the fearful rampart.

"I'll go, too," said Minnie, "until we come to the creeping place; but I vow I will never creep under ground like a mole."

"And I," said Dora, "will go until we come to the ladders; dear, dear, how my heart beats!"

Although Mr. Moler has some time since surrendered the office of guide to his son, a likely and intelligent lad, thirteen or fourteen years of age, he on this occasion agreed to resume it, in special compliment to the party. His appearance, enveloped in a long shroud-like gown—originally white, but now stained to a brick-dust red, by frequent explorations of his subterranean domain—a slouched hat, and a great key in his hand, seemed likely to dash again the reviving courage of the ladies. But Crayon energetically interfered—"Hush, every one of you; you'll talk each other into hysterics in five minutes. Forward—march!"

A brisk walk of half a mile, partly along the picturesque banks of the Shenandoah, and partly ascending a steep zigzag path, brought them to a small wooden building set against a rock in the side of the hill.

ENTRANCE TO WEYER'S CAVE.

The key grated in the lock and the bolt sprung back with a hollow sound. With what sensations of mysterious awe, with what sinkings of heart, with what wild gushing fancies their young heads teemed as they crossed the threshold of that dark doorway, can never be known or written, for few words were spoken, and those only such as were necessary for the preparation. Bonnets were discarded, and their places supplied by handkerchiefs; long skirts were tucked up, and light shawls selected from the contents of the knapsack which had been packed and brought up for the purpose. Meanwhile the guide lit the candles, and gallantly handed to each the tin shade which held the light. Porte Crayon stood in a corner of the room, his scoffing tongue was silent, and perhaps there may have been a shade of sadness on his face—but no one saw it. Twenty years before he had stood upon that same spot. How the retrospect of years will fill the soul with strange unmeaning regrets, undefined, but deep. "Twenty years, twenty years! I was then a pale-faced, beardless boy, with a fancy fresh and untrammelled as theirs who stand now so serious, irresolute, and tremulous upon the threshold of this world of wonders—looking, indeed, as if they read upon the stone archway the fearful legend of the Infernal portals—

'Voi ch' entrate lasciate ogni speranza.'"

The guide moved on, and our friends followed in single file; Crayon bringing up the rear. Passing through the dark throat of the cavern, a somewhat straitened passage, and down an easy descent for a short distance, they reached a level flooring and more roomy passway. As they progressed it grew still wider, and anon groups of white shadowy figures seemed starting from the palpable darkness. Fanny stopped short, while Minnie and Dora grasped Porte's arms convulsively, trembling like aspens.

"What are they?"

"The guide advanced, and turned his triple light upon the groups.

"This is the Hall of Statuary."

"How strange! How wild! How wonderful! It reminds me," said Crayon, "of the galleries of the Vatican by torchlight."

On a nearer approach, the statues were seen to be but grotesque and shapeless stalagmites, more resembling petrified stumps than any thing else. Above them was a circular opening in the ceiling fifteen feet in diameter, fringed with sparkling stalactites. Through this opening was seen the interior of a dome, some thirty feet in height, draped and columned gorgeously. On one side was the similitude of an altar, with curtains and candlesticks upon it, and on the other it required but a little liveliness of fancy to see a cathedral organ, with its rows of pipes and pendant cornices. The guide withdrew the lights with which the dome had been illuminated, and resumed his march forward through a narrow passage and down a rude flight of some eighteen or twenty steps into a room of considerable extent.

"Now stand here, throw your lights forward, and look up. The Cataract!"

A stream seemed to leap from a great height, pouring its white waters in sheets of foam over a broken ledge of rock and tumbling down to the feet of the amazed spectators. They held their breath as if listening to catch the roar of the waterfall, but not a murmur broke the death-like silence.

"The cataract, that like a giant wroth
Rushed down impetuously, as seized at once
By sudden frost, with all his hoary locks Stood still."

As they gazed, feelings of awe came creeping over them, taking the place of admiration. The whole scene was so unearthly.

"Now you have but to face about upon the ground where you stand to illuminate a scene of an entirely different character, and suggestive of a different class of fancies."

Less imposing, less sublime, but excelling in beauty and splendor, a massive column of sparkling white, rich with complicated grooves and flutings, appeared rising from floor to roof. Around and half in shade were other columns of less striking form and color, supporting the ribbed and fretted ceiling. This glittered far and near with snow white and sparkling stalactites, now richly fringing the stone roof-ribs, now hanging in dense masses, covering the spaces between. The richest arabesques of a Persian palace, or the regal halls of the far-famed Alhambra are but poor and mean in comparison. Doubt and terror were all forgotten. The girls were wild with wonder and delight.

"'Tis the work of fairies!" exclaimed Fanny.

"Or the enchanted palace of some magician," said Minnie.

"Oh, dear!" said Dora, "they look like beds of silver radishes, all growing through the earth with their roots hanging down."

"And there," said Fanny, "is a round waiter of frosted silver, half filled with beautiful shells."

"And here," said the guide, "is something we must not overlook. What does that look like?" he inquired, directing their attention to an angular nook.

"As I live," exclaimed Fanny promptly,

THE CATARACT.

"there is a great shoulder of mutton hanging on the wall!"

"I perceive," said the guide pleasantly, "that the young lady knows something of housekeeping. This fine room is called Solomon's Temple, and this corner, for the sake of consistency, is Solomon's Meat House."

"I should have thought," said Porte Crayon, "that the magnificent and all-accomplished Solomon would hardly have committed such a crime against good taste, as to hang his meat in such a temple as this."

"And yet," replied the guide, "a greater than Solomon placed it there."

"True, true. It seems very queer, nevertheless, that in the midst of her sublimest passages, Nature should sometimes step aside to play the farceur."

Ascending a stairway similar to that by which they entered and on the opposite side of the Temple, our travelers pursued their marvelous journey, not in profound silence, as at first, for the sentiment that paralyzed their tongues had given place to pleasant confidence and eager curiosity. Again they call a halt while the guide nimbly leaps from point to point, illuminating as he goes the wonders of the Cathedral. In the centre of this room hangs a mass of spar, which bears a fancied resemblance to a chandelier, while beyond it rises the pulpit, an elevated circular desk covered with the most graceful folds of white drapery. On the opposite side is a baldequin, enriched with glittering pendant crystals, and the whole ceiling is hung with stalactites dropping in long points and broad wavy sheets, some of a pure white, others of a clay-red, bordered with bands of white or with darker stripes of red and brown. These stone draperies are translucent and sonorous, emitting soft musical tones on being struck, and the heavier sheets which tapestry the side walls respond to the blows of the hand or foot with notes like deep-toned bells.

With interest and confidence increasing at every step our adventurers went on, not caring who was before or who behind, they climbed up and down ladders, crept through narrow passages, and looked fearlessly down into the awful pits that yawned beside the way, passing through many apartments which, if found isolated, might have been accounted among the wonders of the world, but here, being secondary in interest and brilliancy, were hastily viewed and left behind. The largest of these is called the Ball Room, from the fact that its hard clay floor, a hundred feet by forty in extent, served indifferently for dancing, at times when the cave was illuminated and visited by large numbers of persons, as was formerly the custom in the months of August or September. These annual illuminations have been discontinued by the proprietor, because the smoke from so large a number of candles sullied the purity of the sparry incrustations, and visitors not unfrequently, taking advantage of the license which prevailed, would break and carry off whatever of the curious and beautiful they found within their reach.

Another room of smaller size, called the Senate Chamber, is remarkable for a broad gallery projecting midway between the ceiling and the floor, and corniced with stalactites like the icicles that fringe the eaves on a winter's morning. At length they came to a passage so straitened that it required some management and some creeping on all fours to get through. This accomplished, they went down a steep narrow stairway of fifteen or twenty feet descent. This stairway is called Jacob's Ladder; a square rock, covered with an incrustation resembling a table-cloth, is called Jacob's Tea

SOLOMON'S TEMPLE.

THE CATHEDRAL.

Table; and an ugly looking pit near at hand is Jacob's Ice House. By a peculiar twinkle of Porte Crayon's eye, any one who knew him might perceive that he was about to indulge in some comments on this whimsical collection of property accredited to the Patriarch; but what he intended to say was lost forever to the world by a sudden signal from the guide.

"Hist! be silent for a moment. I hear an unusual noise behind us. There must be some one in the cave besides ourselves. Listen!"

"Yes, yes!" they all heard something, not like voices in conversation, but half stifled grunts and groans. Now they approach nearer still, and accompanied by a sputtering and scratching like the noise of a cat in a cupboard.

"It is coming through the narrow passage; what can it be?"

"Possibly some animal that has taken refuge in the cave, and is following the lights."

"Oh, mercy!" twittered Dora; "perhaps a bear!"

At this awful suggestion the girls huddled together like a covey of partridges.

"Stand off!" said Porte Crayon, fiercely, feeling for his knife. "Don't take hold of me."

The knife had been left behind. What was to be done? All kept their eyes intently fixed on the mouth of the narrow passage. Presently a huge hand, holding a dim candle, protruded from the aperture. A hand without an owner has always been an object of terror since the times of Belshazzar. It was evidently not a bear, and the fears of the party, relieved on the score of a material enemy, began to turn toward the immaterial. They stood speechless and aghast, staring at that awful, superhuman hand. Soon, however, the phiz of Little Mice appeared to claim the property; but all ashen with terror and red with mud.

"LE FANTOME NOIR."

"Parturient montes, nascitur ridiculus mus," said Crayon, curtly.

"It will be a nasty ridiculous muss," said the guide, "if he should stick fast."

It was for some moments doubtful whether the body could follow the arm and head. But Mice's eyes having marked the lights, and his ears having recognized the laughter which greeted his appearance, with a joyous chuckle he gave a Titanic heave, as if he would lift the roof off the cave, and broke through, sacrificing his coat and at the imminent risk of upsetting Jacob's Tea Table.

"Master and Mistis, are you da? ugh—ugh! Oh, Lord! dis is a mizzible place!"

The narrow ladder scarcely afforded room for Mice's enormous shoes, and in his haste to join his protectors he was near tumbling over the parapet. "A very narrow ladder," said he, half soliloquizing. By this time the group below was shaking with laughter.

"Oh! Mistis," said Mice, devoutly, "now I believes dere is a torment, sence I seen dis place."

"What, in the name of torment, induced you to venture in here alone, you inconceivable block-head?"

"Why, Mass' Porte, you see, I hearn you was all gone in, an' I thinks any wha de young missuses can go I can go too. Den when I come in a piece it git so dark and lonesome, I begin to git feard like. Den I seen sich things stand-in' about, and I hearn things like big bells. I think den, I gwine right straight down below. Ugh! it was mizzible. I am glad I found you, sure enough." And during the rest of the exploration Mice stuck closer to his master than his sense of respect would have permitted any where on the earth's surface.

If the first chambers through which they passed excelled in the rich profusion and brilliancy of their ornaments, they are thrown far in the background by the superior grandeur and sublimity of those apartments which our adventurers are now entering, and which, like the scenes of a well-arranged drama, go on increasing in interest and magnificence to the end. Now they group themselves at the entrance of the Great Hall.

"Good Mr. Moler, permit us to drop your puerile and inappropriate nomenclature, and let fancy run riot." The complaisant guide bows, and walks on with both hands full of lights. At every step strange and beautiful objects flash into being. Pillared walls, hung with long, sweeping folds of tapestry; banners flaunting from overhanging galleries; canopied niches filled with shadowy sculpture; the groined and vaulted ceiling dimly appearing at a majestic height, and long pendants dropping from out of the thick darkness that the feeble torches can not penetrate. Then the white startling giant, which imposes so completely on the senses that it is difficult to believe it was not sculptured by the hand of man, and pedestaled where it stands, precisely in the centre of the Hall. Then the weird towers that rise beyond on either side, so draped and fluted, and whose tops are lost in the upper gloom. This must be the Palace of the King of the Gnomes, and the gigantic figure there is his Seneschal.

"Girls, you are not afraid of him? Let us advance and send our compliments to his swart majesty. Now this looks like hospitality; here is a clear dripping fountain, and, as I live, a glass tumbler to drink from."

"I wonder," said Minnie, "if the Seneschal put the glass here?"

"It looks like Wheeling glass," said Fanny, "and it is more probable Mr. Moler put it here, I dare say by the Seneschal's orders."

"How strange!" said Dora. "On examination it no longer resembles a statue, but a great shapeless stalagmite, and it looks more terrible even than at first."

JACOB'S LADDER.

THE GNOME KING'S PALACE.

"True," quoth Minnie;

" 'Tis like some Bedlam statuary's dream,
The crazed creation of misguided whim.' "

They pass on by the statue and the towers; but before leaving the Hall they turn to observe some candles which had been left burning at the other extremity. The distance appears immense; by actual measurement it is two hundred and sixty feet. Still other rooms, whose ceilings reach the imposing height of ninety or a hundred feet, and this last is the grandest of them all. It is the nave of some vast Gothic cathedral, which has been engulfed by an earthquake, and lies buried half in ruin.

"It recalls to me," said Minnie, "a Moorish legend, how that in the caverns of Granada ten thousand Moorish knights, armed cap-à-pie, were shut up by enchantment, and stand like statues of stone awaiting the hour of their deliverance. Look at them, Porte; do they not resemble Moorish knights, all in linked mail, with their long cloaks and pointed helmets?"

"Brave! Minnie; well fancied; and there in the distance is the throne, where sits the unhappy Boabdil, stern and solemn, awaiting but the touch of this talisman to step down among us. Here, Minnie, take this seal ring, and go touch his hand!"

"Oh! Porte, put it up. I would not touch one of them for the world. I've fancied until I half believe what we've been talking about."

At the extremity of this long aisle, where the ceiling is ninety feet in height, stands the largest detached mass of concretion to be found in the cave. It is shaped like a tower, an oval thirty by thirty-six feet in diameter, and thirty or forty feet in height. Its surface is covered with irregular horizontal ridges and with perpendicular plaits or flutings—a style of enrichment which might be introduced advantageously in some kinds of architecture. On one side a sheet of drapery falls from the top of the tower nearly to its base, in folds that a sculptor might imitate but could never excel. After wandering for half a mile through these subterranean halls, where Nature has poured out,

"With such a full and unwithdrawing hand," her mingled stores of the beautiful, the fantastic, the awful, the sublime, you seem here to have reached the culminating point of grandeur.

THE ENCHANTED MOORS.

Then turn an angle of the rock and advance a few paces, when your lights flash upon the gaping oyster-shell.

"From the sublime to the ridiculous there is but one step," said Porte Crayon. "What an absurd freak!"

Mice examined the premises with such minuteness, that one might have supposed he was looking for the oyster. "High!" said he; "it must a-took a monstus man to a-swallowed it; but I believes in any thing now, sence I seen dis place."

Here they were informed they had reached the end of the cave; and having refreshed themselves with water dipped from an alabaster fountain, covered by a transparent pellicle of spar, they resumed their lights and commenced retracing their steps toward the realms of day. On their return they deviated from the course by which they had entered, and visited several hide rooms, each exhibiting some new phase of beauty, grandeur, or surprise. The Bridal Chamber, on your first entrance, appears but a gloomy vault of naked limestone rock, until the light, like a magic talisman, reveals one of the most curious and beautiful objects in the cave. It resembles a sheet of white drapery thrown over a gigantic round buckler, and falling in classic folds nearly to the ground. Some ingenious person has fancied that it looked like a bride's veil hanging over a monstrous Spanish comb; and hence the name of the room. Porte Crayon and his companions were dissatisfied with the name, and desired the proprietor to change it. "With pleasure," said he. "Suggest an appropriate one, and the room shall be re-baptized upon the spot."

Having puzzled their brains for some time to no purpose, the critics acknowledged themselves in a predicament. They gave it up. It was determined, however, that Crayon should take a drawing of it and give the world an opportunity of taking the matter under advisement.

Near this is the Music Room, the interior of which is nearly filled with broad sheets of incrustation falling from the ceiling to the floor, between which one may walk as through the mazes of a labyrinth. These sheets, like others which they had seen, were translucent and highly sonorous. When lights were placed behind them they glowed like candent metal, and at every blow gave out deep rolling notes, which filled the cave like the peal of a church organ. On singing with this accompaniment, the effect was striking and pleasing, the voice being broken into tremulous quavers by the overpowering vibrations.

On their return, by the way of the Great Hall, it was proposed to put out the lights, and enjoy the poetry of darkness and silence for a while. The guide stationed himself at a distance, the girls formed a group around Mr. Crayon, and Mice seated himself near enough to touch Porte's boot with his hand, which he assured himself of by actual experiment before the lights were doused.

"Now, girls, endeavor to hold your tongues, and be inspired with solemn awe."

A nod of acquiescence was the answer.

"Out with the lights!" And in a moment all was dark. Porte felt his arms simultaneously pinched by three little hands, and at the same time a huge grasp took him by the boot leg. The silence was only broken by the suppressed breathing of the company, distinctly audible, and the not unmusical tinkling of water dropping far and near, mingling in the darkness like fairy bells. The attempt at silence soon became oppressive to the ladies, and Minnie, in a stage whisper, began to express her disappointment in regard to the darkness.

"Dat's a fac," said Mice. "I spected to a-seed it good deal darker."

"I can see more now," said Dora, "than I could when the candles were lighted."

True enough, pillared aisle, swath, roof rib, and candent column floated before their vision, distinct, but changing as a dream.

"It is owing to some excited condition of the optic nerves," said Porte, "which I will explain more thoroughly when we get out. Meanwhile, as the performance does not seem to give satisfaction, and we can neither hear silence nor see darkness, as we expected, let us light up and proceed."

As they revisited the different points of interest on their return, there was a general disposition shown to linger and look again, as if the curious appetite was unsatiated still, and the faculty of wonder still untired. They slowly traveled on, however, and at length observed a soft greenish tint upon the floor and walls of the cave, which had the appearance of paint or delicate moss. This coloring gradually grew greener and brighter until they found themselves re-entering the wooden vestibule, through the openings of which the bright blasting light of mid-day streamed. So strong was the contrast, that it required some minutes of preparation before it was agreeable to venture out. On referring to the watches, it was ascertained that their visit had lasted nearly four hours, and yet no one had felt the slightest symptom of fatigue, physical or mental.

But the sight of the familiar things of earth soon reminded them that it was dinner time, and they cheerily retrode the path to the hotel.

book and pencils, and with the proprietor's son for his guide returned to the cave, and it is to his persevering labors during that and the three succeeding days that we are indebted for the accurate illustrations, which give point and interest to what would otherwise be but a loose and unfinished description of "Nature's great masterpiece."

LEONARD MOLER—THE GUIDE.

Indeed but for the sketches, the disheartening task of description would probably not have been undertaken, for how can mere words portray scenes which have no parallel among the things of upper earth? How can the same conventional forms of speech which have been used a thousand thousand times to describe mountains, rivers, waterfalls, buildings, thunder clouds, sunset, and so on, to the end of the catalogue, be combined with sufficient skill and refinement to delineate subjects and sentiments so new and incomparable? Language fails frequently in conveying correct impressions of the most commonplace objects, and in the hands of its most skillful masters is sometimes weak, uncertain, false. Combine it with the graphic art, and how the page brightens. Well have our fathers called it the art of Illumination. Most books without illustrations are but half written; and with the increased and increasing facilities of art, the reading public will soon begin to demand it as their due, and pass by with disdain the incomplete narrative which is given only in words. This must and will become, par excellence, the age of Illustrated Literature.

The details of Porte Crayon's experiences in subterranean sketching are not without interest. On going into the cave, generally after an early breakfast, he took some one with him to assist in carrying in candles, and so on, and in illuminating the different apartments. This accomplished he sent his companion out, and had the cavern to himself, with his thoughts for company.

"I had visited the place," said he, "when a mere boy, and supposed that the keenness of my appreciation of its wonders would have been blunted by that circumstance, as well as by the years of travel and adventure that have followed. I was gratified to find I was mistaken. It seemed rather that time and cultivation had mellowed the sensibilities and increased the power of vision. Nor did familiarity with its details diminish my astonishment; on the contrary, at each visit wonder seemed to grow upon me. So different from what we are accustomed to see, so infinite in its variety, every flash of light developing some new field wherein the imagination might revel, every change of position suggesting some new theme for the fancy to seize upon. Had there been a concealed spectator near, when I was endeavoring to choose a point from which to make a sketch, he must have been highly amused at my ludicrous indecision. I arranged my candles and rearranged them. I ran up and down. I could not choose, and was forced frequently to laugh aloud at my own absurdity. I lay flat on the soft clay floor, with my sketch-book before me. I perched myself on the round head of some giant stalagmite. I climbed up the walls, and squeezed myself into damp niches. More miserable than the ass, I had a hundred bundles of hay to choose from, and the regret at what I missed seemed to more than counterbalance the satisfaction I felt in the sketches actually made. Not unfrequently I forgot my drawing entirely, and would sit looking with all the intensity of eyes and soul, as if endeavoring to comprehend more fully the wonderful creations by which I was surrounded. Canst thou read, O philosopher, what is written on these eternal tablets? The percolation of water through limestone strata for ten thousand years—and nothing more?

"The last sketch I made," continued Mr. Crayon, "is a most singular one. In arranging the lights to show the huge mass called the Magic Tower to the greatest advantage, I observed two gigantic figures standing in deep shade, but strongly relieved, against the illuminated wall. They stood so statue-like, and so complete was the illusion, that I felt some hesitation in representing them, fearing that I might be suspected of condescending to an artistic trick. Although wonderful stories are often prefaced in the same manner, it rarely happens that any opportunity of telling them is neglected, notwithstanding the risk incurred to the reputation of the teller. So here go the statues, at all hazards. While I was at work upon them two boys entered with a pot of hot coffee, which had been sent to me by arrangement. No sooner had they looked about them, than both started with surprise, and remarked on the giants, as they called them. By my pocket thermometer I ascertained the temperature of the cave to be about 53½ degrees Fahrenheit, and although I sometimes remained in it from eight to ten hours at a time, I never felt the slightest discomfort from the dampness or any other cause. One morning, having risen before daylight, I went to work at a point not more than a hundred or a hundred and fifty feet from the entrance. Here I suffered greatly from the cold, as the external air was at that time in the morning very frosty, and I was near enough to the entrance of the cave to feel its influence."

The length of the cave in a straight line is about sixteen hundred feet; but the aggregate of all its branches and windings is near three thousand. It is said to have been discovered in 1804 by one Bernard Weyer, a hunter, while in search of some lost traps. Crayon, however, tells us that he was credibly informed that Weyer was not the actual discoverer, but some one else whose name he unfortunately forgets. It makes no difference. Not all the historians nor indignant poets who have written, or will write, can ever restore to Columbus the lost honor of naming the New World; and Weyer's Cave will be called Weyer's Cave till the end of time, in spite of any right or knowledge to the contrary.

During the period of Mr. Crayon's entombment the ladies began to grow restless, and seemed likely to fall a prey to ennui. As often as he returned to the hotel, he promised them a speedy termination of his labors; and as often as he re-entered the cave, he forgot them and all the rest of the superficial world. One evening he was surprised and gratified to find them in a state of high good humor; and, in answer to his apologies for detaining them so much longer than he had promised, he was assured that they would cheerfully remain a day or two longer if he wished it; they could amuse themselves very well, and were in no hurry to get to Staunton.

"And now, Cousin Porte," lisped Minnie, "we want your judgment on a question of taste."

Porte Crayon, charmed by their complaisance, and flattered by the appeal, signified his readiness to sit in judgment.

"While you were in the cave," continued Minnie, "we were perishing with ennui and for something to do. We ordered the carriage and drove to Port Republic, where we made some purchases, and we want you to decide which is prettiest;" and thereupon each of the young ladies drew from her work-basket a wax doll, and held it up for Porte's inspection, producing at the same time sundry bits of gay-colored calico and cotton lace. "Mine," said Minnie, with great animation, "is to be dressed in red, and Dora's in green, and Fanny's is to have a black velvet polka!"

"And so," said Porte Crayon, recovering his utterance, "you've deliberately gone back to playing with doll-babies?"

"Why, Porte! How absurd! These are not for ourselves; they are intended as presents for the children at home. You certainly do not suppose that we could be amused with dolls!"

"Certainly not," replied Porte. "I beg your pardon. I was frightened. Indeed I am glad it is explained; but you were so earnest and so gleeful."

"Well, and have you not often told us that the secret of happiness was in always having something to do, and in doing that something with zeal and cheerfulness?"

Mr. Crayon was mollified at hearing himself quoted—"Every thing that I say is not thrown away," thought he; "some of it sticks."

"And now, Porte, that's a good cousin; sit down, and tell us something more about the cave while we carry on our sewing."

Mr. Crayon drew up his chair complacently. "This, young ladies, is a favorable occasion to explain to you my theory in regard to the orical delusions in the cave when the lights were put out. The optic nerves—"I say, Fanny, hand me the scissors"—"Are you listening?" said Crayon. "Certainly; you said nerves."—"The reason why, upon the first extinguishment of the lights, the intensity of the darkness is not appreciated, is—" "Now, Minnie, would you advise me to trim this skirt with white or black?"—"Are you listening to me?" inquired Crayon, with some heat of manner. "To be sure we are, and very much interested; you said is."—"The reason, then, of this phenomenon is, that the optic nerves—" "Oh! Dora, don't for the world cut that bias; you'll waste all the green calico!"—"Now, seriously, young ladies," said Crayon reddening, "I am endeavoring to give you some scientific information which may be highly useful, and will be at least ornamental, if perchance in society this subject should be introduced—" "How elegant! oh! oh!" exclaimed Minnie; "it will be charming. It will be too sweet in this red dress. Diddle diddle, diddle diddle, diddle diddle," sung she, dancing the doll over the work-table, in an ecstasy of delight.—"May the deuce take them all!" said Porte Crayon, rising indignantly and stalking out of the room. "Such is the fate of all who, in the simplicity of their hearts, volunteer to benefit or instruct the world!"

Presently he burst into a good-humored laugh. "After all, didn't Chief Justice Marshall play marbles, after presiding in the Supreme Court; ay, and enjoy the game, too, as much as any of the boys?"

Crayon put his head in at the open door—"Girls, I ask pardon for my impatient exclamation just now! Amuse yourselves, while I seek a subject for another sketch."

NAPOLEON BONAPARTE.

BY JOHN S. C. ABBOTT.

SAINT HELENA.

ON the 9th of August, 1815, the Northumberland, with the accompanying squadron, set sail for St. Helena. The fleet consisted of ten vessels. As the ships were tacking, to get out of the Channel, the Emperor stood upon the deck of the Northumberland, and watched with an anxious eye to catch a last glimpse of his beloved France. At last a sudden lifting of the clouds presented the coast to view. "France! France!" spontaneously burst from the lips of all the French on board.

The Emperor gazed for a moment in silence upon the land over which he had so long and so gloriously reigned. He then, uncovering his head, bowed to the distant hills, and said, with deep emotion, "Land of the brave, I salute thee! Farewell! France farewell!"

The effect upon all present was electric. The English officers, moved by this instinctive and sublime adieu, involuntarily uncovered their heads, profoundly respecting the grief of their illustrious captive. The English government, true to its unwavering policy, had given orders that the Emperor's imperial title should not be recognized, but that he should be addressed and treated simply as General Bonaparte. This was an outrage to the rights of nations, and an insult to greatness crushed by misfortune.

The Emperor, with extraordinary fortitude, resigned himself to his new situation. Though, in self-respect, he could not assent to the insulting declaration of the English ministers that he had been but an usurper, and the French nation rebels, he opposed the effect of these instructions with such silent dignity as to command general respect and homage. Such was the magical influence of his genius, as displayed in all his words and actions, that each day he became the object of more exalted admiration and reverence.

He breakfasted alone in his cabin, and passed the day until four o'clock in reading or conversing with those of his companions whom he invited to his room. At four o'clock he dressed for dinner, and came into the general cabin, where he frequently amused himself for half an hour with a game of chess. At five o'clock the Admiral came and invited him to dinner. The Emperor, having no taste for convivial habits, had seldom during his extraordinarily laborious life allowed himself more than fifteen minutes at the dinner table. Here the courses alone occupied over an hour. Then an hour or two more were loitered away at the wine. Napoleon, out of respect to the rest of the company, remained at the table until the close of the regular courses. His two valets stood behind his chair and served him. He ate very frugally, and of the most simple dishes; never expressing either censure or approbation of the food which was provided. At the hour when ladies in England withdraw from the table he invariably retired. As the Emperor left the whole company rose, and continued standing until he had passed from the room. It was the instinctive homage of generous men to the greatest of mankind, resigning himself sublimely to unparalleled misfortunes. Some one of his suite, in turn, each day accompanied him upon deck. Here he walked for an hour or two, conversing cheerfully and cordially with his friends, and with any others whom he happened to encounter on board the ship.

Without the slightest reserve he spoke of all the events of his past career—of his conflicts, his triumphs, and his disasters. In these utterances from the fullness of the heart, he never manifested the least emotion of bitterness or of irritability toward those who had opposed him. Such was the Emperor's uniform course of life during the voyage of ten weeks.

"He had won," says Lamartine, "the admiration of the English crew, by the ascendancy of his name; by the contrast between his power of yesterday and his present captivity, as well as by the calm freedom of his attitude. Jailers themselves are accessible to the radiance of glory and grandeur that beams from the captive. A great name is an universal majesty. The vanquished reigned over his conquerors."

There were several Italians on board the ship, and there were also some midshipmen and common sailors who spoke French fluently. Napoleon seemed pleased in calling these to him, and employing them as interpreters. One day he perceived the master of the vessel, who, as pilot, was responsible for her safe conduct, but who, not having the honor of an epaulet, was not admitted to the society of Admiral Cockburn and his suite. The Emperor entered into a long conversation with the man, was pleased with his intelligence, and, in conclusion, said, "Come and dine with me to-morrow."

NAPOLEON'S ADIEU TO FRANCE.

The poor master, astonished and bewildered, stammered out, in reply, "The Admiral and my captain will not like a master to sit at their table."

"Very well," answered the Emperor, "if they do not, so much the worse for them; you shall dine with me in my cabin."

When the Admiral rejoined the Emperor, and was informed of what had passed, he very graciously remarked that any one invited by General Bonaparte to the honor of sitting at his table was, by this circumstance alone, placed above all the ordinary rules of discipline and of etiquette. He then sent for the master, and assured him that he would be welcome to dinner the next day.

This unaffected act, so entirely in accordance with the whole life of the Emperor, but so astounding on board an English man-of-war, was with electric rapidity circulated through the ship. Every sailor felt that there was a bond of union between him and the Emperor. The soldiers of the 53d regiment, who were on their passage to St. Helena to guard his prison, and the crew of the ship, were all from that hour apparently as devoted to him as French soldiers and French sailors would have been.

After walking for a time upon the deck, the Emperor usually took his seat upon a gun, which was ever after called the Emperor's gun, when sometimes for hours he would converse with great animation and cheerfulness. An interested group ever gathered around him. Las Cases was in the habit of recording in his journal these conversations. Napoleon ascertaining this fact, called for his journal, read a few pages, and then decided to beguile the weariness of the voyage by dictating the prominent events of his life.

October 7. The fleet met a French ship. An officer of the Northumberland visited her, and told the astonished captain that they had the Emperor on board, and were conveying him to St. Helena. The French captain sadly replied, "You have robbed us of our treasure. You have taken away him who knew how to govern us according to our taste and manners."

The Emperor continued to beguile the weary hours of each day in dictating the memoirs of his campaigns. "When he commenced his daily dictations," says Las Cases, "after considering for a few moments, he would rise, pace the floor, and then begin to dictate. He spoke as if by inspiration; places, dates, phrases—he stopped at nothing."

October 15. Just as the evening twilight was fading away, a man at the mast-head shouted "Land!" In the dim distance could be faintly discerned a hazy cloud, which was suspended as the pall of death over the gloomy prison and the grave of the Emperor. About noon of the next day the Northumberland cast anchor in the harbor of St. Helena. The Emperor, through his glass, gazed with an unchanged countenance upon the bleak and storm-drenched rock. Ragged peaks, black and verdureless, towered to the clouds. A straggling village adhered to the sides of a vast ravine. Every shelf in the rocks, every aperture, and the brow of every hill, were planted with cannon. It was now about a hundred days since the Emperor had left France, and seventy days since sailing from England. The command of the British ministers was peremptory that the Emperor should not be permitted to land until his prison on shore was made secure for him. Admiral Cockburn, however, proudly refused to be the executioner of such barbarity. With unconcealed satisfaction he informed the French gentlemen that he would take upon himself the responsibility of seeing them all landed the next day.

St. Helena is a conglomeration of rocks, apparently hove, by volcanic fires, from the bosom of the ocean. It is six thousand miles from Europe, and twelve hundred miles from the nearest point of land on the coast of Africa. This gloomy rock, ten miles long and six broad, placed beneath the rays of a tropical sun, emerges like a castle from the waves, presenting to the sea, throughout its circuit, but an immense perpendicular wall, from six hundred to twelve hundred feet high. There are but three narrow openings in these massive cliffs by which a ship can approach the island. These are all strongly fortified. The island at this time contained five hundred white inhabitants, about two hundred of whom were soldiers. There were also three hundred slaves. The climate is very unhealthy, liver complaint and dysentery raging fearfully. "There is no instance," says Montholon, "of a native or a slave having reached the age of fifty years."

October 16. Late in the afternoon the Emperor, with some of his companions, entered a boat, and was conveyed on shore. Before leaving the ship he sent for the captain, kindly took leave of him, and requested him to convey his thanks to the officers and crew. The whole ship's company was assembled on the quarter-deck and on the gangways to witness his departure. The tears of sympathy glistened in many eyes quite unused to weep.

It was a funeral scene, and the sacred silence of the burial reigned, as the Emperor passed from the ship and was conveyed by the strong arms of the rowers to his dreary prison and his tomb.

The sun had sunk beneath the waves, and twilight had faded away, as the Emperor landed and walked through the craggy street of Jamestown. In this miserable village a small unfurnished room had been obtained for England's imperial captive. His friends put up his iron camp-bedstead, spread upon it a mattress, and placed in the room a few other articles of furniture which they had brought from the ship. Sentinels, with their bayoneted muskets, guarded the windows and the door of the prisoner. All the inhabitants of Jamestown crowded around the house to catch a glimpse of the man whose name alone inspired all the combined despotisms of Europe with terror. Gloomy night had now darkened over the dismal scene, and the damp ocean wind moaned along the craggy streets. Napoleon was silent, calm, and sad. He soon dismissed his attendants, extinguished his light, and threw himself upon his mattress for such repose as could then and there be found. Such was the first night of the Emperor Napoleon at St. Helena. The mind lingers in the contemplation of its mournful sublimity.

Upon this barren rock, about three miles from Jamestown, and fifteen hundred feet above the level of the sea, there was a ravine called Longwood, situated in the midst of crags and peaks of rock which nearly encircled it. In this wild and desolate chasm, almost destitute of verdure, and where a few dwarfed and storm-twisted gum-trees added to the loneliness of the scene, there was a dilapidated hut. It had been originally a cow-house. Subsequently it had received some repairs, and had occasionally been used as a temporary retreat from the stifling heat of Jamestown. This spot had been selected for the residence of the captive. It was detached from the inhabited parts of the island, was most distant from those portions of the coast accessible by boats, "which," says Admiral Cockburn, "the Governor considers it of importance to keep from the view of General Bonaparte," and an extent of level ground presented itself suitable for exercise.

October 17. At six o'clock this morning the Emperor rode on horseback, accompanied by Admiral Cockburn and General Bertrand, to view the dismal gorge which was to be his prison and his tomb. When he gazed upon the awful doom prepared for him, his heart was smitten with dismay. But in dignified silence he struggled against the anguish of his spirit. The hut was so dilapidated and so small, that it would require a month or two at least devoted to repairs, before it could be rendered in any degree habitable for the Emperor and his companions. In the Admiral's next communication to the British government he wrote:

"I am sorry to add that General Bonaparte, since he has landed here, has appeared less resigned to his fate, and has expressed himself more dissatisfied with the lot decreed him than he did before. This, however, I merely attribute to the first effects of the general sterile appearance of this island around where he now resides, and the little prospect it yields himself and followers of meeting with any of those amusements and enjoyments to which they have been accustomed."

At the same time the Admiral wrote that the force of men and ships which he had with him was not sufficient to hold the captive in security. He asked for two more vessels of war.

As Napoleon, in great dejection, was returning from Longwood, extremely reluctant again to occupy his narrow room in Jamestown, surrounded by sentinels and the curious crowd, he observed a little secluded farm-house, at a place called The Briars, and inquired if he could not take refuge there until Longwood should be prepared for his residence. A very worthy man, Mr. Balcombe, resided at this place with his family. The house was of one story, and consisted of but five rooms. Mr. Balcombe, however, cordially offered a room to the Emperor. At the distance of a few yards from the dwelling there was a small pavilion or summer-house, consisting of one room on the ground-floor and two small garrets above. Napoleon, not willing to incommode the family, selected this for his abode. The Admiral consented to this arrangement, and here, therefore, the Emperor fixed his residence. His camp-bed was put up in this lower room. Here he ate, slept, read, and dictated. Las Cases and his son crept into one of the garrets. Marchand, Napoleon's first valet-de-chambre, occupied the other. Mr. Balcombe's family consisted of himself, wife, and four children, two sons and two daughters. One of these daughters, Elizabeth, afterward Mrs. Abeel, has since recorded some very pleasing reminiscences of her childish interviews with the Emperor.

"The earliest idea," says Mrs. Abeel, "I had of Napoleon, was that of a huge ogre or giant, with one large flaming red eye in the midst of his forehead, and long teeth protruding from his mouth, with which he tore to pieces and devoured naughty little girls. I had rather grown out of this first opinion of Napoleon; but, if less childish, my terror of him was still hardly diminished. The name of Bonaparte was still associated in my mind with every thing that was bad and horrible. I had heard the most atrocious crimes imputed to him; and if I had learned to consider him as a human being, I yet believed him to be the worst that had ever existed. Nor was I singular in these feelings. They were participated by many much older and wiser than myself; I might say, perhaps, by a majority of the English nation. Most of the newspapers of the day described him as a demon. All those of his own country who lived in England were, of course, his bitter enemies; and from these two sources we alone formed our opinion of him.

"How vividly I recollect my feelings of dread, mingled with admiration, as I now first looked upon him whom I had learned to fear so much! Napoleon's position on horseback, by adding height to his figure, supplied all that was wanting to make me think him the most majestic person I had ever seen. He was deadly pale, and I thought his features, though cold and immovable, and somewhat stern, were exceedingly beautiful. He seated himself on one of our cottage chairs, and after scanning our little apartment with his eagle glance, he complimented mamma on the pretty situation of the Briars. When once he began to speak, his fascinating smile and kind manner removed every vestige of the fear with which I had hitherto regarded him. His manner was so unaffectedly kind and amiable, that in a few days I felt perfectly at ease in his society, and looked upon him more as a companion of my own age than as the mighty warrior at whose name the world grew pale.

"I never met with any one who bore childish liberties so well as Napoleon. He seemed to enter into every sort of mirth or fun with the glee of a child, and though I have often tried his patience severely, I never knew him lose his temper, or fall back upon his rank or age to shield himself from the consequences of his own familiarity or of his indulgence to me. I looked upon him, indeed, when with him, almost as a brother or companion of my own age, and all the cautions I received, and my own resolutions to treat him with more respect and formality, were put to flight the moment I came within the influence of his arch smile and laugh."

The Emperor seemed to enjoy very much the society of these children. He showed them the souvenirs which he cherished. Among them was a miniature of his idolized son. The beautiful infant was kneeling in prayer, and underneath were the words, "I pray the good God for my father, my mother, and my country."

As night approached the Emperor retired to his solitary and unfurnished room. It had two doors facing each other, one on each of two of its sides, and two windows, one on each of the other sides. The windows had neither shutters nor curtains. One or two chairs were brought into the room, and the Emperor's iron bedstead was adjusted by his valets. Night, with undisturbed silence and profound solitude, darkened the scene. The damp night wind moaned through the loose and rattling casement near the Emperor's bed. Las Cases, after attempting to barricade the window to protect Napoleon from the night air, climbed with his son to the garret, the dimensions of which were but seven feet square. The two valets wrapped themselves in their cloaks, and threw themselves upon the ground before each of the doors. An English orderly officer slept in Mr. Balcombe's house, and some soldiers were placed as sentinels around the pavilion, to prevent the Emperor from escaping. Such was the situation of Napoleon the first night at the Briars.

October 18. The Emperor breakfasted, without table-cloth or plates, upon the remains of the preceding day's dinner. He immediately resumed the same mode of life which he had adopted on board the Northumberland. Every hour had its appointed duty. In reading, dictation, and conversation with his French companions, all of whom were permitted to see him every day, even the captivity of St. Helena became for a time quite endurable. The Emperor had sufficient command over himself to appear cheerful, and bore all his privations and indignities in silence.

October 20. The Emperor invited the son of Las Cases, about fourteen years of age, to breakfast with him. The lad displayed so much intelligence in reply to questions which were proposed respecting his teachers and his studies, that Napoleon, turning to Las Cases, said,

"What a rising generation I leave behind me. This is all my work. The merits of the French youth will be a sufficient revenge to me. On beholding the work, all must render justice to the workmen; and the perverted judgment or bad faith of declaimers must fall before my deeds. If I had thought only of myself and continuing my own power, as has been continually asserted, I should have endeavored to hide learning under a bushel; instead of which, I devoted myself to the propagation of knowledge. And yet the youth of France have not enjoyed all the benefits which I intended that they should. My university, according to the plan I had conceived, was a masterpiece in its combinations, and would have been such in its national results."

October 24. All the friends of the Emperor were assembled around him, and were finding a melancholy solace in narrating to each other their privations and sufferings.

Las Cases thus describes their situation: "The Emperor Napoleon, who but lately possessed such boundless power, and disposed of so many crowns, now occupies a wretched hovel a few feet square, perched upon a rock, unprovided with furniture, and without either shutters or curtains to the windows. This place must serve him for bedchamber, dressing-room, dining-room, study, and sitting-room; and he is obliged to go out when it is necessary to have this one apartment cleaned. His meals, consisting of a few wretched dishes, are brought to him from a distance, as if he were a criminal in a dungeon. He is absolutely in want of the necessities of life. The bread and wine are not such as we have been accustomed to, and are so bad that we loathe to touch them. Water, coffee, butter, oil, and other articles, are either not to be procured or are scarcely fit for use. A bath, which is so necessary to the Emperor's health, is not to be had; and he is deprived of the exercise of riding on horseback.

"His friends and servants are two miles distant from him, and are not suffered to approach his person without being accompanied by a soldier. They are compelled to pass the night at a guard-house if they return beyond a certain hour, or if any mistake occur in the pass-word, which happens almost daily. Thus, on the summit of this frightful rock, we are equally exposed to the severity of man and the rigor of nature."

As each one told his tale of grievances, the Emperor—who thus far had borne his wrongs with an uncomplaining and a serene spirit—was roused. With warmth he exclaimed,

"For what infamous treatment are we reserved! This is the anguish of death! To injustice and violence they now add insult and protracted torment. If I were so hateful to them, why did they not get rid of me? A few musket-balls in my heart or head would have done the business, and there would at least have been some energy in the crime. Were it not for you, and above all for your wives, I would receive from them nothing but the pay of a private soldier! How can the monarchs of Europe permit the sacred character of sovereignty to be violated in my person? Do they not see that they are, with their own hands, working their own destruction at St. Helena? I entered their capitals victorious, and had I cherished such sentiments what would have become of them? They styled me their brother; and I had become so, by the choice of the people, the sanction of victory, the character of religion, and the alliance of their policy and their blood. Do they imagine that the good sense of nations is blind to their conduct? And what do they expect from it? At all events make your complaints, gentlemen! Let indignant Europe hear them! Complaints from me would be beneath my dignity and character. I must command or be silent."

The next morning the captain of one of the vessels of the squadron, who was about to return to Europe, called upon the Emperor. In glowing and rapid utterance Napoleon reiterated his protest against the cruel treatment to which he was subjected, requesting the captain to communicate his remonstrance to the British Ministers. Las Cases immediately made a memorandum of his remarks, as nearly as he could catch the words, and placed it in the hands of the officer, who promised punctually to fulfill his mission. The memorandum was as follows:

"The Emperor desires, by the return of the next vessel, to receive some account of his wife and son, and to be informed whether the latter is still living. He takes this opportunity of repeating, and conveying to the British government, the protestations which he has already made against the extraordinary measures adopted toward him.

"1. The Government has declared him a prisoner of war. The Emperor is not a prisoner of war. His letter to the Prince Regent, which he wrote and communicated to Captain Maitland before he went on board the Bellerophon, sufficiently proves, to the whole world, the resolutions and the sentiments of confidence which induced him freely to place himself under the English flag. The Emperor might, had he pleased, have agreed to quit France only on stipulated conditions with regard to himself. But he disdained to mingle personal considerations with the great interests with which his mind was constantly occupied. He might have placed himself at the disposal of the Emperor Alexander, who had been his friend; or of the Emperor Francis, who was his father-in-law. But confiding in the justice of the English nation, he desired no other protection than its laws afforded; and renouncing public affairs, he sought no other country than that which was governed by fixed laws, independent of private will.

"2. Had the Emperor really been a prisoner of war, the rights which civilized governments possess over such a prisoner are limited by the law of nations, and terminate with the war itself.

"3. If the English government considered the Emperor, though arbitrarily, as a prisoner of war, the rights of that government were then limited by public law, or else—as there existed no cartel between the two nations during the war—it might have adopted toward him the principles of savages, who put their prisoners to death. This proceeding would have been more humane, and more conformable to justice, than that of sending him to this horrible rock. Death, inflicted on board the Bellerophon in the Plymouth Roads, would have been a blessing compared with the treatment to which he is now subjected.

"We have traveled over the most desolate countries of Europe, but none is to be compared to this barren rock. Deprived of every thing that can render life supportable, it is calculated only to renew perpetually the anguish of death. The first principles of Christian morality, and that great duty imposed on man to pursue his fate, whatever it may be, may withhold him from terminating, with his own hand, his wretched existence. The Emperor regards it as his glory to live in obedience to these principles. But if the British Ministers should persist in their course of injustice and violence toward him, he would consider it a happiness if they would put him to death."

Dreary days lingered away at the Briars while multitudes of laborers were busy in repairing and enlarging Longwood for the Emperor and his companions. All the building materials had to be carried on the shoulders of the workmen up the steep sides of the rock. Notwithstanding the utmost efforts of the Admiral the work advanced very slowly. The Emperor, by his resignation to his dreadful fate, his cheerfulness, and his, at times, joyous companionship with the children, had won the affection of all the Balcombe family.

"At the end of the graperly," says Mrs. Abeel, "was an arbor. To this spot—which was so sheltered as to be cool in the most sultry weather—Napoleon was much attached. He would sometimes convey his papers there as early as four o'clock in the morning, and employ himself until breakfast-time in writing, and, when tired of his pen, in dictating to Las Cases. No one was ever permitted to intrude upon him when there. From this prohibition I, however, was exempt at the Emperor's own desire. Even when he was in the act of dictating a sentence to Las Cases he would answer my call, 'Come and unlock the garden door;' and I was always admitted and welcomed with a smile."

One evening, after minutely examining a little traveling cabinet he had with him, he presented it to Las Cases, saying—

"I have had it in my possession a long time. I made use of it on the morning of the battle of Austerlitz. It must go to your son Emanuel. When he is thirty or forty years old we shall be no more. This will but enhance the value of the gift. He will say, when he shows it, 'The Emperor Napoleon gave this to my father at St. Helena!'"

He then spoke of the singular developments he found upon his return from Elba—of the ingratitude of individuals who had formerly enjoyed his favor. Many letters from these individuals to the friends of the Bourbons were placed in his hands.

"My first impulse," said Napoleon, "was to withdraw protection from these persons, and to order their letters to be printed. A second thought restrained me. We are so volatile, so inconstant, so easily led away, that, after all, I could not be certain that those very people had not really and spontaneously come back to my service. In that case, I should have been punishing them at the very time when they were returning to their duty. I thought it better to seem to know nothing of the matter, and I ordered all their letters to be burned."

October 31. The Emperor had now been at Briars a fortnight. His friends had made his situation a little more comfortable. A tent was spread, which prolonged his one apartment. His cook took up his abode at Briars; so that it was no longer necessary to transport his food, after it was cooked, a mile and a half. Table-linen and a service of plate was taken from the trunks. Still the hours dragged heavily. The Emperor spent most of his time within doors, with his books, his pen, and his companions. He retired very late at night. Unless he did so he awoke in the night, and then, to divert his mind from sorrowful reflections, it was necessary for him to rise and read.

Annoyances, however, were strangely multiplied. Almost every day some new rule of general surveillance was adopted. The English authorities seemed to be tormented with an insane dread of the Emperor's escape from a rock more than a thousand miles distant from any land; while sentinels, by day and by night, paced around his frail tent, and ships of war cruised along the shores. The grandeur of Napoleon was never more conspicuous than in the vigilance with which he was guarded by his foes. All the monarchies of Europe stood in dread of one single captive. They knew full well that the hearts of the oppressed people in all lands would beat with tumultuous joy at the sound of his voice. Every movement of the Emperor was watched. A telegraph signal was established which reported in town every thing which occurred at the Briars. The French gentlemen could not communicate with Napoleon in his room without being accompanied by an English sergeant. This state of things led the Emperor to request Las Cases to direct a note to Admiral Cockburn, remonstrating against measures so harassing and so useless. General Bertrand was commissioned to convey the remonstrance to the Admiral.

But General Bertrand, apprehensive that the note would but cause irritation, and provoke more severe treatment, ventured not to fulfill his mission. At last the Emperor learned, to his surprise, that the note had not been delivered. He was much displeased, and said to the Grand Marshal.

"Your not delivering the note, if you were dissatisfied with its tenor, or if you regarded it as dictated by an impulse of anger, was a proof of your devotion to my interests. But this should only have been a delay of some hours. After this delay you ought to have spoken to me on the subject. You well know that I should have listened to you with attention, and should have agreed with your opinions, if you had proved to me that you were in the right. But to delay a fortnight without telling me that you had not executed the mission with which I charged you, is inexplicable. What have you to reply?"

The Grand Marshal only answered that he thought that he had done well in not delivering the note, which he disliked both as to its intention and its expression.

"Perhaps you are right, Bertrand," said Napoleon. And then, after a few moments of profound thought, he added, "Yes, Bertrand, you are right. Let my friends here complain; but my dignity and my character require of me silence."

General Bertrand then, in his own name, addressed a letter to Admiral Cockburn, recapitulating their grievances. In conclusion, he said—

"It is greatly to be desired that the authorities would so conduct themselves toward the Emperor, as to banish from his mind all recollection of the painful position in which he is placed. I do not hesitate to say that it is such as barbarians even would be touched by, and have consideration for. It can not be feared that any escape can be effected from this rock, almost every where inaccessible. Why can they not, if it be deemed necessary; increase the guard on the coast, and allow us to ramble over the island without restraint? It were also much to be wished that we might be lodged near the Emperor to bear him company."

The Admiral condescended to degrade himself by heaping insults upon misfortune and helplessness. He returned an answer containing the following expressions:

"Northumberland, St. Helena Roads, Nov. 6, 1815.

"SIR—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of yesterday's date, by which you oblige me officially to explain to you, that I have no cognizance of any Emperor being actually upon this island, or of any person possessing such dignity having come hither with me in the Northumberland. I do myself also the honor of stating to you, in reply to a part of your note, that it is incompatible with my instructions to permit of your passing beyond the established line of sentries without your being accompanied by an English officer."

It was surely insult enough for the English to refuse to address Napoleon by his imperial title, thus stigmatizing him as an usurper. But to insist that the Emperor's personal friends and subjects, who for many years had recognized him as the most powerful sovereign in Christendom, should insult him in a similar way, and thus condemn themselves as the accomplices of an usurper, was a refinement of barbarity hardly to be expected from civilized men. It is impossible to refute the arguments used by the Emperor in defense of the imperial title. He had been constituted Emperor of France by a solemn act of coronation, and with the enthusiastic approval of the French people. It was as puerile in the English Ministry to attempt to ignore this title as it would be to speak of General Augustus Cæsar, or Colonel Charlemagne. The world has crushed the ignoble attempt in scorn. Who now thinks of calling the Emperor Napoleon General Bonaparte? And yet Sir George Cockburn carried this childish affectation so far as to pretend, in his official papers to the English Ministry, to doubt who could be meant by the Emperor at St. Helena. He wrote to Earl Bathurst:

"I beg permission to remark to your Lordship, upon this curious note, that although the tenor of it prevented my entering at all into the merits of M. de Bertrand's statement, yet General Bonaparte, if by the term 'Emperor' he meant to designate that person, inhabits his present temporary residence wholly and solely in compliance with his own urgent and pointed request.

"I will only detain your Lordship, however, while I add, that since my arrival in this island I have not ceased in my endeavors to render these people as comfortable as their situations and the existing circumstances would admit of.*"

Captain Poppleton was placed as a spy and a guard in constant attendance upon the Emperor. His instructions contained the following directions:

"The officer charged with this duty is not to absent himself from the premises where General Bonaparte may be staying more than two hours at a time. He is to endeavor to prevent the slaves upon the island from approaching General Bonaparte, so as to render their being talked to by him likely. Whenever the General rides or walks beyond the boundaries where the sentries are placed, he is to be invariably attended by the of-

* That Napoleon was contending for an important principle, and that he was not influenced by puerile vanity in claiming the title of Emperor, is proved beyond all controversy, by his readiness to assume an incognito, and take the name of General Duroc, or Colonel Meudon. But to this the English Ministry would not consent. Even the editor of Sir Hudson Lowe's Narrative pronounces the course of the English Ministry upon this subject entirely unjustifiable. He says:

"It is, I think, difficult to refute the arguments used by Napoleon in favor of his right to be styled Emperor. We indeed, had not recognized that title. But he was not the less Emperor of France. But there would have been no difficulty in calling him ex-Emperor, which would sufficiently have expressed the history of the past and the fact of the present. Or the English Ministry might have promptly acceded to his own expressed wish to assume an incognito, and take the name of Baron Duroc or Colonel Meudon, which he himself more than once proposed; but Lord Bathurst, as it will be seen, threw cold water on the suggestion, when it was communicated to him by Sir Hudson Lowe."—Journal of Sir Hudson Lowe, vol. i. p. 47.

ficer. Should the General, during such rides or walks, approach the coast, the officer is requested to turn him in some other direction. He is likewise to be particular in informing the Admiral whenever he observes any extraordinary movements among any of the Frenchmen; and is always to keep a dragoon in attendance, ready to send off at a moment's warning. He is to take care that the General and all his attendants, after they are established at Longwood, are within the house at nine o'clock.

November 8. The Emperor was fatigued and indisposed. Las Cases suggested a ride on horseback. Napoleon replied,

"I can never reconcile myself to the idea of having an English officer constantly at my side. I decidedly renounce riding on such conditions. Every thing in life must be reduced to calculation. If the vexation arising from the sight of my jailer be greater than the advantage I can derive from riding, it is, of course, advisable to renounce the recreation altogether."

November 9. Las Cases, alarmed at the dejection of the Emperor and his declining health, from want of exercise, inquired, with every expression of respect and politeness, of the officer appointed as guard, if it were necessary for him literally to obey his instructions should the Emperor merely take a ride round the house, adverting to the repugnance the Emperor must feel in being every moment reminded that he was a prisoner.

The sympathies of the officer were moved, and he generously replied, "My instructions are to follow General Bonaparte. But I will take upon myself the responsibility of not riding beside him in the grounds around the house."

Las Cases eagerly communicated the conversation to the Emperor. He replied, "It is not conformable with my sense of duty to enjoy an advantage which may be the means of compromising an officer."

The Emperor judged with his accustomed wisdom as well as magnanimity. For soon the officer came hastening to Las Cases with the declaration that Admiral Cockburn had positively prohibited him from granting the captive such an indulgence. As this was mentioned to the Emperor, he did not appear at all surprised, but quietly remarked that the horses might as well be returned, as they should have no use for them. Las Cases, exasperated by such cruelty on the part of the Admiral, said with warmth, "I will go immediately and order them to be returned to the Admiral."

"No," said the Emperor calmly. "You are now out of temper. It rarely happens that any thing is done well under such circumstances. It is always best to let the night pass over after the offense of the day."

November 10. The Emperor, with Las Cases, took quite a long walk. Returning he met Mrs. Balcombe, accompanied by Mrs. Stuart, a lady who was on her voyage to England from Bombay. While conversing with them some slaves, with heavy burdens on their shoulders, came toiling up the narrow path. Mrs. Balcombe, in rather an angry tone, ordered them to keep back. But the Emperor, making room for the slaves, turned to Mrs. Balcombe, and said mildly,

"Respect the burden, madam."

Mrs. Stuart, who had been taught to regard Napoleon as a monster, was inexpressibly amazed by this touching incident. In a low tone of voice she exclaimed to her friend, "What a countenance, and what a character! How different from what I had been led to expect!"

November 13. The life at Briars was very regular. Every day the Emperor dictated to Las Cases. Between three and four o'clock he descended to the garden, and, walking up and down, dictated again to one of the gentlemen who came from the town for that purpose, and who wrote in the little arbor which is seen on the left in the preceding view of the Briars. At half-past five he left the garden, and continued his walk in the path which passed through the lawn in front of Mr. Balcombe's house. In conversation with friends he enjoyed this social promenade until dinner was announced.

After dinner he returned to the garden, where he had his coffee brought to him. He occasionally made a friendly call upon Mr. Balcombe's family, to whom he became much attached. He then continued his walk and conversation in the garden. When the evenings were serene, and illuminated by the moon, these conversations were continued until late in the night.

"The Emperor," says Las Cases, "was never more talkative, nor seemed more perfectly to forget his cares, than during these moonlight walks. In the familiarity of the conversations which I thus enjoyed with him, he took pleasure in relating anecdotes of his boyhood, in describing the sentiments and illusions which diffused a charm over the early years of his youth, and in detailing the circumstances of his private life, since he played so distinguished a part on the great theatre of the world."

"I had intended," said the Emperor one evening, "in order to secure the suitable education of the King of Rome, the establishment of the Institute of Meudon. There I proposed to assemble the princes of the Imperial house, particularly the sons of those branches of the family who had been raised to foreign thrones. In this Institution I intended that the princes should receive the attentions of private tuition, combined with the advantages of public education. These children, who were destined to occupy different thrones, and to govern different nations, would thus have acquired conformity of principles, manners, and ideas. The better to facilitate the amalgamation and uniformity of the federative parts of the empire, each prince was to bring with him, from his own country, ten or twelve youths of about his own age, the sons of the first families in the state. What an influence would they not have exercised on their return home! I doubted not but that the princes of other dynasties, unconnected with my family, would soon have solicited, as a great favor, permission to place their sons in the Institute of Meudon. What advantages would thence have arisen to the nations composing the European association! All these young princes would have been brought together early enough to be united in the tender and powerful bonds of youthful friendship. And they would at the same time have been separated early enough to obviate the fatal effects of rising passions, the ardor of partiality, the ambition of success, the jealousy of love."

November 14. "The coffee," writes Las Cases, "that was served at our breakfast this morning was better than usual. It might even have been called good. The Emperor expressed himself pleased with it. Some moments after he observed, placing his hand on his stomach, that he felt the benefit of it. It would be difficult to express what were my feelings on hearing this simple remark. The Emperor by thus, contrary to his custom, appreciating so trivial an enjoyment, unconsciously proved to me the effect of all the privations he had suffered, but of which he never complained."

November 16. The Emperor conversed with much freedom respecting the individuals connected with him in the great events of his career. This induced Las Cases to make the following record:

"He invariably speaks with perfect coolness, without passion, without prejudice, and without resentment, of the events and the persons connected with his life. He speaks of his past history as if it had occurred three centuries ago. In his recitals and his observations he speaks the language of past ages. He is like a spirit conversing in the Elysian fields. His conversations are true dialogues of the dead. He speaks of himself as of a third person; noticing the Emperor's actions, pointing out the faults with which history may reproach him, and analyzing the reasons and motives which might be alleged in his justification."

"In viewing the complicated circumstances of his fall, he looks upon things so much in a mass, and from so high a point, that individuals escape his notice. He never evinces the least symptoms of virulence toward those of whom it might be supposed he has the greatest reason to complain. His strongest mark of reprobation—and I have had frequent occasions to notice it—is to preserve silence with respect to them whenever they are mentioned in his presence."

November 19. All the French party were invited to dine with the Emperor. He appeared in cheerful spirits, and after dinner said, "Gentlemen, will you have a comedy, an opera, or a tragedy?" They decided in favor of a comedy. The Emperor then took Moliere's Avare, and read to them for some time. After the party had withdrawn, the Emperor retired to the garden for a solitary walk.

November 25. The Emperor had been for several days quite unwell, and, worn down by the dreadful monotony of his imprisonment, appeared quite dejected. Las Cases found him this morning seated upon a sofa, surrounded by a pile of books which he had been listlessly reading.

"Contrary to the general opinion," says Las Cases, "the Emperor is far from possessing a strong constitution. He is constantly laboring under the effects of cold. His body is subject to the influence of the slightest accidents. The smell of paint is sufficient to make him ill. Certain dishes, or the slightest damp immediately takes a severe effect upon him. His body is far from being a body of iron. All his strength is in his mind.

"His prodigious exertions abroad, and his incessant labors at home are known to every one

No sovereign ever underwent so much bodily fatigue. I have known the Emperor to be engaged in business, in the Council of State, for eight or nine hours successively, and afterward rise with his ideas as clear as when he sat down. I have seen him, at St. Helena, peruse books for ten or twelve hours in succession, on the most abstruse subjects, without appearing in the least fatigued. He has suffered, unmoved, the greatest shocks that ever man experienced. But these prodigious exertions are made only, as it were, in despite of his physical powers, which never appear less susceptible than when his mind is in full activity.

"The Emperor eats generally very little. He often says that a man may hurt himself by eating too much, but never by eating too little. He will remain four-and-twenty hours without eating, only to get an appetite for the ensuing day. But if he eats little, he drinks still less. A single glass of wine is sufficient to restore his strength and to produce cheerfulness of spirits. He sleeps very little and very irregularly, generally rising at day-break to read or write, and afterward lying down to sleep again.

"The Emperor has no faith in medicine, and never takes any. He had adopted a peculiar mode of treatment for himself. Whenever he found himself unwell, his plan was to run into an extreme, the opposite of what happened to be his habit at the time. This he calls restoring the equilibrium of nature. If, for instance, he had been inactive for a length of time, he would suddenly ride about sixty miles, or hunt for a whole day. If, on the contrary, he had been harassed by great fatigues, he would resign himself to a state of absolute rest for twenty-four hours. Nature, he said, had endowed him with two important advantages; the one was, the power of sleeping whenever he needed repose, at any hour and in any place. The other was, that he was incapable of committing any injurious excess either in eating or drinking. 'If,' said he, 'I go the least beyond my mark my stomach instantly revolts.'

Conversing one day with Mr. Balcombe, the Emperor remarked:

"I have no faith in medicines. My remedies are fasting and the warm bath. At the same time, I have a higher opinion of the medical, or rather the surgical, profession than of any other. The practice of the law is too severe an ordeal for poor human nature. The man who habituates himself to the distortion of truth, and to exultation at the success of injustice, will at last hardly know right from wrong. So with politics, a man must have a conventional conscience. The ecclesiastics become hypocrites, since too much is expected of them. As to soldiers, they are cut-throats and robbers. But the mission of surgeons is to benefit mankind, not to destroy them or to inflame them against each other."

November 28. Six weeks had now passed away, during which the Emperor had been about as closely imprisoned at the Briars as when on board the ship. The workmen were busy repairing Longwood. The English soldiers were encamped at the Briars. There was a poor negro slave working in Mr. Balcombe's garden, in whose history and welfare the Emperor became deeply interested. He was a Malay Indian, of prepossessing appearance. He had been stolen from his native land by the crew of an English vessel. The Emperor's sympathies were deeply moved by the old man's story, which bore every mark of truth. Poor Toby became very much attached to the Emperor, who often called at his little hut to talk with him. They were fellow-captives. Toby always called the Emperor the "Good Gentleman."

"Poor Toby," said the Emperor one day, "has been torn from his family, from his native land, and sold to slavery. Could any thing be more miserable to himself or more criminal in others? If this crime be the act of the English captain alone, he is doubtless one of the vilest of men. But if it be that of the whole of the crew, it may have been committed by men perhaps not so base as might be imagined. Vice is always individual, scarcely ever collective."

"What, after all, is this poor human machine? Had Toby been a Brutus, he would have put himself to death; if an Æsop, he would now, perhaps, have been the Governor's adviser; if an ardent and zealous Christian, he would have borne his chains in the sight of God, and blessed them. As for poor Toby, he endures his misfortunes very quietly. He stoops to his work, and spends his days in innocent tranquillity."

For a moment the Emperor remained in silence, calmly contemplating the humble slave, and then said, as he turned and walked away,

"Certainly there is a wide step from poor Toby to a King Richard. And yet the crime is not the less atrocious. For this man, after all, had his family, his happiness, and his liberty. It was a horrible act of cruelty to bring him here to languish in the fetters of slavery."

Then, turning to Las Cases, and looking mildly upon him, he said,

"But I read in your eyes that you think he is not the only example of the sort at St. Helena. My dear Las Cases, there is not the least resemblance here. If the outrage is of a higher class, the victims also present very different resources. We have not been exposed to corporeal sufferings; or, if that had been attempted, we have souls to disappoint our tyrants. Our situation may even have its charms. The eyes of the universe are fixed upon us. We are martyrs in an immortal cause. Millions of human beings are weeping for us. Our country sighs, and glory mourns our fate. The prayers of nations are for us."

"Besides, if I considered only myself, perhaps I should have reason to rejoice. Misfortunes are not without their heroism and their glory. Adversity was wanting to my career. Had I died on the throne, enveloped in the dense atmosphere of power, I should to many have remained a problem. Now misfortune will enable all to judge me without disguise."

The Emperor subsequently made efforts to purchase the freedom of Toby, and to restore him to his native country. He commissioned Dr. O'Meara to arrange the affair with Sir Hudson Lowe, who was then in command. In reply to these overtures, Dr. O'Meara records Sir Hudson to have said,

"You know not the importance of what you ask. General Bonaparte wishes to obtain the gratitude of the negroes in the island. He wishes to do the same as in St. Domingo: I would not do what you ask for any thing in the world."

Napoleon was disappointed and surprised at this refusal; and the poor slave was necessarily left to die in bondage.

THE ALLIGATOR.

THE mysterious mementoes which mark the eras of the earth's formation would have remained for ever unknown, had not the geologist grubbed away among their burying-places, and exposed, as it were, the ghosts of departed ages to the gaze of the curious, as well as to the more solemn seekers after truth. By the industry of these delvers into the true profound, a good idea is obtained of the earth before the completing creation—of the time when it was just emerging from the "without form and void." Then, our planet was composed of dissolving soil, and profuse and almost inconceivable vegetation of reeds and grasses—all was soft and sappy, for the ripening rays of the sun had not yet fully obtained their power. It was at this era that the gigantic saurian, so perfectly adapted to live on land or in the water, armed with huge jaws and claws, rooted and burrowed and turned up the conglomerating materials of incipient continents, and thus wrought the surface of the world into consistency; and having completed the allotted task, died, leaving Herculean remains that affright the imagination. The alligator, crawling among the swamps and lagoons, is all that living, is left to us eminently characteristic of these primeval times.

The sight of the alligator, therefore, suggests reflections that imperceptibly carry the mind back to antediluvian eras; his home is in the dark places; he lives and thrives only among miasmas of decaying tropical vegetation, where the foot of man finds no resting-place, and where no life is harmonious but the amphibic. There is the saurian of our day, encased in a coat-of-mail, awkward and incomprehensible; a snakish, fishy reptile, puzzling alike anatomist and philosopher.

Familiar as we had always supposed ourselves to be with the habits and appearance of the alligator, it was not until years ago, when we sat down to give a minute description, that we were aware how absorbing may be the impression of a hideous object upon the mind, and yet how indistinct our knowledge of details. Hardly a "swamper" in the Southwest but feels able to give a clear idea of the alligator; few gentlemen sportsmen, who, year after year, amuse themselves with shooting the reptile, but feel some confidence; yet we have the written experience before us of one who has slain his "thousands," who frankly acknowledges, when brought upon the stand, that he really knows very little about "the critter," and has no positive idea even of the greatest length the old patriarchs obtain in their favorite homes among the tributaries of the Lower Mississippi.

Shakspeare—who seems to have known every thing by inspiration—in his tragedy of Antony and Cleopatra, represents a conversation between Lepidus and Antony, which, for naturalness, might have occurred between one of our citizens and Mr. Jones, just returned from a tour through Egypt.

LEPIDUS. "What manner of thing is your crocodile?"

ANTONY. "It is shaped, sir, like itself; it is as broad as it hath breadth; it is just so high as it is, and moves with its own organs; it lives by that which nourisheth it; and the elements once out of it, it transmigrates."

LEPIDUS. "What color is it of?"

ANTONY. "Of its own color too."

LEPIDUS. "It is a strange serpent."

ANTONY. "'Tis so, and the tears of it are wet."

This description of the crocodile is just as clear as the Nile mud, of which Lepidus says they are bred; and yet we have heard similar dialogues a hundred times, not upon "Pompey's galley lying near Micenum," but upon our more splendid craft plying upon the "Father of waters." Says the traveler, accosting a resident of the Southern regions, "Are you familiar with the alligator, sir?"

NATIVE. "I have lived among them all my life."

TRAVELER. "What kind of a looking thing is an alligator?"

NATIVE. "Why, something like an old log, sir."

TRAVELER. "How long do they grow?"

NATIVE. "Perhaps ten, fifteen, or thirty feet; I never examined them."

TRAVELER. "On what do they live?"

NATIVE. "On most any thing they can get. sir; or on nothing, if it suits 'em best."

TRAVELER (musing). "They are a very curious reptile."

NATIVE. "They are, sir."

Yet, with all this vagueness respecting the true history of the alligator, it forms one of the prominent objects of the four most remarkable rivers of the world—the Ganges, the Nile, the Amazon, and the Mississippi—and by its intimate association with the Egyptians, is one of the most early chosen of created things that became an object of veneration among mankind.

The idea is very general that there is a radical difference between the crocodile and alligator; but such is not the case. The inhabitant of the East is the same as his prototype of the Western world, if we except a seeming want of firmness in the scaly exterior, which gives an additional repulsiveness. We have carefully examined some of the bodies of the "sacred crocodiles" that have been exhumed from among the burying-places of the ancient Egyptians, which afforded us curious thoughts, when we recalled the time of their living, and their elevation by a strange people into the place of protecting deities; yet, while we looked, they faded into the very familiar carcasses we have so often seen, stiffened by the rifle of the unerring hunter, upon the banks of Red River, or decaying in the solitary swamps in the vicinity of New Orleans.*

Among a portion of the people of Egypt of the earliest times, the crocodile undoubtedly represented their greatest divinity; many cities, or perhaps more properly speaking, collections of vast temples were built in its honor, and its priests, of all others, were most presumptuous. Ezekiel the prophet poured forth, in burning language, his denunciations upon the worshippers "of the great dragon that lieth in the midst of Pharaoh's rivers, which hath said, My river is mine own, and I have made it for myself." "And," he continues, "I will put hooks in thy jaws; I have given thee for meat to the beasts of the field and the fowls of the air:" thus using, in the moment of his inspiration, the crocodile as the very personification of Egypt itself.

Herodotus—the most agreeable of all historians—was the first profane writer who particularly noticed the crocodile: while journeying through the land of the Pharaohs, and "prospecting" along the banks of the Upper Nile, the reptile naturally attracted his attention. To his descriptions—written more than twenty centuries ago—is the world even now indebted for all of its most popular traditions. Some things he wrote of the crocodile were for centuries deemed fabulous; but modern investigation has proved his truthfulness. He was evidently an acute observer, and mingled his own observations with ideas he obtained from those about him; and adopted, as was quite natural, many things as facts which were but the gossip of the "flat-boatmen" of that early day.

Nothing mentioned by Herodotus, however, has been the subject of more discussion than his story of the trochilus entering the crocodile's mouth as it sleeps on the sand-banks, and relieving it of the leeches in its throat. Sir J. Gardner Wilkinson says that "this story would be remarkable, if it were true that any leeches existed in the Nile;" and then adds, that "the story may have originated in the habits of a small running bird, or dotterel, so common there; which, by its shrill cry on the approach of man, warns the crocodile (quite unintentionally) of its danger; and its proximity is easily explained by its seeking the flies and other insects that are attracted to the sleeping beast." Geoffroy Saint-Hilaire—the celebrated anatomist, and one of the savans who accompanied Napoleon into Egypt—confirms the story of the trochilus; and it would seem that the Greek word translated leeches signifies only sucking insects, or gnats, which line the whole interior surface of the crocodile's palate, and cause the ordinary yellow to disappear under a coat of blackish-brown. The little bird flying from bank to bank, and continually employed in seeking food, surround its head in clouds; and we have heard the negroes assert that the reptile opened its mouth until its interior was fully lined, and suddenly closing it up, would swallow the accumulated marauders, and then set its huge jaws as a trap for more. If our swamps, instead of being crowded with a rich tropical vegetation, which render them majestic aisles of dim twilight even at mid-day, were more open to observation, it is probable that our alligators would be found to have their little bird which performed the friendly office of a "winged toothpick;" and which, after all, is no more curious than to see the lordly bull bend his neck, that the farm-yard fowl may reach the gadfly fastened to his nostrils, or buzzing round his ears.

* Among the ancients, Herodotus wrote about the crocodile, and he was authority for more than two thousand years. Napoleon's expedition to Egypt did much to make familiar its natural history. In 1846, Dr. Bennet Dowler, one of the most industrious and learned naturalists of the day, resident of New Orleans, published an essay on the alligator, with a "microscopical addendum" relating to the alligator's scales and skin. This "contribution" to natural history gives a perfect idea, and for the first time, of the anatomy of the crocodile.

It would seem that the idolatrous worship of the crocodile, in the days of Herodotus, had been somewhat modified, compared with the time when Ezekiel poured forth his denunciations upon the "great dragon;" "for the people of Apolinopolis, Tentyris, Heracleopolis, and other places, held the crocodile in abhorrence, and lost no opportunity of destroying it. The Tentyrites, it is stated, were so expert, from long habit, in catching and even in overcoming this powerful reptile, that they were known to follow it into the Nile and bring it by force to the shore. Pliny and others mention the wonderful feats performed by them, not only in their own country but in the presence of the Roman people; and Strabo mentions that on the occasion of some crocodiles being exhibited in Rome, the Tentyrites, who were present, fully confirmed the truth of the report of their power over these monsters; for, having put them in a spacious tank of water, with a shelving bank artificially constructed on one side, the men boldly entered the water, and entangling them in a net, dragged them to the bank and back again into the water, which was witnessed by numerous spectators."

About Thebes and Lake Moeris, this reptile was held in great veneration; and being rendered tame by kind treatment, it was fed and attended with the most scrupulous care. Geese, fish, and various meats were dressed purposely for it. The people ornamented its head with ear-rings, its feet with bracelets, and its neck with necklaces of precious metals and artificial stones. It would seem, also, that the Egyptians covered the thick scales with gold-leaf, and thus adorned, the crocodile must have been the most strangely beautiful object that ever was numbered among the works of "vertu" of a rich man's household. Antony, when in his loving mood, Cleopatra says, addressed her as "my serpent of old Nile;" and she recalls the term with pleasure while regretting his absence. Is it possible that the spoiled beauty felt flattered to be compared to her household god, which, if adorned in accordance to the rest of her state, must have been brilliant indeed?

In Louisiana and Florida the alligator is sometimes a pet, and has been, by very little attention, so far civilized and enlightened as to justify the ready belief of its being a harmless inmate of Egyptian dwellings. The following illustrative episode would seem to be rather a free translation from an ancient Egyptian hieroglyphical record, than the detail of a modern incident:

"A Miss Nell Gary recently went before one of the Recorders of New Orleans, and made oath that one Ernest Dalfin, a neighbor of hers, kept in his yard an alligator of immense size and ferocity; and that, as she was frequently obliged to go through the yard, she considered herself in great bodily fear and danger; wherefore she prayed that her neighbor remove the alligator to some other quarters. On this charge Dalfin was arrested. When required to plead, he stated that he kept the alligator to guard his premises from intrusion, and that his amphibious guardian was, except when imposed on, as quietly disposed a reptile as ever lived. As for the prosecutor, he contended that she was brazenly inclined, and kept constantly exciting the alligator's ire by tickling him under the short ribs with ten-foot poles, and casting brickbats at his countenance, and on one occasion even went so far as to singe his back with a hot smoothing-iron, since which time his alligatorship swings his tail at her whenever he sees her. On this showing, Ernest was discharged; but Ellen was bound over to keep the peace toward "the pet" and its excellent owner.*

With the Egyptians, the crocodile was not only worshiped, loaded with favors, and made a companion of while living, but at its death was carefully embalmed, and then placed in costly tombs. This was especially the case with the people in the Theban, Ombite, and Arso-noïte nomes. At a place now called Maabdeh, opposite the modern town of Manfaloot, are extensive grottoes, cut far into the limestone mountains, where numerous crocodile mummies have been found perfectly preserved, and evidently embalmed with the greatest care.

The crocodile, though so essentially associated with Egypt, is distributed over the world, and is common to every continent except Europe. Its appearance is so repulsive, and its strength so apparent, that it leaves the idea on the mind that it possesses great destructiveness. Its lip-from want of food; they are then used for baiting with the tiger and wild bull. In these combats, the alligator has been known to seize the tiger's head between his teeth and crush in the skull; on the other hand, the infuriated bulls have without difficulty gored them to death.

Lieut. Herndon, United States Navy, describes the river Amazon as abounding with the reptile. "Above Obidos," he writes, "we began to fall in with these elegant creatures in considerable numbers, especially when we were anchored at night in the still bays. In the bright moonlight we could see them floating about in every direction, sometimes quite motionless on the surface, and only distinguishable from logs by careful inspection. Not long before my arrival, a woman, bathing after nightfall in company with her husband, was seized and carried off by one of these monsters. She was not even in the river, but sitting on the bank pour-less mouth, leaving its horrid teeth ever grinning in seeming anger, causes an alarm that is rarely overcome by familiarity. It is, therefore, no wonder that the ferocity of this reptile has been made a favorite subject with many writers.

Of the crocodiles of the Ganges, Miss Emma Roberts says: "The bank of the Ganges opposite to Monghyr has not the slightest pretensions to beauty. Its low, flat, swampy shores, intersected with reedy islets, are the haunts of multitudes of alligators, which, in the hot season, may be seen sunning themselves by the side of the huge ant-hills erected upon the sand-banks appearing above the water. Some of these animals attain a prodigious size. Many of these monsters are fifteen feet long, and they swim fearlessly past the boats, lifting up their terrific heads and raising their dark bodies from the water as they glide along. Though not so frequently as in former times, when the echoes of the river were less disturbed by the report of fire-arms, natives are still victims of that species of alligator which lies in wait for men and animals venturing incautiously too near their haunts. In many that have been killed, the silver ornaments worn by women and children have been found—a confirming proof of the fearful nature of their prey."

It was always a favorite sport with the native princes of India, particularly those on the Jumna, to pit the crocodile against other destructive animals. To gratify this passion, they have tanks built, similar to those of ancient Rome, in which the reptiles are confined with a wire round their jaws until they become perfectly furious ing water over her head with a gourd, when the reptile crawled from behind a log, where it had been lying, and carried her off in its mouth. The padre the next morning declared war upon the reptiles, and had the Indians out with their lances and harpoons to destroy them.

"The noise they make is a sort of grunt, such as a good-natured pig might make with his mouth shut, only rather louder. By imitating it, we drew them quite near us, and it is little they care for a musket-ball. We shot a young heedless fellow, however, one morning, as he was skulking under a dead trunk by the shore. When we got into the Parana mires, and especially when we visited the pirarucu lakes, with which the country is interspersed, we saw jacares* lying about in them like great black stones or trunks of trees. It is amusing to observe what a perfectly good understanding seems to subsist between the jacares and the fishermen, the former waiting very patiently for their share, which is the offal. When a large fish is hooked, the fishermen leap into the water, in the very midst of the jacares, which merely sheer out of the way until their turn comes; and such a thing as a jacare attacking a man is very rarely known.

"That this, however, does occur now and then we saw fearful evidence. When we were placed near a sitio, a little below the upper mouth of the Ranos, I learned that the 'Victoria' had been seen in a small lake near; and as I wished to trace the distribution of this plant in the Valley of the Amazon, I was anxious to verify the report, and likewise to procure specimens; but there was no montaria—as canoes hollowed out of a single trunk of a tree are called—and I was told I might probably borrow one at a sitio a little higher up. I accordingly proceeded to this sitio, and found there an old man and his three sons, men of middle age, with their children. Two of the sons had just come in from a distant fishing expedition, the third had his arm in a sling; and on inquiring the cause, I learned that, seven weeks ago, he and his father had been fishing in the very lake I wished to visit, and were embarked in a small montaria which remains constantly in the lake, the outlet of which is dried up in summer. They had reached the middle of the lake, and were looking out for fish with their bows and arrows, when, unseen by them, a large jacare came under the montaria, gave it a jerk which sent them both into the water, and, seizing the son by the shoulder of the right arm, dived with him at once to the bottom, the lake being about four fathoms deep. In this position of fearful peril, he had sufficient presence of mind to thrust the fingers of his left hand into the monster's eyes, and after rolling over three or four times, the jacare let go his hold, and the poor fellow rose to the surface, though mangled, bleeding, and helpless. His father immediately swam to his assistance, and providentially the two reached the shore without being again attacked. I was shown the wounds: every tooth had told; and some idea may be formed of this one terrible gripe, when I state that the wounds inflicted by it extended from the elbow to the shoulder, and downward as far as the hip. All were now healed except one very bad one in the armpit, where one sinew at least was completely severed. Even this seemed to me in a fair way to heal soon; but although such should be the case, the deep scars and the useless arm—for it seems improbable that he will ever again be able to move his elbow or his shoulder—will remain to tell the tale to his dying day.

"The sight of the wounded man was no encouragement to me to prosecute my enterprise; but I was very anxious to procure the fruit of the Victoria; and as three of the little fellows who were running about offered to row me over, and their grandfather made no objection, I did not hesitate to avail myself of their services. The mouth of the lake was on the opposite side of the Ranos, and a little below the sitio. Having reached it, we entered a dense forest, following the dried bed of the igarape, in which my guides were not slow to detect the recent footsteps of a jacare. Five minutes brought us to the lake, and we embarked in the frail montaria, in which it was necessary before starting so to stow ourselves as to preserve an exact balance. We then coasted along toward the Victoria, which appeared at a distance of some one hundred and fifty yards. We had made but a few strokes when we perceived, by the muddy water ahead of us that a jacare had just dived. As we passed cautiously over the troubled water, a large jacare came to the surface a few yards from the offside of our montaria, and then swam along, parallel to our course, apparently watching our motions very closely. Although the little fellows were frightened at the proximity of the jacare, their piscatorial instincts were so strong, that at the sight of a passing shoal of fish, they threw down their paddles, and seized their mimic bows and arrows—the latter being merely strips of the leaf-stalk of a palm, with a few notches cut near the point—and one of them actually succeeded in piercing and securing an arnara, of about eighteen inches long. Our scaly friend still stuck to us, and took no notice of our shouting and splashing in the water. At length, the eldest lad bethought him of a large harpoon which was laid in the bottom of the montaria; he held this up and poised it in his hand, and the jacare seemed at once to comprehend its use, for he retreated to the middle, and there remained stationary until we left the lake."

Humboldt records, in his personal narrative, "that he learned of the Indians of San Fernando that scarcely a year passed without several persons, particularly women who fetch water from the river, being devoured by these carnivorous reptiles. They related the history of a young girl of Uritueu, who, by singular intrepidity and presence of mind, saved herself from the jaws of a crocodile. When she felt herself seized, she sought the eyes of the animal, and plunged her fingers into them with such violence that the pain forced the crocodile to let go his hold, but not until after having bitten off the lower part of her left arm. The girl, notwithstanding the enormous quantity of blood she had lost, swam ashore with the hand that still remained to her. In those desert countries, where man is ever wrestling with nature, discourse daily turns on the best means that may be employed to escape from a tiger, a boa, or a crocodile; every one prepares himself in some sort for the dangers that may await him. 'I knew,' said the young girl of Uritueu coolly, 'that the cayman lets go his hold if you push your fingers into its eyes.' Long after my return to Europe I learned that in the interior of Africa the negroes know and practice the same means of defense. Who does not recollect with lively interest Isaac, the guide of Mungo Park, who was seized twice by a crocodile, and twice escaped from the jaws of the monster, having succeeded in thrusting his fingers into the creature's eyes while under water? The African Isaac and the young Indian girl owed their safety to the same presence of mind, and the same combination of ideas." We can add to the illustrations of the universality of the same method employed to escape from the reptile, that the Jacksonville Courier, published in Florida, gives the details of a fight between a young man named Morton and an alligator ten feet long, in which Morton had his arm broken, but by "gouging" the animal, he finally succeeded in making his escape.

In Africa the negroes steal upon the alligator, and dexterously manage to drive a spear through the tail into the ground; while the reptile is thus transfixed they torment it to their hearts' content, and then secure for food such parts as they deem great luxuries. The wonderful escape made by the Rev. John A. Butler, an American missionary in South Africa, from a crocodile, is very thrilling, and characteristic of such encounters. The gentleman was returning from the discharge of his duties in a distant village, and was obliged to cross a river. No natives being present to manage the boat, he ventured to cross on horseback, though the water was deep and turbid. As he went over safely, when he returned the next day he again ventured into the river in the same way. When about two-thirds of the way across, his horse suddenly kicked and plunged, as if to disengage himself from his rider, and the next moment a crocodile seized Mr. Butler's thigh with his horrible jaws. The river at this place is about one hundred and fifty yards wide, if measured at right angles to the current. The water at high tide, and when the river is not swollen, is from four to eight or ten feet deep. On each side, the banks are skirted with high grass and reeds.

Mr. Butler, when he felt the sharp teeth of the crocodile, clung to the mane of his horse with a death-hold. Instantly he was dragged from the saddle, and both he and the horse were floundering in the water, often dragged entirely under, and rapidly going down the stream. At first the crocodile drew them again to the middle of the river; but at last the horse gained shallow water, and approached the shore. As soon as he was within reach, several natives ran to his assistance, and beat off the crocodile with spears and clubs.

Mr. Butler was pierced with five deep gashes, and had lost much blood. He left all his garments, except his shirt and coat, on the opposite shore with a native who was to follow him; but when the struggle commenced, the native returned, and durst not venture into the water again. It was now dark; and, without garments, and weak from loss of blood, he had seven miles to ride. He borrowed a blanket of a native, and after two hours succeeded in reaching the station, more dead than alive.

His horse also was terribly mangled; a foot square of the flesh and skin being torn from his flanks. The animal, it is supposed, first seized his horse, and, when shaken off, he caught Mr. Butler, first below the knee and then in the thigh. There were five or six wounds from two to four inches long, and from one half to two and a half inches wide. After enduring, in addition to his other misfortunes, the pains of a severe fever, he gradually recovered from the frightful contest.

We have frequently heard of the rapacity of the alligator in the rivers and bayous of Louisiana, but it is seldom that an authenticated case is to be met with. We once had a neighbor in Concordia parish who walked out upon a log to dip up some water from the lake, and had his arm seized and instantly crushed in the jaws of the half-grown reptile. Children playing upon the edges of shallow streams sometimes fall victims; but our experience is, that the American representative is, comparatively speaking, a harmless creature, as will be clearly illustrated by numerous examples.

Chateaubriand had no other than poetical feelings called forth by witnessing the alligator in the lagoon everglades of Florida. Writing of them, he breaks forth in the following picturesque description:

"Whatever," he says, "may be the apparent deformity of the alligator, they possess many traits of the Divine goodness. A crocodile or a serpent is not less tender of its young than a nightingale or a dove. It is a miraculous and touching contrast to see an alligator make her nest and lay her eggs, and after the little monsters are hatched, to notice the solicitude which the dam displays for her family. The amazon keeps vigilant watch while the fires of the day glow upon them. As soon as they are hatched the mother takes them under her protection, leads them to the river, bathes them in the running water, teaches them to swim, catches fish for their subsistence, and protects them from the males, who would devour them as food."

The mother of Moses must have thought the crocodile harmless, when she intrusted her baby-boy among the reeds of the Nile. Pharaoh's daughter and her attendants bathed freely in the stream where the monsters most did congregate. In some parts of Louisiana women and children will, while bathing, take no more notice of the alligators than to splash the water with their hands to drive them off. Even in the terrible Ganges, we learn from an English missionary, that while he was looking at a number of children sporting in the water, he saw a large crocodile proceeding toward the creek; he, in great alarm, screamed, and made signs to some Chinamen near to come to his assistance. The "Celestials" only laughed, and presently the missionary saw the reptile playing among the children.

Audubon, while living in the Louisiana swamps, and studying the habits of the feathered race, became very familiar with the alligator, and they were numerous on Red River, at the time he observed them, almost beyond conception. He says he has seen hundreds at once, the smaller riding on the backs of the larger, groaning and bellowing like so many mad bulls about to meet in fight, and so careless of man, that, unless shot at or disturbed, they remained motionless, or took no notice of boats and canoes passing within a few yards of them. Dr. Lindsey, a gentleman who paid much attention to the habits of the alligator, relates that, with two companions, he was pursuing a wounded deer, ten miles from Baton Rouge, when the party came upon a den of alligators, all of which appeared not only indifferent of their approach, but also incapable of being frightened. The gentlemen dismounted, secured their horses, and divided their ammunition, which, though abundant in powder, was restricted in lead to 450 buck-shot. It was, therefore, determined to use only three of the latter at a charge. Each man had, therefore, fifty rounds. The hunters standing very near the reptiles, caused every shot to be fatal. The wounded all died in from three to four minutes after being shot; they jerked, tumbled, turned on one side, held up their quivering hands, and died. When the last shot was fired the survivors lay quietly, unterrified and unconcerned. As deer are only in "fine condition" in the winter, we presume the reptiles mentioned by the Doctor were suffering somewhat from the effects of cold.

The form of the alligator is quite familiar; its hideousness is admitted; yet its elongated, Chinese-looking eyes are so really beautiful, that they called forth from Job one of the most striking figures that can be found in Eastern imagery. Speaking of them, he says, "they are like the eyelids of the morning." Think of having the sun just peeping out between the lines of the horizon, amidst some dewy cloud, suggested by the eye of the alligator; and yet the severely truthful naturalist, Dowler, declares them as worthy the attention of poets as are the eyes of the famed gazelles.

To give a specific idea of its habits and nature is impossible, because of its pacific manner under the most trying experiments. Dr. Dowler permanently prized open its mouth, and it seemed perfectly satisfied; he fastened it helplessly upon a dry platform, and it made no resistance; he buried it with weights under water, and it appeared content; he crowded food down its mouth, and it remained for days undigested; he deprived it of all food for weeks, and it grew in fatness; and probably, if it had been full fed, it would have gone into a decline! At one time the alligator dies because of an apparently harmless scratch; at another time, although terribly mutilated, it seems impossible to destroy its vitality. One time it eats with the voracity of a tiger; then, without any apparent reason, it will reject food for months. It has its humors of courage, and, as with all "braves," if we are to believe good authority, its "seasons of cowardice." The closest study of the alligator gives no clear or satisfactory idea of its desires, appetites, or habits.

The head of the alligator, ill shaped and repulsive as it appears, exhibits in its construction the same wonderful wisdom that characterizes the most charming works of creation. The extreme length of its jaws would render them easily broken if they were of solid bone as is usually the case; but instead, they are composed of elongated sections, bound together as the numerous springs of the cross-bow. The teeth, so exceedingly hideous, exhibit, upon examination, some of the most beautiful contrivances in nature. They consist of eighty sharp-pointed ivory-looking cones, nearly equally divided between the upper and lower jaw. By the cunning arrangement of a long tooth and a short one alternating throughout the entire set, they have a fang-like expression, which is increased from the fact that those of the lower jaw come inside of the upper, and enter holes in the roof of the mouth; and having no lips to hide these dental horrors, they are forever glistening upon you in apparent anger, and threatening destruction. These teeth are shed annually; in the spring they are small and sharp, in the fall large and round. If you get the skull, and knock out a tooth, it is always found to rest upon one already protruding out of the socket. The hunters, who have in many instances a taste for rude carving, make beautiful rifle "powder charges" of the largest; and these alligator teeth are often unconsciously met with in jewelers' stores, handsomely set in silver, as ornaments for infants' necks, and agreeable substances on which the juveniles can try their still toothless but aching gums.

Herodotus repeated the idea that the crocodile was tongueless, which caused it to be worshiped as the emblem of mystery, the leading feature of the Egyptian religion. Upon examination of its mouth, there is found in the interior an unformed mass of flesh, without any development at its tip, but which enlarges until finally it becomes a valve sufficiently large to cover the throat, and is evidently essential to preserve the stomach from involuntary intrusion, while the animal is pursuing its prey under water. Modern science, no doubt with truth, pronounces this a tongue, but the ancients, judging from appearances alone, seemed to think there was no such organ whatever.

The legs of the alligator are awkwardly set on, and appear wholly disproportionate to the size of the body; they are really feeble, and are easily held so that the reptile can not draw them from your grasp. "Its fore leg is from twelve to eighteen inches long, and is not as thick as a boy's arm of ten year's old. The hind legs are but little larger. There seems to be no credulity implied in the belief of the story, often repeated and pictured even in scientific works, in which a man is represented as mounting on the back of an alligator, and using the two fore legs—which he drew over the reptile's back—as one does the reins of a bridle.

The tail of the alligator is its most efficient weapon of defense and attack. If its assailant can keep out of its way, comparatively little harm may be expected. If any animal it seeks for prey is standing upon the edge of the water, the reptile will take its bearing and swim noiselessly toward the shore, occasionally bringing an eye to the surface for reconnaissance, then suddenly rising within striking distance, will whirl round its tail with lightning rapidity and generally bring the victim into its jaws. We were fishing on one occasion upon the Bayou Sara, a wild, desolate stream, although flowing through a most populous region of country, and on the opposite bank we noticed a tall crane that for an hour had been standing perfectly still and half-leg deep in the water, either reflecting upon the mutability of ornithological affairs, or watching for minnows. Our attention was also arrested by the apparent phenomenon of a limb of a tree taking upon itself motion, and cautiously moving down the bank of the bayou toward the crane. The alligator—for such it was—by a strange sidelong motion gradually reached its prey, but seemed in no haste to seize it. For a long while it appeared to be sleeping on the bank, when suddenly it contracted itself in a half circle round the bird, opened its jaws, and drove the bird into them with a terrible certainty, and then with a nimble spring disappeared beneath the muddy current.

The principal food of the alligator is fish; it is his "mission," in the order of Providence, to assist in the destruction of those millions of fishes that come up out of the sea, in the annual overflows of the rivers, which might otherwise die, and by their decay breed pestilence throughout the land. The tail is the great adjunct to their mouth in taking their food in the water. The manner has been described as follows: The alligator placed his long body at a suitable distance from the shore, and as soon as the fish came between him and the land the body was curved, the tail run ashore, and the mouth opened under water—the ensnared having no chance for escape, except running the gauntlet of the terrible jaws. The power of this singular appendage was displayed on one occasion by a recently shot, and supposed to be "stone dead," alligator. A novice to their peculiarities of "playing possum," wishing to test the extreme hardness of their coat-of-mail, very innocently attempted to drive his hunting-knife into the fore shoulder of the "body" before him. If the steel had been a galvanic battery it could not have acted more efficiently on the paralyzed but not dead muscles, for round came the tail instinctively to protect the wounded part, cutting off in its sweep an interfering "sapling;" showing too plainly that a slender pair of legs would not have been in the way at all. Fortunately our philosopher struck his blow on the side of the reptile opposite to which he stood, and thus preserved himself from being a cripple for life.

It is difficult to ascertain the probable length of the largest-sized alligators. In speaking of them there is always a disposition to magnify their proportions. A gentleman, who was habitually careful in his expressions, informed us that he once saw the jaws of an alligator which must have opened in the living reptile at least five feet. A distinguished orator of the Southwest asserted to the day of his death that he once killed an alligator in the waters of Pascagoula Bay, Gulf of Mexico, that was twenty-one feet long. A planter of scientific proclivities, residing in the vicinity of Red River, where it empties into the Mississippi, has in vain for years offered a reward of one hundred dollars for an alligator, dead or alive, over twelve feet long. With the introduction of steamboats and population upon the Lower Mississippi "its ancients" have disappeared, for Audubon mentions one that he destroyed in the vicinity where this reward has since been offered which seemed centuries old, and was seventeen feet in length. We had a good-natured friend who was ever telling about the remains of an alligator he met with in his rambles on the Mexican Gulf coast, which was longer than we will repeat. It is possible there may be something about salt-sea air that produces a race of "gigantic saurians;"

at least all large alligators are located in such regions. Our hero of the long skeleton always concluded his tale by saying he stood inside of the lower jaw, and, while erect, placed the upper one on his head.

In making the nest the female, in the spring, selects a dry place in the swamp, one not liable to overflow, where she makes quite a hillock of dried leaves, pieces of sticks, and whatever soft substances may be convenient that will answer the purpose, in the centre of which she lays from twenty to forty eggs. The process of incubation seems dependent upon the heat of the sun and the fermentation of the materials of the nest. The female, however, always remains in the immediate vicinity, and will fight with maternal valor for her charge. The egg is larger and longer than that of the hen, and has a clear, white appearance: they vary in size, those in some nests being larger than those in others. On one occasion with a hunting party, we were encamped for the night under a huge tree, when we were disturbed by an immense alligator that would approach within the circle of the light, and evidently with hostile intentions. The hunters, familiar with the appearance of the reptile, paid no attention to it until some one discharged a load of buckshot in "its face." All night long the monster was heard in the vicinity blowing and tumbling about in the water; in the morning we discovered that we had actually "squatted" down beside a well-filled nest! In fact, two or three of the amphibitias were peeping out of their shells, and the remainder had so far advanced beyond the yolk, that—to use the expressive language of one of our party—"thunder couldn't spile 'em!" The moment the young emerge from their prison they immediately hide away, and seldom appear in public unless under the immediate guardianship of their maternal parent. They have innumerable enemies: while in the tenderness of youth, large cranes and voracious fish think them quite a delicacy; while the "old bulls," if they come across them, make no nice distinctions between them and frogs, but "chew them up" with infinite gusto.

The fondness of the female for her young is so great that the responsibilities of parent seems for the time to increase her intelligence. She will make any sacrifice in their defense, and becomes, if disturbed, a foe. When the young are quite small, as a last resort, if danger threaten, they run down the mother's throat to get out of harm's way, and are generally seen clustered upon her scaly back, eying with juvenile curiosity her successful efforts to procure them food. A Spaniard of Florida relates, that having carried off an alligator's brood, which he placed in a basket, borne away by negroes, the mother followed uttering piteous cries. Two of the young ones were put upon the ground, when she immediately began to push them back toward her haunts with her long snout, keeping behind to protect them, and then walking before to show the way. The little reptiles paddled along grunting after their dam, the huge monster meanwhile displaying the most marked satisfaction.

Upon being attacked the alligator "aquats" with its head close to the ground, and thus watches the intruder. Feeling themselves disposed to show anger, they gradually rise on their feet, distend themselves, and hiss something like the expiring note of a blacksmith's bellows. A peculiarity of the reptile is, that it will never turn out of its way, even to oblige a scoundrel, as once did John Randolph. If the path be narrow, you must kill the alligator or turn back yourself. A planter friend of ours, who spent much of his time upon the romantic waters of Lake Solitude—so pleasantly described by Sir Charles Lyell—got into his long canoe, and as he settled the oars into the row-locks he discovered a large alligator in the canoe, head toward him, on the point of making his escape. Both parties were mutually embarrassed; yet the immutable law of the alligator, always to go ahead, left no choice but to get out of his way. Springing with his feet upon the gunwale, our friend stood for a moment like the Colossus of Rhodes, intending to let the peacefully-disposed intruder pass between his legs, but his courage failed him, and he sprang into the water in one direction, and the alligator, evidently rejoiced to get out of the way, disappeared in another.

The power the alligator possesses to exist a long time without food, is one of its most extraordinary peculiarities, and almost exceeds belief. We have known one of good size to be kept six months in a dry yard, without food or water, and seemingly not to suffer from the fast. The reader will therefore not be surprised at the following illustrative anecdotes: Some years ago, while residing in the parish of Concordia, Louisiana, we received through "the post" a letter of portentous appearance, and covered over with stamps, which indicated that it had run the gauntlet through half the powers and principalities of Europe. Upon opening the document, we found a letter from a world-famed professor of Germany, who was—to use his own language—"desirous of obtaining a living specimen of the Crocodilus Mississippiensis, for the benefit of science, by the better understanding of its habits and anatomy." Provisions were made through different consuls for its safe conveyance and all expenses. We made a public appeal through the press in behalf of "a specimen;" and were not only accommodated by kind neighbors with several of the desirable age and condition, but some one, with commendable pride in the growth of "the staple," had a monster of many extra feet in length, in the dead hour of the night, fastened at our door, whose huge jaws, as exhibited by daylight, opened wide enough to swallow any philosopher who would dare to interfere with his habits or dental fixtures. Two alligators, however, we shipped to Gottingen or its neighborhood. They were simply secured in boxes affording plenty of air, and in this condition started on their travels. By the aid of steamboats, ships, and rail-cars, they finally, after various adventures through the long period of nearly five months, in good health reached the destined owner, and had not, in all that time, lived on else than faith, sunshine, and the dews of heaven.

Between the deer and bear hunters and the alligator there is a confirmed war. Seldom indeed will they miss a chance of knocking over their enemy, even if it is at the expense of losing their more coveted game. In the chase, the difficult to raise and highly-prized pack of hounds most frequently takes to the water, and while thus exposed, the alligator, ever on the watch, the moment he hears the loud bay, sacrifices them without mercy. An interesting and well-authenticated anecdote is told, illustrative of the hound in avoiding its enemy. A gentleman, living in the "Opelensas country," and remarkably fond of hunting, kept a choice pack of dogs, which, in going from the house to the woods, had to cross a stream celebrated for its innumerable alligators. They soon discovered where lay the danger, and when they desired to cross the stream, they would come together on the banks, and utter the most unearthly yells. The alligators in the vicinity would pop up their heads above the water in all directions, and then simultaneously rush to the place where the hounds appeared to be on the point of entering the stream. The hounds, having satisfied themselves that their enemies had come well together, would then suddenly start up the bank, run a few hundred yards and cross, making their ferry before the fooled reptiles could reach them.

Next to that of the dog, swine's flesh seems to be a favorite delicacy with the alligator. Pigs stand but little chance, if once caught too near the edges of the bayous; while thus exposed, if an alligator is espied, a litter of "young roasters" soon disappear. We were very much amused on an occasion, to witness a rash and terrible fight between an alligator of good size and a miserable old hog, known as of the alligator breed. Perhaps there was a real affinity between them, for their heads were strangely alike. However, a pitch battle of some moments ensued, when, to my surprise, the alligator suddenly quit his hold and seemed satisfied to make off with a whole hide. The extraordinary part was, that the victorious and venerable old porker never left the place, but, crowned with its victorious wreaths, quietly disposed of itself in the soft mud, and soon grunted itself into a sound sleep.

The bear is also sometimes a victim to the alligator's prowess: if Bruin be fairly seized and gotten under the water, he seldom escapes. We have heard of many such incidents. A graphic account of such a contest, evidently written by an eye-witness, appeared many years since. Every incident is brought vividly before the mind's eye.

"The witness, while fishing on the banks of a beautiful stream in Western Louisiana, was startled by the roaring of some animal in the cane-break near by, apparently getting ready for action. These notes of preparation were succeeded by the sound of feet, trampling down the cane and scattering the shells on the ground. Rushing to the trysting, instead of there being, as was supposed, two prairie bulls mixing impetuously in battle, there was a large black bear raised upon his hind legs, his face besmeared with white foam, sprinkled with blood, which, dropping from his mouth, rolled down his shaggy breast. Frantic from the smarting of his wounds he stood gnashing his teeth and growling at his enemy. On a bank of snow-white shells, in battle array, was Bruin's foe—a monster alligator. He looked as if he had just been dipped in the Teche, and had emerged, like Achilles from the Styx, with an invulnerable coat of mail: he was standing on tiptoe, his back curved upward, and his tongueless mouth thrown open, displaying his wide jaws, two large tusks and rows of teeth. His tail, six feet long, raised from the ground, was constantly waving like a boxer's arm to gather force; his big eyes, starting from his head, glared upon Bruin, while sometimes uttering hissing cries, then roaring like a bull.

"Bruin, though evidently baffled, had a firm look, which showed he had not lost confidence in himself. If the difficulty of the undertaking had once deceived him, he was preparing to go at it again. Accordingly, letting himself down upon all fours, he ran furiously at the alligator, which being ready for him, threw his head and body partly round to avoid the onset, and met Bruin half way with a blow of the tail that rolled him on the shells. The bear was not to be put off by one hurt: three times in rapid succession he rushed at the alligator, and was as often repulsed in the same manner, being knocked back by each blow just far enough to give the alligator, before he returned, time to recover the swing of his tail. The tail of the alligator sounded like a flail against the coat of hair on Bruin's head and shoulders, but he bore it without finching, still pushing on to come to close hold with his scaly foe.

"Finally, he made his fourth charge with a degree of dexterity which those who have never seen this clumsy animal exercising would suppose him incapable of. This time he got so close to the alligator before the tail struck him, that the blow came with but half its usual effect. The alligator was upset by the charge, and before he could recover his feet Bruin grasped him round the body, below the fore legs, and holding him down on his back, seized one of the reptile's legs in his mouth. The alligator was now in a desperate situation; he attempted in vain to bite, for his neck was so stiff that he could not turn his head around. Seized with desperation, the amphibious beast fetched a scream of despair; but being a warrior 'by flood and field,' he was not yet entirely overcome. Writhing his tail in agony, he happened to strike it against a small tree that stood next the bayou—aided by this purchase he made a convulsive flounder, which precipitated himself and Bruin, locked together, into the river.

"The bank from which they fell was four feet high, and the water below seven feet deep. The tranquil stream received the combatants with a loud splash, then closed over them in silence. A volley of ascending bubbles announced their arrival at the bottom, where the battle ended. Presently Bruin rose again, scrambled up the bank, cast a glance back at the river, and, all dripping, made off to the cane-brake."

Some of the popular fables respecting the alligator should now give way to truth. The oft-repeated idea of their hypocrisy in shedding unfeeling tears has had a hold, through poetry, in the world's imagination long enough. The species are honest in their indignation, and shed no tears at all; for their lachrymal fountains have been sought in vain by detestable tobacco-juice, and if they are angry, however imprudent it might be to show it, the alligator will honestly "hiss you to your face." Herodotus, noticing that the crocodile invariably raised its head when opening its mouth, conceived the idea that it moved its upper jaw "down on its lower one." This impression is most natural to every one who sees the monsters in their native haunts; but anatomy proves that the lower jaw, as in all animals, alone moves in a socket.

We conclude our article on alligators by all-luding to the strange bellowing uttered at times by the "old bulls," as they are termed by the swamper. In the season of nest-making, this strange noise partakes of the lion's roar, and can be heard for many miles, and while you attentively listen you can feel a perceptible vibration of the air. By this terrific noise you can form no idea of the distance the reptiles may be from you; for, at one moment, the "primo basso" comes rolling in with the distinctness of thunder, and then will die away in strange and mysterious cadences, most harmonious with the dark gloom of the forest wilds. Such is the love-song of the alligator, which fills the irreverent of even this age with strange and awe-inspiring emotions, and suggests sublime thoughts of the mysteries of nature. If such be our experience, what must have been the feelings of the ancient people of the Nile, when, in the quiet hours of an Oriental night, they heard their great god waking up from the waters of that still unexplored river, and sending his gigantic voice vibrating through the vaults of their temples, or whispering in soft murmurs among their groves of palm.

NOT among the least of the results which have followed upon the acquisition of California, and the discovery of its golden treasures, is the tropical direction which has incidentally been given to American enterprise. Regions before unknown, or but vaguely known through the wild tales of the buccaneers, where a vertical sun shone down upon high volcanic mountains and forests of rare woods, and where, in later years, a group of anarchical republics had sprung up on the ruins of the semi-barbaric vicerealties of jealous and exclusive Spain—these strange regions have now become familiar alike to the dwellers on the arid shores of New England and on the banks of the turbid Mississippi. Thousands and hundreds of thousands of active and adventurous men have traversed the seas where, for two hundred years, and almost within the memory of this generation, piracy was the rule rather than the exception. They have crossed the continent in the footsteps of Pizarro and his followers, and given new life and activity to those quaint old towns in which Drake and Morgan, and the rest of the rollicking old freebooters, so often gorged themselves with the spoil of the Spaniard. And, practical as adventurers, their restless gray eyes have marked out new lines of travel, and the sites of new cities, better adapted to the wants of commerce and the requirements of transit than those which for three hundred years had satisfied a humdrum world. With not less of romance than attached to the figurative marriage of Venice to the Adriatic, superadded to practical zeal and Herculean energy, they have bound the Atlantic to the Pacific with an iron band, and are seeking to break down the barriers which divide them, and to mingle their as yet estranged waters.

The undefined terrors of tropical climates, the dangers which were supposed to lurk beneath its inviting exterior—deadly fevers, venomous reptiles, and ferocious beasts of prey—have been found to be little better than idle fictions; and experience has shown that, with rare exceptions, on low coasts, where daily rains, interrupted by fierce intervals of sunshine, have forced vegetable nature into rank exuberance, and created dense, dank jungles, the birth-place and home of malaria—that elsewhere, among the open savannas, on the elevated plains and terraces of the interior, and along the flanks of its mountain ranges, nature has lavished her richest gifts, the products of every zone, and a climate of unequaled salubrity. It was in the high valleys and elevated table-lands of Mexico,

Central America, Bogota, and Peru, that aboriginal civilization reached its highest phase of development, and aboriginal population its greatest numerical strength. And it requires no prescience to discover, in future times, in the course of those great revolutions which no human will or systems of human laws or compacts can control, but which flow inevitably from High Design, that here the great composite race, which in our own country has achieved such marvels of progress, will attain to its highest development and greatest power.

Nor is this result to be contemplated as speculative and remote: it is real and near. Is it not significant that the English language now dominates in Panama, and that an American town terminates that line of transit on the Atlantic—a town raised as by enchantment from the sea, in defiance of every natural obstacle? Steam and the printing-press have acclimated themselves there, in practical and triumphant disproof of those hoary hypotheses which invested the tropics with beauty, and forbade them to civilization—which made them an Eden, and placed Death as an inappeasable sentinel at its portal.

Further to the northward, the great modern magician, Enterprise, and his Cyclop, Work, have effected transformations scarcely less wonderful. The broad and beautiful lakes of Nicaragua are beaten into sparkling foam beneath the wheels of treasure-laden steamers, and the dense forests which line the banks of her rivers now ring back the clangor of the engine and the shrill scream of the steam-whistle, as faithfully as they once echoed the vesper song of the boatman and the dash of his steady oar.

Look down with me from this gentle eminence. Seest thou, in yonder little bay, the graceful forms of many small vessels, whose taper masts and half-furled sails show that they belong to that age which is passing away, when the mariner courted the wind, and depended for prosperous voyages on the favoring breath of heaven? Beside them, in grim contrast, is the black hull and grimed rigging of a Pacific steamer, within whose iron bosom throb the prisoned spirits of fire and water—chained allies of man in his warfare against the elements. Along the crescent shore, relieved against an emerald background of forest, which robs the amphitheatre of hills in eternal green, are white cottages and broad-roofed warehouses, homes of affection and depositories of wealth. What of all this, askest thou, oh reader? Only that he who speaks to thee—his eye is yet undimmed and his brow unwrinkled—stood five years ago where thou standest, and looked down upon this little bay as thou lookest. The forest swept down to the edge of the water, the misanthropic sea-bird mused on the solitary shore, and the waves of the Pacific rolled in silent majesty, unresisted by keel of ship or wheel of steamer. And so it had been forever! This is now the port of San Juan del Sur; and here the adventurer, bound to the golden gates of the Land of Promise, first embarks on that placid sea, whose waters alone separate the regions of Cathay, of "Ormus and the Ind," "crowned with the hoar of centuries," from the irresistible offspring of modern time, the great practical Reality of To-day.

This is San Juan of the South. Two hundred miles away to the eastward, past the lakes of Nicaragua and the wide expanse of forest which covers the Atlantic declivity of the continent, tenanted only by wild beasts and birds of many hues, is another town, San Juan of the North—ancient as this is young, a town of vicissitudes, important in spite of itself, and conspicuous beyond its ambitions. Romance has often portrayed the fate of rustic beauty so unfortunate as to attract the attentions of rank and power; and the yet warm ashes of San Juan bear witness that, with nations as among individuals, the weak are but the pawns which reckless Power plays against unscrupulous Strength.

It is the hypothesis of some philosophers that every word and act of every human being, however humble, leaves its permanent impression on nature, which thus becomes the great registrar of events, typified as the Recording Angel. It is certainly true that events are so indissolubly linked together, that no human ingenuity can accurately define their relations, or in what mode they react upon each other. For nearly three hundred years, from 1529, when the adventurous Diego de Machuca descended the river San Juan from Lake Nicaragua, and indicated the port at its mouth, until 1848, San Juan was almost utterly unknown to the world. Writers on the dreamy project of uniting the two oceans by means of a canal referred to it vaguely as the necessarily eastern terminus of that work, and a few traders sent vessels thither to bring away cargoes of dye-woods, and hides and indigo, which came there in quaint river boats, hollered from the gigantic trunks of the ceiba tree, manned by tall, half-naked, swarthy men, from some undefined and distant interior. A few dozen huts of thatch, built in a narrow opening in the dense forest which burdened the low shore, comprised all that there was of a town. A small fort of logs, manned by a commandant who wore his shirt outside of his pantaloons, at the head of a dozen soldiers who wore no shirts at all, constituted whatever there was of local government and authority. The world and its movements had no interest to the dwellers in San Juan. An occasional vessel gave them occupation for a few days in loading and unloading, and brought them, what was of more consequence than all, a supply of rum and new strings for their guitars. The vessels went away, and then they had music and enlivening drums, with much dancing, not over-modest, lazy swinging in hammocks, and no end of sleep. And thus the days went on, and weeks, and months and years rolled by. The log fort gradually rotted away, and the guns buried themselves in the sand.

But while the dwellers in San Juan danced, and drank, and slumbered, Taylor had fought the battles of Monterey and Buena Vista, Scott had planted his flag on the palaces of Mexico, and California had succumbed to American arms. Then came peace, and with it the cessation of a new empire on the Pacific, with its vast and unanticipated results, which have since affected the entire relations of the world.

San Juan, in its tropical seclusion and miserable insignificance, one might suppose, would have escaped complication with these great events. But her ample port and important geographical position had long been known and appreciated by a power which is never blind to its material interests, nor scrupulous in promoting them. Her statesmen saw that with the acquisition of California by the United States, the project of an inter-oceanic communication would become invested with an immediate and practical importance. As soon, therefore, as the probabilities of this acquisition became decided, means were taken to grasp the keys to the natural highway between the oceans. Eight days before the treaty of peace with Mexico was signed, two British vessels of war appeared in the harbor of San Juan, and took forcible possession of the place, under the shallow pretext that it pertained to a mythical personage called "the King of Mosquito," of whom Great Britain affected to be the protector.

Nicaragua which, as a province of Spain, and subsequently as an independent Republic, had for more than three hundred years been in unquestioned possession of the port, not only protested against this act of violence, but endeavored fruitlessly to expel the invaders. Her forces were routed, and she was compelled to enter into an engagement not to disturb the usurpers in their occupation of the sole Atlantic terminus of the then supposed only feasible route of communication between the seas. A British officer, under the denomination of "Her Britannic Majesty's Consul-General in Mosquito," now assumed the exercise of all legislative and executive power at San Juan—the name of which was changed to "Greytown." He promulgated laws on slips of paper stuck on the cane walls of the hut which, in the absence of other accommodations, he was fain to occupy, and enforced them through the aid of an effective body of armed police, consisting of two negroes from Jamaica! The natives of San Juan marveled greatly at these proceedings, and were outraged in being obliged to coop up their pigs and chickens—in disregard of the prerogatives which those useful animals had enjoyed for time immemorial. But they soon got used to it, and hammocks, drums, and guitars resumed their ancient sway.

It was scarcely a year after the seizure above recounted took place, when the writer of this sketch entered the port of San Juan for the first time. It was after a tedious voyage, in a small and uncomfortable vessel, from which escape to any land, not absolutely a desert, would have been an indescribable relief. Hence it was, perhaps, that even San Juan looked beautiful, although a rigid analysis might have failed to discover wherein its beauties consisted. The shore was low and sandy, and upon it was ranged a line of houses, or rather huts, some built of boards, but most of reeds, and all thatched with palm leaves. Some came down to the water like boat-sheds, as they really were, covering pitpans and canoes. Larger contrivances for navigating the San Juan river, called bongos, were moored close inshore, and upon each might be seen a number of very long and very black legs, every pair supporting a very short white shirt; for, among the innovations of "H. B. M.'s Consul-General" was a requirement that respectable adult citizens should not dispense with both pantaloons and shirts at one and the same time. Behind the town rose the dense tropical forest. There were no clearings, no lines of road stretching back into the country; nothing but dark solitudes, where the tapir and the wild boar roamed unmolested; where the painted macaw and noisy parrot, flying from one giant tree to another, alone disturbed the silence, and where the many-hued serpents of the tropics coiled among vines loaded with flowers and fragrant with gums.

The arrival of our little brig created a great excitement in San Juan, and when we landed we found the entire population of the town collected on the shore to receive us. The dress of the urchins, from twelve or fourteen downward, consisted generally of a straw-hat and cigar—the latter sometimes unlighted and stuck behind the ear, but oftener lighted and stuck in the mouth; a costume airy, picturesque, and cheap withal! The women had white or flowered skirts, fastened above the hips, and a sort of large vandyke, with holes for the arms, which hung down loosely over the breast. In some cases the latter garment was rather short, and left exposed a strip of skin at the waist, which the wanton wind often made much wider. They all had their hair braided in two long locks, which hung down behind, and gave them a school-girly appearance—quite out of keeping with the cool, deliberate manner in which they smoked their cigars. Their feet were innocent of stockings; but a few suspiciously-fashionable ladies wore slippers of white satin, evidently reserved for some important occasion, such as the arrival of a vessel. A number of them had gaudy-colored rebosas thrown over their heads; and altogether the entire group, with an advance-guard of sullen-looking curs, was both novel and picturesque.

We were too glad to get ashore, and too eager to enjoy our new liberty, to stand upon ceremony, and so pushed our way through the crowd of gazers, and started down the principal avenue, which had been called King Street. The doors of the huts were open, and in all of them might be seen hammocks swung so as to catch every passing current of air. In some of these, reclining in attitudes suggestive of intense laziness, were swarthy figures of men, whose apathy even the arrival of a vessel in the port could not disturb. We caught also occasional glimpses of the domestic economy of the inhabitants, and could not help admiring the perfect equality and general good understanding which existed between the pigs, babies, dogs, cats, and chickens. They lay down together in millennial confidence, and the pigs gravely took pieces of tortillas away from the babies, and the babies as gravely took other pieces away from the pigs.

It did not require much time to exhaust the sights of San Juan; and, after passing through its principal and only street, we struck off in a path to the right, followed by a troop of boys and grown-up vagabonds. A few paces brought us to the edge of a beautiful lagoon, fenced in by a bank of verdure, upon the edges of which were a number of women, naked to the waist, who had not yet heard the news. They were engaged in washing clothes; that is to say, they dipped them in the water, squeezed over them the juice of limes, and then plunged them on the bottom of an old canoe, beat them vehemently with clubs. Visions of buttonless shirts rose up incontinently before us, in long perspective, as we followed our path, which led along the shores of the lagoon, and invited us to the cool, deep shades of the forest. A flock of chattering parquets fluttered above us, and strange fruits and flowers appeared on every side. We had not gone far before we perceived a strange odor of musk, and directly we heard a heavy plunge in the water. We stopped short and listened; but one of the urchins waved his hand contemptuously, and ejaculated "Lagartos!" And sure enough, glancing among the bushes, we saw an enormous alligator leisurely propelling himself through the water! The neighborhood of such gentry was scarcely to our liking, and the urchins, keen enough in observation, noticed our surprise. It only required a suggestion from one of them—a naked little ebony rascal in advance, who looked suspiciously around at the same time—that there were many snakes about, to induce us to turn back, and defer our walk in the woods until another day.

At the time of which I write, the town of San Juan consisted of some fifty or sixty dwellings of the rudest and most primitive construction, scarcely making an approach to what, in the United States, would be called respectable out-houses. They were, in fact, mere palm-thatched sheds, roughly boarded up, or made of a kind of wicker-work of canes, in some cases plastered over with mud. The furniture, consisting of a hammock, a high table, a few chairs, and a hide bed, was in entire keeping with the dwellings. Yet, mean and uninviting as were these structures, they answered a tolerable purpose in a climate where any thing beyond a roof to keep off the rain and sun may almost be regarded as a superfluity. The heavy thatch of palm leaves or long grass is an effectual protection against these; and though it affords excellent quarters for scorpions, serpents, rats, and other pleasant colonists, yet under the tropics these soon cease to excite apprehension, and, with mice and cockroaches, sink into commonplaces.

The population of San Juan did not exceed three hundred. Besides what might be called the native inhabitants—who had the same characteristics in language, habits, and customs with the lower classes of the interior of Nicaragua—there were a few foreigners and some creoles of pure stock, who resided there as agents or consignees of mercantile houses. The population, therefore, exhibited every variety of race and complexion—whites, Indians, mestizos, negroes, and sambos—black, brown, yellow, foul, and fair—all mingled together in utter disregard of the conventionalities founded on color.

There was neither church nor school-house in San Juan, nor indeed in the whole "Mosquito Kingdom;" although the English Church had been formally proclaimed as the established religion of the monarchy! Previously to the English seizure, the place had been a curacy dependent on the dioceses of Nicaragua; but afterward the "xopilate" (turkey-buzzards), as the black-robed priests were irreverently called, were rarely seen.

While making arrangements for ascending the river, we took up our quarters in a kind of store-house, used as a depository for the hides, indigo, and tobacco which came down from the interior. Here we swung hammocks, and made ourselves as comfortable as circumstances would admit. The first night on shore passed pleasantly, interrupted only by various droppings from the roof, which the active fancies of my companions converted into scorpions and other noxious insects.

We dined regularly with "H. B. M.'s Consul-General," who, as I have intimated, was invested "with full and all manner of power and authority" to administer the government of the port. The Nicaraguans at the castillo on the river, it was alleged, had cut off all supplies from that direction, with a view of starving out their enemies; and, as a consequence, provisions in San Juan were as limited in quantity as poor in quality.

The people of the place, it is true, had divers pigs and chickens; but, animated by the same kind of hostility with their countrymen above, they flatly refused to sell to the new authorities, who were reduced to salt junk and ship biscuit, with a very scant supply of vegetables. In this emergency, "H. B. M.'s Consul-General" hit upon a happy expedient. He promulgated an order declaring that public decency and comfort required that all the pigs and chickens of the place should no longer roam at large, but be "securely cooped and penned," under penalty of being shot and confiscated by Her Majesty's servants. But as the pigs and poultry had always enjoyed unrestrained freedom, and, furthermore, as there were neither coops nor pens, it followed that this wholesome regulation could be but partially complied with. It became, therefore, the "unpleasant duty" of the police to enforce the law—which they did in a very discreet and proper manner, never shooting more vagrant pigs and chickens than were necessary for the day's consumption at the Consulate. In this wise the laws were vindicated, and the larder of the Consul replenished.

The town of San Juan is situated on the southern side of the harbor, which is separated from the sea by a low sandy strip of land, called Point Arenas. Here the Spaniards erected their defenses for the protection of the port, the ruins of which can still be traced. We visited the Point, a day or two after our arrival, and found encamped there a few families of the Mosquito Indians, who had come down the coast to strike turtle, the shell of which constitutes about their only article of commerce. They were the most squalid wretches imaginable. Their huts consisted of a few poles set in a slanting direction, upon which was thrown a quantity of palm leaves. The sides were open, and altogether each structure must have cost fifteen minutes' labor. Under these rude shelters were crowded a number of half-naked figures, begrimed with dirt, their faces void of expression, and altogether brutish. They were engaged in eating, and only stared at us vacantly when we spoke to them. Their food was the flesh of the alligator and manatee, which had been chopped in large pieces, and then thrown into the fire until the outer portions were completely charred. These they devoured without salt, and with a wolfish greediness disgusting to behold. At a little distance, away from the filth and stench, the huts, with the groups beneath and around them, were really picturesque objects.

Leaving these poor creatures, our boatmen paddled our canoe into the winding channels of the many-mouthed San Juan, studded with numerous low islands, on which, in cool, leafy arbors, we saw many thatched huts, surrounded by bare, hard ground, flecked with the sunlight, which danced in mazes as the wind waved the branches above. Around them were dark naked figures, and before them light canoes drawn close to the bank, filling out the foreground of pictures such as we had imagined in reading the quaint recitals of the early voyagers. Their effects were heightened by the parrots and macaws which fluttered their bright wings on the roofs of the huts, and deafened the spectator with their shrill voices. Occasionally a tame monkey was seen swinging by his tail from the branches of the trees, and making grimaces at us as we passed.

The habits of the natives were unchanged in the space of three hundred years; the scenes we gazed upon were the counterparts of those which Columbus himself had witnessed when he coasted along these shores. Eternal summer reigned here; the wants of the people were few and simple, and Nature supplied them profusely with all the necessities of existence. They little thought, these dwellers in rude cabins, that the strangers gliding silently before them were there to prepare the way for the clanging steamer and the advent of daring, perhaps unscrupulous enterprise, which should dissolve the spell that had rested upon these slumbering shores for uncounted centuries. They little dreamed that the great world was meditating the Titanic enterprise of laying open their primeval solitudes, grading down their hills, and opening a canal from one great ocean to the other, over which the navies of the world might pass, laden with the treasures of two hemispheres!

Such was San Juan in 1849. Four years later, on a sunny afternoon in February, the writer again approached the shores of Central America, and again entered the harbor of San Juan. This time, however, a crowded California steamer had replaced the little brig, and we steered boldly into the bay which it had before taken a day of coquetry with the fickle winds to enter. The same low shore, with its monotonous forest, the same good-natured porpoises, and the same heavy pulsations of the Caribbean Sea; but the port itself, how changed! The British Mail-steamer was anchored in the middle of the harbor, surrounded by a number of trading vessels; while close to the eastern shore lay a steamer from New Orleans, densely crowded with passengers, who hailed us with cheers. They had been here two days, sweltering in the hot sun, awaiting our arrival, and the consequent dispatch of the river steamers of the Transit. Point Arenas—where the squalid Mosquito Indians had built their rude huts four years before—was now covered with huge sheds, the workshops of the Company holding the monopoly of transit, and the houses of its officers and workmen. They were rough, rickety structures, raised on the bare sand; for their builders had foolishly cut away the bushes that had protected the Point from the abrasion of the sea, which now encroached upon the peninsula, and even broke over it into the harbor, when the wind was strong from the eastward. There were a few small, dingy steamers, roughly put together at the outset, and roughly treated afterward, strongly resembling the lower order of plebeian steam-tugs in our harbors, innocent of paint, with chimneys variegated with rust, and awnings flapping in tatters like the cloak of an Italian beggar. Two of these—each with a big wheel at the stern, suggestive of overgrown wheel-barrows, were moored to the shore. An old hulk run aground to serve as a receptacle for coal, and the rough skeleton of a new boat designed for the river, with a few workmen pounding lazily at its ribs; a frame-building set up on posts, and leaning heavily to one side, within which we caught the gleaming of a great variety of bottles; a quantity of lumber heaped confusedly on the sand, and a rude attempt at a forge—these only need be mentioned to complete an inventory of the "improvements" at Point Arenas. The water on this-side of the harbor is deep, and we came to anchor close inshore, and directly in front of the heterogeneous establishment which I have described.

Shortly after a boat came alongside, bringing the agent of the Transit, who puffed up the sides, and with an exceedingly red face began an incoherent denunciation of the people and government of San Juan, who were characterized in terms more forcible than elegant. From what we could gather, it seemed that a mortal feud had arisen between the Company and the town, in consequence of the former refusing to land its passengers on the inhabited side of the harbor; thereby depriving the people of the profits which might otherwise accrue to them, and diverting the same into the hands of the Company's favorites and officers. The efforts of the people were consequently directed to procure a transfer of the establishment at Point Arenas to the town; and to this end they required of the Company a rigid compliance with the terms of the concession which they had made to it, and which only contemplated the occupation of the Point as a coal dépôt. The concession furthermore rigidly defined the area which could be used for this purpose. The terms of the concession, it was alleged, having been violated, a judgment against the Company was obtained in the local court, and a process of ejectment served upon its officers. In opposing this suit the agent of the Company had indulged in the largest liberty of speech, and had withal made sundry threats of a personal nature, in consequence of which he had been arrested and compelled to give bonds for his good behavior. This was the origin of the troubles which have since brought the affairs of San Juan so conspicuously before the public.

While the passengers were listening to the angry complaints of the agent, a little boat came alongside, bringing a gentleman quite fantastically tricked out with gilt buttons and gold cord, who came up the side with a gravity appropriate to high official station. He was the Health Officer of the port, and seemed adequately impressed with the dignity and responsibility of his duties. We were a little surprised to find that he was an American!

The feud between the Company and the town had reached such a height that the passengers were kept close prisoners on board the steamers, the officers practically interdicting all communication with the shore, by prohibiting boats from coming alongside. The passengers complained much of this piece of annoyance, especially as the boats which were to take them up the river had not yet come down; but there was no redress. My own party, however, were too old travelers to submit to freaks of this kind, and, hailing a passing boat, in spite of interdict and impertinent subordinates, went on shore.

I have spoken of the change which four years had wrought at Point Arenas; but the transformation on the other side of the harbor was equally great. The thatched huts, which had constituted the old town of San Juan, had disappeared, or were lost in the shadow of the new and more imposing structures which had sprung up. The forest had receded on all sides, and streets, regularly laid out, had superseded the narrow paths which we had threaded on our previous visit. There were no recognizable features left. Where "H. B. M.'s" hospitable

KING STREET, SAN JUAN, LOOKING NORTHWARD, 1853.

Consul-General had entertained us on confiscated pigs and chickens, stood a building of substantial aspect, above which waved the flag of the British Consulate. Near by was a gaunt edifice of pine boards, framed in the United States, and brought out bodily, as it were—a huge tinder-box of two stories, and labeled “St. CHARLES HOTEL.” Within was a bar and rows of bottles, and plenty of people in check-shirts and straw-hats, with quick, intelligent eyes, ready of speech and swift in action. To the northward, where previously the forest had been densest, a broad avenue, called King Street, presented a perspective of houses of considerable pretensions. Among them was a hotel of large size and good construction, with colonnade and balconies, which would have reflected credit upon any country-town in the United States. Here we established ourselves, in quarters which had all the conveniences and many of the elegancies of civilization.

If the physical changes in San Juan surprised, the political and moral changes astonished us. The authority of “H. B. M.’s Consul-General” had departed, and the place, pending the negotiations concerning it between the United States and Great Britain, had become a de facto independent and sovereign municipality. The opening of the Nicaraguan route of transit had directed thither a full tide of American enterprise, and the American element soon began to predominate in all of its affairs. And when the public convenience and safety came to require a more stringent police and a better local administration, the people got together in their sovereign capacity and adopted a constitution, under which a complete political organization was effected. The American interest, powerful at the first, acquired entire predominance at the second election; and at the time of our visit the government was wholly in American hands. Its trade had taken the same direction, and in its entire aspect it bore the appearance of a new town in the West. There were, nevertheless, many indications of a premature decline, which the people ascribed to the policy of the Transit Company, in cutting off the town from the direct and incidental benefits of the California travel. They were much exasperated against the Company, and loud in expressing their determination to require a rigid fulfillment of the terms under which they had permitted the Company to occupy Point Arenas. Their action, however, had been kept within strictly legal limits, and there is no reason for believing that it would ever have exceeded them.

And here I may be allowed to observe that the charges of disorder and irregularity which have lately been made against the people of San Juan, in terms not fit to be repeated, are both reckless and untrue. Whatever may be said in support or condemnation of the recent occurrences which have called out these expressions, nothing is to be gained to the cause of justice by libels upon a body of men, who, surrounded by conditions the most anomalous and discouraging, organized an effective municipal government, under which justice was regularly and faithfully administered, and order scrupulously maintained. With the first rush of transit, San Juan became the resort of many desperate characters from all parts of the world, but the earliest acts of the government were directed to their extirpation. One or two notorious robbers were apprehended and hung out of hand; the gamblers and other harpies who had flocked there to prey on unsuspecting Californians were summarily ejected from the place, with emphatic assurances of being whipped and branded if they attempted to return. From that time forward, San Juan was a model of quiet, and nowhere in the world were life and property more secure.

The water in the river was low, and the little river steamers, crowded to suffocation, on which it was difficult to find even standing room, frequently got aground, involving not only detention and discomfort, but hunger and dangerous exposure to the night dews and the rains. In conjunction with other circumstances, these considerations induced our party to ascend the San Juan in a boat of our own. The first time I went up, was in a native bongo from the interior; now we embarked in a trim launch, built in the United States, and regularly furnished with awnings and other civilized appliances for keeping off the sun and rain. Our boatmen, however, were little changed from my first visit, except that they were more serious, never sang, and seldom said their prayers. The subordination which the swarthy inferior races must always yield to the white man, had already become established.

The morning of the first of March was fixed for our departure, but it was afternoon before we had fairly embarked. Half an hour afterward we had entered the river, which for some miles has low banks, covered with long grass, and studded with numerous islands barely rising above the stream, and in the rainy season frequently covered by the water. The whole country around is low, and generally marshy, traversed by creeks, which here and there spread out and form lagoons, which are the resorts of myriads of water birds.

At the distance of five or six miles above San Juan the banks of the river become higher, and are covered with a dense growth of feathery palms, which nod like plumes over the water. Here our oarsmen, in accordance with immemorial custom, hauled in to the bank to cook their evening meal, a very simple, but very protracted operation. There was no variation from what I had witnessed before. Stakes are driven into the ground to support a kettle in which a layer of meat is put, next a layer of peeled green plantains, another layer of beef, a calabash of rice, some salt, and over all sufficient water to fill the kettle. The contents are then thoroughly boiled. While this is going on, the men amuse themselves in roasting bits of meat on the ends of pointed sticks. Nothing can be wilder or more picturesque than a group of naked swarthy figures crouched around the fire, in the deep shadow of the forest, protecting their faces from the heat with their hands, and keeping up the while a most vociferous discussion on some topic interesting only to themselves.

It was nearly sunset when the meal was finished. The boat was pushed out in the stream, and we were once more on our way. Sweeping now under the shadows of the trees on the shore, and anon over the broad glassy reaches where the light was reflected on the water, it was long after night when we came to anchor in the middle of a broad bend in the river, as far as possible away from the shore to avoid the mosquitoes. Six passengers, with boxes, bags, trunks, instruments, and provisions, in addition to as many oarsmen and their stores, did not leave much room in our boat for comfortable sleeping at night. It took an hour of experiment to adjust bodies and limbs so as to afford to each one some faint chance of securing slumber; but, after all, the night passed restlessly. Every body complained of cramp from long confinement in constrained positions; and none, I fear, properly appreciated the scenery, doubly beautiful in the early morning. We had reached the point of divergence of the Colorado mouth of the river, where the banks became still higher, and tall trees, draped all over with vines, began to appear towering over the graceful palms. Birds of varied plumage glanced in and out of the forest; cranes and other water-fowl paced soberly along the sand-bars, or flew lazily up the stream as we approached. Occasionally a pair of green macaws fluttered slowly over our heads, almost deafening us with their discordant notes. Mists lurked here and there in the bends of the river and in shadowy nooks; but as the sun arose they gradually dispersed. At eight o'clock the boat was moored under the shadow of a gigantic tree; and soon the fire blazed on the shore, and we forgot, in the grateful odor of our steaming coffee, the discomforts of the night.

The government of San Juan, in default of any other, had extended its jurisdiction far up the river, and its people had made establishments at various points on its banks. About noon we came to a large island, which an enterprising settler had cleared of forest and stocked with plantains, yucas, and other necessities of life. He had erected a neat house, and settled there permanently with his family. The transformation which four years had wrought at the port did not impress me as forcibly as this outpost in the wilderness. Enterprise and industry must always command respect; but when we witness their development under such circumstances, they exact the language of admiration. We could not resist the impulse to stop and congratulate our countryman on his success. We found him, true to the example of his native land, busily occupied with his crops. He felt an honest pride in showing us his improvements, and explaining his plans for the future; and we left him with a conviction that the seeds of civilization sown by such hands must ultimately spring up to the advancement and the glory of humanity.

The day following, after a night of rain, from which our awning failed wholly to protect us, damp and not in the best of tempers, we reached the point where the Nicaraguans had fortified themselves in their final encounter with the English in 1848, at the junction of the river Serapiquí with the San Juan. Here, too, civilization had taken root. An enterprising German, naturalized in the United States, had made extensive clearings on both banks of the river, and, like his neighbor (only twenty miles below), had started a flourishing plantation. It was yet in its infancy, but gave high promise for the future.

HIPPI'S.

Here we received a cordial welcome, and stopped for dinner. Our friend Hipp, unfortunately, was a bachelor, and had to do his own cooking. But, what with our supplies and his own, we made a dinner that day which a lord might envy. Our dining-hall, it is true, was built of poles and covered with thatch, and the floor was made of the split stems of the palm, while our table consisted of two stray planks placed side by side; but we had what was better than all, cheerfulness and an appetite.

I experienced a feeling almost of triumph in witnessing the enterprise which was thus reclaiming the wilderness. When I first passed up the river, I had contemplated the advent of the ax-bearing pioneer of civilization as an inevitable event, but one which I could hardly hope to witness. A few years only had elapsed, and lo! the hero of Industry was here, and the rich earth, in generous recompense for his toil, gave back a thousand-fold the seed which he had sown in her genial bosom.

Our friend Hipp, even in his isolation, was not entirely exempt from troubles. Before planting his household altars too firmly, he wished to be assured of the titles to his property, and he sought my advice on the subject. In the existing anomalous condition of the country, he was at a loss to know if his lands fell within the jurisdiction of the "King of Mosquito," of the town of San Juan, or the Republic of Nicaragua. To be on the safe side, however, he had made distinct application to each for his titles, and lest, even with these precautions, he might—as he expressed it—"slip up," he had made a second clearing, and put in crops, on the opposite shore of the river, over which Costa Rica of late years had set up a claim of sovereignty. A few months afterward, a couple of Frenchmen arrived at the mouth of the Serapiqui, and attempted to occupy the clearing which Hipp had made on that side of the river, under authority of an alleged grant from Costa Rica; whereupon our friend denied the pretensions of the latter state, and, constituting himself the supreme law, summarily ejected the Gauls, who were glad to escape to San Juan with no greater damage than black eyes and bloody noses.

When we left Hipp's landing in the afternoon, he ran up the American flag, and we gave him three hearty cheers of encouragement. I presume he is still there, but not alone, unless the letter which he quietly slipped in my hand at the moment of departure, for a dark-eyed damsel in Grenada, failed of its object—a supposition which I should be sorry to entertain.

Our progress from Hipp's, until we reached the rapids of Machuca, was unrelieved by any thing worth recording. Here we found an establishment for cutting wood for the steamers, which gave promise of settling down into something more permanent. Upon the Rapids were the wrecks of several steamers, among them that of the "Orus," the first steamer I believe that entered the Chagres river, and which was lost in her first attempt to ascend the San Juan. There were a couple other wrecks, and the boat which had left San Juan a few days before us was jammed immovably on the rocks. Here too we encountered numerous native boats, packed with passengers, who were descending the river, without covering, and literally without food, in consequence of an accident to another of the Transit steamers at the rapids of the Castillo.

The river San Juan is utterly unfit for steamer navigation, nor can it ever be made to serve a useful purpose in this respect, except at great labor and expense.

The afternoon of the same day we reached the rapids of the Castillo, so called from the old fort of San Juan, now called "El Castillo Viejo." This fort was taken by the English in 1780, under the command of Captain, afterward Lord Nelson, the naval hero of Great Britain. It was here that he distinguished himself for the first time.

The fort is situated on a considerable hill, with abrupt slopes, precisely at the point where a ledge of rock extending across the river forms a rapid, or rather falls, which it is extremely difficult for boats of any description to pass. Even the cargoes of the native bongos, if heavy, require to be taken out, and the boats themselves tracked up by sheer force. Shortly before our arrival one of the steamers of the Company had been swept over by the current, and many passengers drowned.

In 1849 a solitary hut existed at the Castillo, in which the government of Nicaragua maintained a small guard for the purpose of assisting the boatmen in loading and unloading their bongos. It was now a place of a couple of hundred inhabitants. A wharf had been built below the falls, from which a piece of railway had been constructed for the transportation of passengers past the portage; and there were a dozen well-built frame houses, besides numerous structures of lesser pretensions. A garrison had been stationed in the old fort, and altogether a transformation effected which, considering the time it had taken, could probably not be paralleled out of that region of Aladdin-like changes—California.

The Castillo was the lowest point on the river where Nicaragua exercised authority. Below, the people of San Juan assumed a pro tempore jurisdiction, pending the settlement of the so-called "Mosquito question." At this point, then—as I write only of San Juan—my narrative, for the present at least, must come to a close.

In the foregoing pages, I have presented a picture of San Juan in 1849, when it was an obscure village, under the petty despotism of an irresponsible foreign agent, holding his post by the simple title of force. I have described it again in 1853, when it was a comparatively large and flourishing town, under a municipal organization springing from the only source of legitimate power, the people themselves. This government arrogated nothing to itself except the preservation of order and the protection of the interests of its citizens. Upon the question of ultimate sovereignty, and the abstract question of territorial right, opinions differed, although a large preponderance of the American population recognized the clear and indubitable rights of Nicaragua. In the settlement of these questions the residents of San Juan could have but little to say; their sole alternative was to abide the course of events, and conform to what they could not control. Meantime, the necessity of a government of some sort was comprehended by all parties, and both England and the United States instructed their officers to recognize the de facto authorities. These instructions were scrupulously observed up to 1854, when those authorities were violently resisted in their attempts to investigate a case of alleged homicide committed within their recognized provisional jurisdiction.

The complications arising out of this event, led to the bombardment and entire destruction of San Juan, by the United States ship of war Cyane, in the month of June of the present year. Whatever may be the political result of this measure—if it shall lead to the restitution of San Juan to Nicaragua, its legitimate owner, or to the re-assertion and consolidation of British pretensions, remains for the future to disclose. Meanwhile San Juan is rising from its ashes, and the same enterprise which redeemed it from the listless apathy of three hundred years, will work out for it the destiny indicated by the importance of its geographical position, on one of the great highways of nations.

THE NEWCOMES.*

MEMOIRS OF A MOST RESPECTABLE FAMILY.

BY W. M. THACKERAY.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

AMONG THE PAINTERS.

WHEN Clive Newcome comes to be old, no doubt he will remember his Roman days as among the happiest which fate ever awarded him. The simplicity of the student's life there, the greatness and friendly splendor of the scenes surrounding him, the delightful nature of the occupation in which he is engaged, the pleasant company of comrades, inspired by a like pleasure over a similar calling, the labor, the meditation, the holiday and the kindly feast afterward, should make the Art-students the happiest of youth, did they but know their good fortune. Their work is for the most part delightfully easy. It does not exercise the brain too much, but gently occupies it, and with a subject most agreeable to the scholar. The mere poetic flame, or jet of invention, needs to be lighted up but very seldom, namely, when the young painter is devising his subject, or settling the composition thereof. The posing of figures and drapery; the dexterous copying of the line; the artful processes of cross-hatching, of stumping, of laying on lights, and what not; the arrangement of color, and the pleasing operations of glazing and the like, are labors for the most part merely manual. These, with the smoking of a proper number of pipes, carry the student through his day's work. If you pass his door you will very probably hear him singing at his easel. I should like to know what young lawyer, mathematician, or divinity scholar, can sing over his volumes, and at the same time advance with his labor? In every city where Art is practiced there are old gentlemen who never touched a pencil in their lives, but find the occupation and company of artists so agreeable that they are never out of the studios; follow one generation of painters after another; sit by with perfect contentment while Jack is drawing his pifferaro, or Tom designing his cartoon, and years afterward when Jack is established in Newman Street, and Tom a Royal Academician, shall still be found in their rooms, occupied now by fresh painters and pictures, telling the youngsters, their successors, what glorious fellows Jack and Tom were. A poet must retire to privy places and meditate his rhymes in secret; a painter can practice his trade in the company of friends. Your splendid chef d'école, a Rubens or a Horace Vernet, may sit with a secretary reading to him; a troop of admiring scholars watching the master's hand; or a company of court ladies and gentlemen (to whom he addresses a few kind words now and again), looking on admiringly; while the humblest painter, be he ever so poor, may have a friend watching at his easel, or a gentle wife sitting by with her work in her lap, and with fond smiles or talk or silence, cheering his labor.

Among all ranks and degrees of painters assembled at Rome, Mr. Clive found companions and friends. The cleverest man was not the best artist very often: the ablest artist not the best critic nor the best companion. Many a man could give no account of the faculty within him, but achieved success because he could not help it; and did, in an hour and without effort, that which another could not effect with half a life's labor. There were young sculptors who had never read a line of Homer, who took on themselves nevertheless to interpret and continue the heroic Greek art. There were young painters with the strongest natural taste for low humor, comic singing, and Cider-Cellar jollifications, who would imitate nothing under Michael Angelo, and whose canvases teemed with tremendous allegories of fates, furies, genii of death and battle. There were long-haired lads who fancied the sublime lay in the Peruginesque manner, and depicted saintly personages with crisp draperies, crude colors, and haloes of gold-leaf. Our friend marked all these practitioners of Art with their various oddities and tastes, and was welcomed in the ateliers of all of them, from the grave dons and seniors, the senators of the French and English Academy, down to the jovial students who rallied at the elders over their cheap cups at the Lepre. What a gallant, starving, generous, kindly life, many of them led! What fun in their grotesque airs, what friendship and gentleness in their poverty! How splendidly Carlo talked of the marquis his cousin, and the duke his intimate friend! How great Federigo was on the subject of his wrongs, from the Academy at home, a pack of tradesmen who could not understand high art, and who had never seen a good picture! With what haughtiness Augusto swaggered about at Sir John's soirées, though he was known to have borrowed Fernando's coat, and Luigi's dress-boots! If one or the other was ill, how nobly and generously his companions flocked to comfort him, took turns to nurse the sick man through nights of fever, contributed out of their slender means to help him through his difficulty. Max, who loves fine dresses and the carnival so, gave up a costume and a carriage so as to help Paul. Paul, when he sold his picture (through the agency of Pietro, with whom he had quarreled, and who recommended him to a patron), gave a third of the money back to Max, and took another third portion to Lazaro, with his poor wife and children, who had not got a single order all that winter—and so the story went on. I have heard Clive tell of two noble young Americans who came to Europe to study their art; of whom the one fell sick while the other supported his penniless comrade, and out of sixpence a day absolutely kept but a penny for himself, giving the rest to his sick companion. "I should like to have known that good Samaritan, Sir," our Colonel said, twirling his mustaches, when we saw him again, and his son told him that story.

J. J., in his steady silent way, worked on every day, and for many hours every day. When Clive entered their studio of a morning, he found J. J. there, and there he left him. When the Life Academy was over, at night, and Clive went out to his soirées, J. J. lighted his lamp and continued his happy labor. He did not care for the brawling supper-parties of his comrades; liked better to stay at home than to go into the world, and was seldom abroad of a night except during the illness of Luigi before mentioned, when J. J. spent constant evenings at the other's bed-side. J. J. was fortunate as well as skillful: people in the world took a liking to the modest young man, and he had more than one order for pictures. The Artists' Club, at the Lepre, set him down as close with his money; but a year after he left Rome, Lazaro and his wife, who still remained there, told a different tale. Clive Newcome, when he heard of their distress, gave them something—as much as he could spare; but J. J. gave more, and Clive was as eager in acknowledging and admiring his friend's generosity as he was in speaking of his genius. His was a fortunate organization indeed. Study was his chief amusement. Self-denial came easily to him. Pleasure, or what is generally called so, had little charm for him. His ordinary companions were pure and sweet thoughts; his out-door enjoyment the contemplation of natural beauty; for recreation, the hundred pleasant dexterities and manipulations of his craft were ceaselessly interesting to him: he would draw every knot in an oak panel, or every leaf in an orange-tree, smiling, and taking a gay delight over the simple feats of skill: whenever you found him he seemed watchful and serene, his modest virgin-lamp always lighted and trim. No gusts of passion extinguished it; no hopeless wandering in the darkness afterward led him astray. Wayfarers through the world, we meet now and again with such purity; and salute it, and hush while it passes on.

We have it under Clive Newcome's own signature, that he intended to pass a couple of years in Italy, devoting himself exclusively to the study of his profession. Other besides professional reasons were working secretly in the young man's mind, causing him to think that absence from England was the best cure for a malady under which he secretly labored. But change of air may cure some sick people more speedily than the sufferers ever hoped; and also it is on record, that young men with the very best intentions respecting study, do not fulfill them, and are led away from their scheme by accident, or pleasure, or necessity, or some good cause. Young Clive worked sedulously two or three months at his vocation at Rome, secretly devouring, no doubt, the pangs of sentimental disappointment under which he labored; and he drew from his models, and he sketched round about every thing that suited his pencil on both sides of Tiber; and he labored at the Life Academy of nights—a model himself to other young students. The symptoms of his sentimental malady began to abate. He took an interest in the affairs of Jack, and Tom, and Harry round about him: Art exercised its great healing influence on his wounded spirit, which to be sure had never given in. The meeting of the painters at the Café Greco, and at their private houses, was very jovial, pleasant, and lively. Clive smoked his pipe, drank his glass of Marsala, sang his song, and took part in the general chorus as gayly as the jolliest of the boys. He was the cock of the whole painting school, the favorite of all; and to be liked by the people, you may be pretty sure that we for our parts must like them.

Then, besides the painters, he had, as he has informed us, the other society of Rome. Every winter there is a gay and pleasant English colony in that capital, of course more or less remarkable for rank, fashion, and agreeability with every varying year. In Clive's year some very pleasant folks set up their winter quarters in the usual foreigners' resort round about the Piazza di Spagna. I was amused to find, lately, on looking over the travels of the respectable M. de Pöllnitz, that, a hundred and twenty years ago, the same quarter, the same streets and palaces, scarce changed from those days, were even then polite foreigners' resort. Of one or two of the gentlemen, Clive had made the acquaintance in the hunting-field; others he had met during his brief appearance in the London world. Being a youth of great personal agility, fitted thereby to the graceful performance of polkas, etc.; having good manners, and good looks, and good credit with Prince Polonia, or some other banker, Mr. Newcome was thus made very welcome to the Anglo-Roman society; and as kindly received in genteel houses, where they drank tea and danced the galop, as in those dusky taverns and retired lodgings where his bearded comrades, the painters, held their meetings.

Thrown together every day, and night after night; flocking to the same picture-galleries, statue-galleries, Pincian drives, and church functions, the English colonists at Rome perforce become intimate, and in many cases friendly. They have an English library where the various meets for the week are placarded: on such a day the Vatican galleries are open: the next is the feast of Saint so and so: on Wednesday there will be music and Vespers at the Sistine chapel: on Thursday, the Pope will bless the animals—sheep, horses, and what-not: and flocks of English accordingly rush to witness the benediction of droves of donkeys. In a word, the ancient city of the Cæsars, the august fane of the Popes, with their splendor and ceremony, are all mapped out and arranged for English diversion; and we run in a crowd to high-mass at St. Peter's, or to the illumination on Easter-day, as we run when the bell rings to the Bojesmen at Cremorne, or the fireworks at Vauxhall.

Running to see fireworks alone, rushing off to examine Bojesmen by one's self, is a dreary work: I should think very few men would have the courage to do it unattended, and personally would not prefer a pipe in their own rooms.

Hence if Clive went to see all these sights, as he did, it is to be concluded that he went in company, and if he went in company and sought it, we may suppose that little affair which annoyed him at Baden no longer tended to hurt his peace of mind very seriously. The truth is, our countrymen are pleasanter abroad than at home; most hospitable, kindly, and eager to be pleased and to please. You see a family half a dozen times in a week in the little Roman circle, whom you shall not meet twice in a season afterward in the enormous London round. When Easter is over and every body is going away at Rome, you and your neighbor shake hands, sincerely sorry to part: in London we are obliged to dilute our kindness so that there is hardly any smack of the original milk. As one by one the pleasant families dropped off with whom Clive had spent his happy winter; as Admiral Freeman's carriage drove away, whose pretty girls he had caught at St. Peter's kissing St. Peter's toe; as Dick Denby's family ark appeared with all Denby's sweet young children kissing farewells to him out of window; as those three charming Miss Baliols with whom he had that glorious day in the Catacombs; as friend after friend quitted the great city with kind greetings, warm pressures of the hand, and hopes of meeting in a yet greater city on the banks of the Thames, young Clive felt a depression of spirit. Rome was Rome, but it was pleasanter to see it in company; our painters are smoking still at the Café Greco, but a society all smoke and all painters did not suit him. If Mr. Clive is not a Michael Angelo or a Beethoven, if his genius is not gloomy, solitary, gigantic, shining alone, like a lighthouse, a storm round about him, and breakers dashing at his feet, I can not help myself; he is as heaven made him, brave, honest, gay, and friendly, and persons of a gloomy turn must not look to him as a hero.

So Clive and his companion worked away with all their hearts from November until far into April when Easter came, and the glorious gala with which the Roman church celebrates that holy season. By this time Clive's books were full of sketches. Ruins, imperial and mediæval; peasants and bagpipemen; Passionists with shaven polls; Capuchins and the equally bairy frequenters of the Café Greco; painters of all nations who resort there; Cardinals and their queer equipages and attendants; the Holy Father himself (it was Gregory sixteenth of the name); the dandified English on the Pincio and the wonderful Roman members of the hunt—were not all these designed by the young man and admired by his friends in after-days? J. J.'s sketches were few, but he had painted two beautiful little pictures, and sold them for so good a price that Prince Polonia's people were quite civil to him. He had orders for yet more pictures, and having worked very hard, thought himself authorized to accompany Mr. Clive upon a pleasure trip to Naples, which the latter deemed necessary after his own tremendous labors. He for his part had painted no pictures, though he had commenced a dozen and turned them to the wall; but he had sketched, and dined, and smoked, and danced, as we have seen. So the little britzka was put behind horses again, and our two friends set out on their tour, having quite a crowd of brother artists to cheer them, who had assembled and had a breakfast for the purpose at that comfortable osteria, near the Lateran Gate. How the fellows flung their hats up, and shouted, "Lebe wohl," and "Adieu," and "God bless you, old boy," in many languages! Clive was the young swell of the artists of that year, and adored by the whole of the jolly company. His sketches were pronounced on all hands to be admirable: it was agreed that if he chose he might do any thing.

So with promises of a speedy return they left behind them the noble city, which all love who once have seen it, and of which we think afterward ever with the kindness and the regard of home. They dashed across the Campagna and over the beautiful hills of Albano, and sped through the solemn Pontine Marshes, and stopped to roost at Terracina (which was not at all like Fra Diavolo's Terracina at Covent Garden, as J. J. was distressed to remark), and so, galloping onward through a hundred ancient cities that crumbled on the shores of the beautiful Mediterranean, behold, on the second day as they ascended a hill about noon, Vesuvius came in view, its great shape shimmering blue in the distant haze, its banner of smoke in the cloudless sky. And about five o'clock in the evening (as every body will who starts from Terracina early and pays the post-boy well), the travelers came to an ancient city walled and fortified, with drawbridges over the shining moats.

"Here is CAPUA," says J. J., and Clive burst out laughing: thinking of his Capua which he had left—how many months—years it seemed ago. From Capua to Naples is a fine straight road, and our travelers were landed at the latter place at supper-time; where, if they had quarters at the Vittoria Hotel, they were as comfortable as any gentlemen painters need wish to be in this world.

The aspect of the place was so charming and delightful to Clive: the beautiful sea stretched before his eyes when waking—Capri, a fairy island, in the distance, in the amethyst rocks of which Syrens might be playing—that fair line of cities skirting the shore glittering white along the purple water—over the whole brilliant scene Vesuvius rising with cloudlets playing round its summit, and the country bursting out into that glorious vegetation with which sumptuous nature decorates every spring—this city and scene of Naples were so much to Clive's liking that I have a letter from him dated a couple of days after the young man's arrival, in which he announces his intention of staying there forever, and gives me an invitation to some fine lodgings in a certain palazzo, on which he has cast his eye. He is so enraptured with the place, that he says to die and be buried there even would be quite a treat, so charming is the cemetery where the Neapolitan dead repose.

The Fates did not, however, ordain that Clive Newcome should pass all his life at Naples. His Roman banker presently forwarded a few letters to his address; some which had arrived after his departure, others which had been lying at the Poste Restante, with his name written in perfectly legible characters, but which the authorities of the post, according to their custom, would not see when Clive sent for them.

It was one of these letters which Clive clutched the most eagerly. It had been lying since October, actually, at the Roman post, though Clive had asked for letters there a hundred times. It was that little letter from Ethel, in reply to his own, whereof we have made mention in a previous chapter. There was not much in the little letter. Nothing, of course, that Virtue or Grandmamma might not read over the young writer's shoulder. It was affectionate, simple, rather melancholy; described in a few words Sir Brian's seizure and present condition; spoke of Lord Kew, who was mending rapidly, as if Clive, of course, was aware of his accident; of the children; of Clive's father; and ended with a hearty "God bless you," to Clive, from his sincere Ethel.

"You boast of its being over. You see it is not over," says Clive's monitor and companion. "Else, why should you have dashed at that letter before all the others, Clive?" J. J. had been watching, not without interest, Clive's blank face as he read the young lady's note.

"How do you know who wrote the letter?" asks Clive.

"I can read the signature in your face," says the other; "and I could almost tell the contents of the note. Why have you such a tell-tale face, Clive?"

"It is over; but when a man has once, you know, gone through an affair like that," says Clive, looking very grave, "he—he's anxious to hear of Alice Gray, and how she's getting on, you see, my good friend." And he began to shout out as of old—

"Her heart it is another's, she—never—can—be—mine," and to laugh at the end of the song. "Well, well," says he; "it is a very kind note, a very proper little note; the expressions is elegant, J. J., the sentiments is most correct. All the little t's is most properly crossed, and all the little i's have dots over their little heads. It's a sort of a prize note, don't you see; and one such as, in the old spelling-book story, the good boy received a plum-cake for writing. Perhaps you weren't educated on the old spelling-book, J. J.? My good old father taught me to read out of his—I say, I think it was a shame to keep the old boy waiting while I have been giving an audience to this young lady. "Dear old father!" and he apostrophized the letter. "I beg your pardon, Sir; Miss Newcome requested five minutes' conversation, and I was obliged, from politeness, you know, to receive,

There's nothing between us; nothing but what's most correct, upon my honor and conscience." And he kissed his father's letter, and calling out again "Dear old father!" proceeded to read as follows:

"Your letters, my dearest Clive, have been the greatest comfort to me. I seem to hear you as I read them. I can't but think that this, the modern and natural style, is a great progress upon the old-fashioned manner of my day, when we used to begin to our fathers, "Honored Father," or even "Honored Sir" some precisions use to write still from Mr. Lord's Academy, at Tooting, where I went before Gray Friars—though I suspect parents were no more honored in those days than nowadays. I know one who had rather be trusted than honored; and you may call me what you please, so as you do that.

"It is not only to me your letters give pleasure. Last week I took yours from Baden Baden, No. 3, September 15, into Calcutta, and could not help showing it at Government House, where I dined. Your sketch of the old Russian Princess and her little boy, gambling, was capital. Colonel Buckmaster, Lord Bagwig's private secretary, knew her, and says it is to a T. And I read out to some of my young fellows what you said about play, and how you had given it over. I very much fear some of the young rogues are at dice and brandy-pawnee before tiffin. What you say of young Ridley, I take cum grano. His sketches I thought very agreeable; but to compare them to a certain gentleman's—Never mind, I shall not try to make him think too well of himself. I kissed dear Ethel's hand in your letter. I write her a long letter by this mail.

"If Paul de Florac in any way resembles his mother, between you and him there ought to be a very warm regard. I knew her when I was a boy, long before you were born or thought of; and in wandering forty years through the world since, I have seen no woman in my eyes so good or so beautiful. Your cousin Ethel reminded me of her; as handsome, but not so lovely. Yes; it was that pale lady you saw at Paris, with eyes full of care, and hair streaked with gray. So it will be the turn of you young folks, come eight more lustres, and your heads will be bald like mine, or gray like Madame de Florac's, and bending over the ground where we are lying in quiet. I understand from you that young Paul is not in very flourishing circumstances. If he still is in need, mind and be his banker, and I will be yours. Any child of hers must never want when I have a spare guinea. I do not mind telling you, Sir, that I cared for her more than millions of guineas once; and half broke my heart about her when I went to India, as a young chap. So, if any such misfortunes happen to you, consider, my boy, you are not the only one.

"Binnie writes me word that he has been ailing. I hope you are a good correspondent with him. What made me turn to him just after speaking of unlucky love affairs? Could I be thinking about little Rosey Mackenzie? She is a sweet little lass, and James will leave her a pretty piece of money. Verbum sap. I should like you to marry; but God forbid you should marry for a million of gold mohurs.

"And gold mohurs bring me to another subject. Do you know, I narrowly missed losing half a lakh of rupees which I had at an agent's here? And who do you think warned me about him? Our friend Rummun Lal, who has lately been in England, and with whom I made the voyage from Southampton. He is a man of wonderful tact and observation. I used to think meanly of the honesty of natives, and treat them my friends are longing to have a finger in it; but be sure of this, I shall do nothing rashly and without the very best advice.

"I have not been frightened yet by your drafts upon me. Draw as many of these as you please. You know I don't half like the other kind of drawing, except as a délassement: but if you chose to be a weaver, like my grandfather, I should not say you nay. Don't stint yourself of money or of honest pleasure. Of what good is money, unless we can make those we love happy with it? There would be no need for me to save, if you were to save too. So, and as you know as well as I what our means are, in every honest way use them. I should like you not to pass the whole of next year in Italy, but to come home and pay a visit to honest James Binnie. I wonder how the old barrack in Fitzroy Square looks without me? Try and go round by Paris on your way home, and pay your visit, and carry your father's fond remembrances to Madame la Comtesse de Florac. I don't say remember me to my brother, as I write Brian by this mail. Adieu mon fils! je t'embrasse! and am always my Clive's affectionate father, T. N."

"Isn't he a noble old trump?" That point had been settled by the young men any time these three years. And now Mr. J. J. remarked that when Clive had read his father's letter once, then he read Ethel's over again, and put it in his breast-pocket, and was very disturbed in mind that day, pishing and pshawing at the statue gallery which they went to see at the Museo.

"After all," says Clive, "what rubbish these second-rate statues are! what a great hulking abortion is this brute of a Farnese Hercules! There's only one bit in the whole gallery that is worth a twopenny piece."

It was the beautiful fragment called Psyche. J. J. smiled as his comrade spoke in admiration of this statue—in the slim shape, in the delicate formation of the neck, in the haughty virginal expression, the Psyche is not unlike the Diana of the Louvre—and the Diana of the Louvre we have said was like a certain young lady.

"After all," continues Clive, looking up at the great knotted legs of that clumsy caricatured porter—Glykon the Athenian sculptured in bad times of art surely, "she could not write otherwise than she did—don't you see? Her letter is quite kind and affectionate. You see she says she shall always hear of me with pleasure: hopes I'll come back soon, and bring some good pictures with me, since pictures I will do. She thinks small beer of painters, J. J.—well, we don't think small beer of ourselves, my haughtily, as I recollect doing this very gentleman at your uncle Newcome's, in Bryanstone Square. He heaped coals of fire on my head by saving my money for me; and I have placed it at interest in his house. If I would but listen to him, my capital might be trebled in a year, he says, and the interest immensely increased. He enjoys the greatest esteem among the moneyed men here; keeps a splendid establishment and house here, in Barrackpore; is princely in his benefactions. He talks to me about the establishment of a bank, of which the profits are so enormous and the scheme so (seemingly) clear, that I don't know whether I mayn't be tempted to take a few shares. Nous verrons. Several of noble friend. I—I suppose it must be over by this time, and I may write to her as the Countess of Kew." The custode of the apartment had seen admiration and wonder expressed by hundreds of visitors to his marble Giant; but he had never known Hercules occasion emotion before, as in the case of the young stranger, who, after staring a while at the statue, dashed his hand across his forehead with a groan, and walked away from before the graven image of the huge Strongman, who had himself been made such a fool by women.

"My father wants me to go and see James and Madame de Florac," says Clive, as they stride down the street to the Toledo.

J. J. puts his arm through his companion's, which is deep in the pocket of his velvet paletot. "You must not go home till you hear it is over, Clive," whispers J. J.

"Of course not, old boy," says the other, blowing tobacco out of his shaking head.

Not very long after their arrival, we may be sure they went to Pompeii, of which place, as this is not an Italian tour, but a history of Clive Newcome, Esquire, and his most respectable family, we shall offer to give no description. The young man had read Sir Bulwer Lytton's delightful story, which has become the history of Pompeii, before they came thither, and Pliny's description, apud the Guide Book. Admiring the wonderful ingenuity with which the English writer had illustrated the place by his text, as if the houses were so many pictures to which he had appended a story, Clive, the wag, who was always indulging his vein for caricature, was proposing that they should take the same place, names, people, and make a burlesque story: "What would be a better figure," says he, "than Pliny's mother, whom the historian describes as exceedingly corpulent, and walking away from the catastrophe with slaves holding cushions behind her, to shield her plump person from the cinders! Yes, old Mrs. Pliny shall be my heroine!" says Clive. A picture of her on a dark gray paper, and touched up with red at the extremities, exists in Clive's album to the present day.

As they were laughing, rattling, wondering, mimicking, the cicerone attending them with his nasal twaddle, anon pausing and silent, yielding to the melancholy pity and wonder which the aspect of that strange sad smiling lonely place inspires; behold they come upon another party of English, two young men accompanying a lady.

"What, Clive!" cries one.

"My dear, dear Lord Kew!" shouts the other; and as each young man rushes up and grasps the two hands of the other, they both begin to blush. . . .

Lord Kew and his family resided in a neighboring hotel on the Chiafa at Naples, and that very evening on returning from the Pompeian excursion, the two painters were invited to take tea by those friendly persons. J. J. excused himself, and sate at home drawing all night. Clive went, and passed a pleasant evening; in which all sorts of future tours and pleasure-parties were projected by the young men. They were to visit Pæstum, Capri, Sicily; why not Malta and the East? asked Lord Kew.

Lady Walham was alarmed. Had not Kew been in the East already? Clive was surprised and agitated too. Could Kew think of going to the East, and making long journeys, when he had—he had other engagements that would necessitate his return home? No, he must not go to the East; Lord Kew's mother avowed, Kew had promised to stay with her during the summer at Castellammare, and Mr. Newcome must come and paint their portraits there—all their portraits. She would like to have an entire picture-gallery of Kews, if her son would remain at home during the sittings.

At an early hour Lady Walham retired to rest, exacting Clive's promise to come to Castellammare; and George Barnes disappeared to array himself in an evening costume, and to pay his round of visits as became a young diplomatist. This part of diplomatic duty does not commence until after the opera at Naples; and society begins when the rest of the world has gone to bed.

Kew and Clive sate till one o'clock in the morning, when the latter returned to his hotel. Not one of those fine parties at Pæstum, Sicily, etc., were carried out. Clive did not go to the East at all, and it was J. J. who painted Lord Kew's portrait that summer, at Castellammare. The next day Clive went for his passport to the embassy; and a steamer departing direct for Marseilles on that very afternoon, behold Mr. Newcome was on board of her; Lord Kew and his brother and J. J. waving their hats to him as the vessel left the shore.

Away went the ship, cleaving swiftly through the azure waters; but not swiftly enough for Clive. J. J. went back with a sigh to his sketch-book and easels. I suppose the other young disciple of Art had heard something which caused him to forsake his sublime mistress, for one who was much more capricious and earthly.

CHAPTER XL.

RETURNS FROM ROME TO PALL MALL.

ONE morning in the month of July, when there was actually sunshine in Lamb Court, and the two gentlemen who occupied the third floor chambers there in partnership, were engaged, as their custom was, over their pipes, their manuscripts, and their "Times" newspaper, behold a fresh sunshine burst into their room in the person of young Clive, with a bronzed face, and a yellow beard and mustaches, and those bright cheerful eyes, the sight of which was always so welcome to both of us. "What, Clive! What, the young one! What, Benjamin!" shout Penderennis and Warrington. Clive had obtained a very high place indeed in the latter's affections; so much so, that if I could have found it in my heart to be jealous of such a generous brave fellow, I might have grudged him his share of Warrington's regard. He blushed up with pleasure to see us again. Pidgeon, our boy, introduced him with a jubilant countenance; and Flanagan, the laundress, came smirking out of the bed-room, eager to get a nod of recognition from him, and bestow a smile of welcome upon every body's favorite, Clive.

In two minutes an arm-chair full of magazines, slips of copy, and books for review, was emptied over the neighboring coal-scuttle, and Clive was in the seat, a cigar in his mouth, as comfortable as if he had never been away. When did he come? Last night. He was back in Charlotte Street, at his old lodgings: he had been to breakfast in Fitzroy Square that morning; James Binnie chirped for joy at seeing him. His father had written to him desiring him to come back and see James Binnie; pretty Miss Rosey was very well thank you: and Mrs. Mack? Wasn't Mrs. Mackenzie delighted to behold him? "Come, Sir, on your honor and conscience, didn't the widow give you a kiss on your return?" Clive sends an uncut number of the "Pall Mall Gazette" flying across the room at the head of the inquirer; but blushes so sweetly, that I have very little doubt some such pretty meeting had taken place.

What a pity it is he had not been here a short while since for a marriage in high life, to give away his dear Barnea, and sign the book, along with the other dignitaries! We described that ceremony to him, and announced the promotion of his friend, Florac, now our friend also, Director of the Great Anglo-Gallic Railway, the Prince de Montcontour. Then Clive told us of his deeds during the winter; of the good fun he had had at Rome, and the jolly fellows he had met there. Was he going to astonish the world by some grand pictures? He was not. The more he worked, the more discontented he was with his performances somehow: but J. J. was coming out very strong, J. J. was going to be a stunner. We turned with pride and satisfaction to that very number of the "Pall Mall Gazette," which the youth had flung at us, and showed him a fine article by F. Bayham, Esq., in which the picture sent home by J. J. was enthusiastically lauded by the great critic.

So he was back among us, and it seemed but yesterday he had quitted us. To Londoners every thing seems to have happened but yesterday; nobody has time to miss his neighbor who goes away. People go to the Cape, or on a campaign, or on a tour round the world, or to India, and return with a wife and two or three children, and we fancy it was only the other day they left us, so engaged is every man in his individual speculations, studies, struggles; so selfish does our life make us—selfish but not ill-natured. We are glad to see an old friend, though we do not weep when he leaves us. We humbly acknowledge, if fate call us away likewise, that we are no more missed than any other atom.

After talking for a while, Mr. Clive must needs go into the city, whither I accompanied him. His interview with Messrs. Jolly and Baines, at the house in Fog Court, must have been very satisfactory; Clive came out of the parlor with a radiant countenance. "Do you want any money, old boy?" says he; "the dear old governor has placed a jolly sum to my account, and Mr. Baines has told me how delighted Mrs. Baines and the girls will be to see me at dinner. He says my father has made a lucky escape out of one house in India, and a famous investment in another. Nothing could be more civil; how uncommonly kind and friendly every body is in London. Every body!" Then bestowing ourselves in a Hansom cab, which had probably just deposited some other capitalist in the City, we made for the West End of the town, where Mr. Clive had some important business to transact with his tailors. He discharged his outstanding little account with easy liberality, blushing as he pulled out of his pocket a new check-book, page 1 of which he bestowed on the delighted artist. From Mr. B.'s shop to Mr. Truefitt's is but a step. Our young friend was induced to enter the hair-dresser's, and leave behind him a great portion of the flowing locks and the yellow beard, which he had brought with him from Rome. With his mustaches he could not be induced to part; painters and cavalry officers having a right to those decorations. And why should not this young fellow wear smart clothes, and a smart mustache, and look handsome, and take his pleasure, and bask in his sun when it shone? Time enough for flannel and a fire when the winter comes; and for gray hair and cork-soled boots in the natural decline of years.

Then we went to pay a visit at a hotel in Jermyn Street to our friend Florac, who was now magnificently lodged there. A powdered giant lolling in the hall, his buttons emblazoned with prodigious coronets, took our cards up to the Prince. As the door of an apartment on the first floor opened, we heard a cry as of joy; and that nobleman, in a magnificent Persian dressing-gown, rushing from the room, plunged down the stairs and began kissing Clive to the respectful astonishment of the Titan in livery.

"Come that I present you, my friends," our good little Frenchman exclaimed, "to Madame la—to my wife!" We entered the drawing-room; a demure little lady, of near sixty years of age, was seated there, and we were presented in form to Madame la Princesse de Moncontour née Higg, of Manchester. She made us a stiff little courtesy, but looked not ill-natured; indeed, few women could look at Clive Newcome's gallant figure and brave smiling countenance and keep a frown on their own very long.

"I have eard of you from somebodys else besides the Prince," said the lady, with rather a blush. "Your uncle has spoke to me hoften about you, Mr. Clive, and about your good father."

"C'est son Directeur," whispers Florac to me. I wondered which of the firm of Newcome had taken that office upon him.

"Now you are come to England," the lady continued (whose Lancashire pronunciation being once indicated, we shall henceforth, out of respect to the Princess's rank, generally pretermitt)—"now you are come to England, we hope to see you often. Not here in this noisy hotel, which I can't bear, but in the country. Our house is only three miles from Newcome—not such a grand place as your uncle's; but I hope we shall see you there a great deal, and your friend, Mr. Pendennis, if he is passing that way." The invitation to Mr. Pendennis, I am bound to say, was given in terms by no means so warm as those in which the Princess's hospitality to Clive were professed.

"Shall we meet you at your Huncle Odson's?" the lady continued, to Clive; "his wife is a most charming, well-informed woman, has been most kind and civil, and we dine there to-day. Barnes and his wife is gone to spend the honeymoon at Newcome. Lady Clara is a sweet dear thing, and her pa and ma most affable, I am sure. What a pity Sir Brian couldn't attend the marriage! There was every body there in London, a'most. Sir Harvey Diggs says he is mending very slowly. In life we are in death, Mr. Newcome! Isn't it sad to think of him, in the midst of all his splendor and prosperity, and he so infirm and unable to enjoy them! But let us hope for the best, and that his health will soon come round!"

With these and similar remarks, in which poor Florac took but a very small share (for he seemed dumb and melancholy in the company of the Princess, his elderly spouse), the visit sped on. Mr. Pendennis, to whom very little was said, having leisure to make his silent observations upon the person to whom he had been just presented.

As there lay on the table two neat little packages, addressed "The Princess de Moncontour"—an envelope to the same address, with "The Prescription, No. 9396" further inscribed on the paper, and a sheet of note-paper, bearing cabalistic characters, and the signature of that most fashionable physician, Sir Harvey Diggs, I was led to believe that the lady of Moncontour was, or fancied herself, in a delicate state of health. By the side of the physic for the body was medicine for the soul—a number of pretty little books in middle age bindings, in antique type many of them, adorned with pictures of the German School, representing demure ecclesiastics, with their heads on one side, children in long starched nightgowns, virgins bearing lilies, and so forth, from which it was to be concluded that the owner of the volumes was not so hostile to Rome as she had been at an earlier period of her religious life; and that she had migrated (in spirit) from Clapham to Knightsbridge, as so many wealthy mercantile families have likewise done in the body. A long strip of embroidery, of the Gothic pattern, furthermore betrayed her present inclinations; and the person observing these things, while, nobody was taking any notice of him, was amused when the accuracy of his conjectures was confirmed by the re-appearance of the gigantic footman, calling out "Mr. Oneyman," in a loud voice, and preceding that divine into the room.

"C'est le Directeur. Venez fumer dans ma chambre, Pen," growled Florac, as Honeyman came sliding over the carpet, his elegant smile changing to a blush when he beheld Clive, his nephew, seated by the Princess's side. This, then, was the uncle who had spoken about Clive and his father to Madame de Florac. Charles seemed in the best condition. He held out two bran-new lavender-colored kid gloves to shake hands with his dear Clive; Florac and Mr. Pendennis vanished out of the room as he appeared, so that no precise account can be given of this affecting interview.

When I quitted the hotel, a brown brougham, with a pair of beautiful horses, the harness and panels emblazoned with the neatest little ducal coronets you ever saw, and a cipher under each crown as easy to read as the arrow-headed inscriptions on one of Mr. Layard's Assyrian chariots, was in waiting, and I presumed that Madame la Princesse was about to take an airing.

Clive had passed the avuncular banking-house in the city, without caring to face his relatives there. Mr. Newcome was now in sole command, Mr. Barnes being absent at Newcome, the Baronet little likely ever to enter bank parlor again. But his bounden duty was to wait on the ladies; and of course, only from duty's sake, he went the very first day and called in Park Lane.

"The family was habeent ever since the marriage simminery last week," the footman, who had accompanied the party to Baden, informed Clive, when he opened the door and recognized that gentleman. "Sir Brian pretty well, thank you, Sir. The family was at Brighting. That is, Miss Newcome is in London staying with her grandmammar in Queen Street, May Fear, Sir." The varnished doors closed upon Jeames within; the brazen knockers grinned their familiar grin at Clive; and he went down the blank steps discomfited. Must it be owned that he went to a Club, and looked in the Directory for the number of Lady Kew's house in Queen Street? Her ladyship had a furnished house for the season. No such noble name was to be found among the inhabitants of Queen Street.

Mr. Hobson was from home; that is, Thomas had orders not to admit strangers on certain days, or before certain hours; so that Aunt Hobson saw Clive without being seen by the young man. I can not say how much he regretted that mischance. His visits of propriety were thus all paid; and he went off to dine dutifully with James Binnie, after which meal he came to a certain rendezvous given to him by some bachelor friends for the evening.

James Binnie's eyes lightened up with pleasure on beholding his young Clive; the youth, obedient to his father's injunction, had hastened to Fitzroy Square immediately after taking possession of his old lodgings—his, during the time of his absence. The old properties and carved cabinets, the picture of his father looking melancholy out of the canvas, greeted Clive strangely on the afternoon of his arrival. No wonder he was glad to get away from a solitude peopled with a number of dismal recollections, to the near hospitality of Fitzroy Square and his guardian and friend there.

James had not improved in health during Clive's ten months absence. He had never been able to walk well, or take his accustomed exercise, after his fall. He was no more used to riding than the late Mr. Gibbon, whose person James's somewhat resembled, and of whose philosophy our Scottish friend was an admiring scholar. The Colonel gone, James would have arguments with Mr. Honeyman over their claret, bring down the famous XVth and XVth chapters of the Decline and Fall upon him, and quite get the better of the clergyman. James, like many other skeptics, was very obstinate, and for his part believed that almost all persons had as much belief as the Roman angurs in their ceremonies. Certainly, poor Honeyman, in their controversies, gave up one article after another, flying from James's assault; but the battle over, Charles Honeyman would pick up these accommodations which he had flung away in his retreat, wipe them dry, and put them on again.

Lamed by his fall, and obliged to remain much within doors, where certain society did not always amuse him, James Binnie sought excitement in the pleasures of the table, partaking of them the more freely now that his health could afford them the less. Clive, the sly rogue, observed a great improvement in the commissariat since his good father's time, ate his dinner with thankfulness, and made no remarks. Nor did he confide to us for awhile his opinion that Mrs. Mack bored the good gentleman most severely; that he pined away under her kindnesses; sneaked off to his study-chair and his nap; was only too glad when some of the widow's friends came, or she went out; seeming to breathe more freely when she was gone, and drink his wine more cheerily when rid of the intolerable weight of her presence.

I protest the great ills of life are nothing—the loss of your fortune is a mere flea-bite; the loss of your wife—how many men have supported it and married comfortably afterward? It is not what you lose, but what you have daily to bear that is hard. I can fancy nothing more cruel, after a long easy life of bachelorhood, than to have to sit day after day with a dull handsome woman opposite; to have to answer her speeches about the weather, house-keeping, and what not; to smile appropriately when she is disposed to be lively (that laughing at the jokes is the hardest part), and to model your conversation so as to suit her intelligence, knowing that a word used out of its downright signification will not be understood by your fair breakfast-maker. Women go through this simpering and smiling life, and bear it quite easily. Theirs is a life of hypocrisy. What good woman does not laugh at her husband's or father's jokes and stories time after time, and would not laugh at breakfast, lunch, and dinner, if he told them? Flattery is their nature—to coax, flatter, and sweetly befool some one is every woman's business. She is none if she declines this office. But men are not provided with such powers of humbug or endurance—they perish and pine away miserably when bored—or they shrink off to the club or public-house for comfort. I want to say as delicately as I can, and never liking to use rough terms regarding a handsome woman, that Mrs. Mackenzie, herself being in the highest spirits and the best humor, extinguished her half-brother, James Binnie, Esq.; that she was as a malaria to him, poisoning his atmosphere, numbing his limbs, destroying his sleep—that day after day as he sat down at breakfast, and she leveled commonplaces at her dearest James, her dearest James became more wretched under her. And no one could see what his complaint was. He called in the old physicians at the club. He dosed himself with poppy, and mandragora, and blue pill—lower and lower went poor James's mercury. If he wanted to move to Brighton or Cheltenham, well and good. Whatever were her engagements, or whatever pleasures darling Rosey might have in store, dear thing!—at her age, my dear Mrs. Newcome, would not one do all to make a young creature happy?—under no circumstances could I think of leaving my poor brother.

Mrs. Mackenzie thought herself a most highly principled woman, Mrs. Newcome had also a great opinion of her. These two ladies had formed a considerable friendship in the past months, the captain's widow having an unaffected reverence for the banker's lady, and thinking her one of the best informed and most superior women in the world. When she had a high opinion of a person Mrs. Mack always wisely told it. Mrs. Newcome in her turn thought Mrs. Mackenzie a very clever, agreeable, lady-like woman—not accomplished, but one could not have every thing. "No, no, my dear," says simple Hobson, "never would do to have every woman as clever as you are, Maria. Women would have it all their own way then."

Maria, as her custom was, thanked God for being so virtuous and clever, and graciously admitted Mrs. and Miss Mackenzie into the circle of adorers of that supreme virtue and talent. Mr. Newcome took little Rosey and her mother to some parties. When any took place in Bryanstone Square, they were generally allowed to come to tea.

When on the second day of his arrival the dutiful Clive went to dine with Mr. James, the ladies, in spite of their raptures at his return and delight at seeing him, were going in the evening to his aunt. Their talk was about the Princess all dinner time. The Prince and Princess were to dine in Bryanstone Square. The Princess had ordered such and such things at the jeweller's—the Princess would take rank over an English Earl's daughter—over Lady Ann Newcome for instance. "O dear! I wish the Prince and Princess were smothered in the tower," growled James Binnie, "since you have got acquainted with 'em I have never heard of any thing else."

Clive, like a wise man, kept his counsel about the Prince and Princess, with whom we have seen that he had had the honor of an interview that very day. But after dinner Rosey came round and whispered to her mamma, and after Rosey's whisper mamma flung her arms round Rosey's neck and kissed her, and called her a thoughtful darling. "What do you think this creature says, Clive?" said Mrs. Mack, still holding her darling's little hand, "I wonder I had not thought of it myself."

"What is it, Mrs. Mackenzie?" asks Clive, laughing.

"She says why should not you come to your aunt's with us? We are sure Mrs. Newcome would be most happy to see you."

Rosey, with a little hand put to mamma's mouth, said, "Why did you tell—you naughty mamma! Isn't she a naughty mamma, Uncle James?" More kisses follow after this sally, of which Uncle James receives one with perfect complacency: mamma crying out as Rosey retires to dress, "That darling child is always thinking of others—always!"

Clive says, "he will sit and smoke a cheroot with Mr. Binnie, if they please." James's countenance falls. "We have left off that sort of thing here, my dear Clive, a long time," cries Mrs. Mackenzie, departing from the dining-room.

"But we have improved the claret, Clive, my boy!" whispers Uncle James. "Let us have another bottle, and we will drink to the dear Colonel's good health and speedy return—God bless him! I say, Clive, Tom seems to have had a most fortunate escape out of Winter's house—thanks to our friend Rummun Lal, and to have got into a capital good thing with this Bumde-cund bank. They speak famously of it at Hanover Square, and I see the Hurkara quotes the shares at a premium already."

Clive did not know any thing about the Bumde-cund bank, except a few words in a letter from his father, which he had found in the City this morning, "And an uncommonly liberal remittance the governor has sent me home, Sir;" upon which they fill another bumper to the Colonel's health.

Mamma and Rosey come and show their pretty pink dresses before going to Mrs. Newcome's, and Clive lights a cigar in the hall—and isn't there a jubilation at the Haunt when the young fellow's face appears above the smoke-clouds there?

CHAPTER XL.
AN OLD STORY.

MANY of Clive's Roman friends were by this time come to London, and the young man renewed his acquaintance with them, and had speedily a considerable circle of his own. He thought fit to allow himself a good horse or two, and appeared in the Park among other young dandies. He and Monsieur de Moncontour were sworn allies. Lord Fareham, who had purchased J. J.'s picture, was Clive's very good friend: Major Pendennis himself pronounced him to be a young fellow of agreeable manners, and very favorably vu (as the Major happened to know) in some very good quarters.

Ere many days Clive had been to Brighton to see Lady Ann and Sir Brian, and good Aunt Honeyman, in whose house the Baronet was lodged: and I suppose he found out, by some means or other, where Lady Kew lived in May Fair.

But her Ladyship was not at home, nor was she at home on the second day, nor did there come any note from Ethel to her cousin. She did not ride in the Park as of old. Clive, bien vu as he was, did not belong to that great world as yet, in which he would be pretty sure to meet her every night at one of those parties where every body goes. He read her name in the paper morning after morning, as having been present at Lady This's entertainment and Lady That's ministerial réunion. At first he was too shy to tell what the state of the case was, and took nobody into his confidence regarding his little tendre.

There he was riding through Queen Street, May Fair, attired in splendid raiment; never missing the Park; actually going to places of worship in the neighborhood; and frequenting the opera—a waste of time which one would never have expected in a youth of his nurture. At length a certain observer of human nature remarking his state, rightly conjectured that he must be in love, and taxed him with the soft impeachment—on which the young man, no doubt anxious to open his heart to some one, poured out all that story which has before been narrated; and told how he thought his passion cured, and how it was cured; but when he heard from Kew at Naples that the engagement was over between him and Miss Newcome, Clive found his own flame kindle again with new ardor. He was wild to see her. He dashed off from Naples instantly on receiving the news that she was free. He had been ten days in London without getting a glimpse of her. "That Mrs. Mackenzie bothers me so I hardly know where to turn," said poor Clive, "and poor little Rosey is made to write me a note about something twice a day. She's a good dear little thing—little Rosey—and I really had thought once of—of—O never mind that! O Pen! I'm up another tree now! and a poor miserable young beggar I am!" In fact Mr. Pendennis was installed as confident vice J. J.—absent on leave.

This is a part, which, especially for a few days, the present biographer has always liked well enough. For a while at least, I think almost every man or woman is interesting when in love. If you know of two or three such affairs going on in any soirée to which you may be invited—is not the party straightway amusing? Yonder goes Augustus Tomkins, working his way through the rooms to that far corner where demure Miss Hopkins is seated, to whom the stupid grinning Bumpkins thinks he is making himself agreeable. Yonder sits Miss Fanny distracte, and yet trying to smile as the captain is talking his folly, the parson his glib compliments. And see, her face lights up all of a sudden: her eyes beam with delight at the captain's stories, and at that delightful young clergyman likewise. It is because Augustus has appeared; their eyes only meet for one semi-second, but that is enough for Miss Fanny. Go on, captain, with your twaddle!—Proceed, my reverend friend, with your smirking common-places! In the last two minutes the world has changed for Miss Fanny. That moment has come for which she has been fidgeting and longing and scheming all day! How different an interest, I say, has a meeting of people for a philosopher who knows of a few such little secrets, to that which your vulgar looker-on feels, who comes but to eat the ices, and stare at the ladies' dresses and beauty! There are two frames of mind under which London society is bearable to a man—to be an actor in one of those sentimental performances above hinted at: or to be a spectator and watch it. But as for the mere dessus de cartes—would not an arm-chair and the dullest of books be better than that dull game?

So, I not only became Clive's confidant in this affair, but took a pleasure in extracting the young fellow's secrets from him, or rather in encouraging him to pour them forth. Thus was the great part of the previous tale revealed to me: thus Jack Belsize's misadventures, of the first part of which we had only heard in London (and whither he returned presently to be reconciled to his father, after his elder brother's death). Thus my Lord Kew's secret history came into my possession; let us hope for the public's future delectation, and the chronicler's private advantage. And many a night until daylight did appear, has poor Clive stamped his chamber or my own, pouring his story out to me, his griefs and raptures; recalling, in his wild young way, recollections of Ethel's sayings and doings; uttering descriptions of her beauty: and raging against the cruelty which she exhibited toward him.

As soon as the new confidant heard the name of the young lover's charmer, to do Mr. Pendennis justice, he endeavored to fling as much cold water upon Clive's flame, as a small private engine could be brought to pour on such a conflagration. "Miss Newcome! my dear Clive," says the confidant, "do you know to what you are aspiring? For the last three months Miss Newcome has been the greatest lioness in London: the reigning beauty: the winning horse: the first favorite out of the whole Belgravian harem. No young woman of this year has come near her: those of past seasons she has distanced, and utterly put to shame. Miss Blackcap, Lady Blanch Blackcap's daughter was (as perhaps you are not aware) considered by her mamma the great beauty of last season; and it was considered rather shabby of the young Marquis of Farintosh, to leave town without offering to change Miss Blackcap's name. Heaven bless you! this year Farintosh will not look at Miss Blackcap! He finds people at home when (ha! I see you wince, my suffering innocent!)—when he calls in Queen Street; yes, and Lady Kew, who is one of the cleverest women in England, will listen for hours to Lord Farintosh's conversation; than whom, the Rotten Row of Hyde Park can not show a greater booby. Miss Blackcap may retire, like Jephthah's daughter, for all Farintosh will relieve her. Then, my dear fellow, there were, as possibly you do not know, Lady Hermengilde and Lady Yseult, Lady Rackstraw's lovely twins, whose appearance created such a sensation at Lady Hautbois' first—was it her first or was it her second?—yes, it was her second—breakfast. Whom weren't they going to marry? Crackthorpe was mad they said about both. Bustington, Sir John Fobsby, the young baronet with the immense Northern property—the Bishop of Windsor was actually said to be smitten with one of them, but did not like to offer, as her present M—y, like Qu—n Et—z—b—th, of gracious memory, is said to object to bishops, as bishops, marrying. Where is Bustington? Where is Crackthorpe? Where is Fobsby, the young Baronet of the North? My dear fellow, when those two girls come into a room now, they make no more sensation than you or I. Miss Newcome has carried their admirers away from them: Fobsby has actually, it is said, proposed for her: and the real reason of that affair between Lord Bustington and Captain Crackthorpe of the Royal Horse Guards Green, was a speech of Bustington's, hinting that Miss Newcome had not behaved well in throwing Lord Kew over. Don't you know what old Lady Kew will do with this girl, Clive? She will marry Miss Newcome to the best man. If a richer and better parti than Lord Farintosh presents himself—then it will be Farintosh's turn to find that Lady Kew is not at home. Is there any young man in the Peerage unmarried and richer than Farintosh? I forget. Why does not some one publish a list of the young male nobility and baronetage, their names, weights, and probable fortunes? I don't mean for the matrons of May Fair—they have the list by heart and study it in secret—but for young men in the world; so that they may know what their chances are, and who naturally has the pull over them. Let me see—there is young Lord Gaunt, who will have a great fortune, and is desirable because you know his father is locked up—but he is only ten years old—no—they can scarcely bring him forward as Farintosh's rival.

"You look astonished, my poor boy? You think it is wicked in me to talk in this brutal way about bargain and sale; and say that your heart's darling is, at this minute, being paced up and down the May Fair market to be taken away by the best bidder. Can you count purses with Sultan Farintosh? Can you compete even with Sir John Fobsby of the North? What I say is wicked and worldly, is it? So it is: but it is true, as true as Tattersall's—as true as Circassia or Virginia. Don't you know that the Circassian girls are proud of their bringing up, and take rank according to the prices which they fetch? And you go and buy yourself some new clothes, and a fifty pound horse, and put a penny rose in your button hole, and ride past her window, and think to win this prize? O, you idiot! A penny rosebud! Put money in your purse. A fifty pound hack when a butcher rides as good a one!—Put money in your purse. A brave young heart, all courage and love and honor! Put money in thy purse—fother coin don't pass in the market—at least where old Lady Kew has the stall."

By these remonstrances, playful though serious, Clive's adviser sought to teach him wisdom about his love affair; and the advice was received as advice upon those occasions usually is.

After calling thrice, and writing to Miss Newcome, there came a little note from that young lady, saying, "Dear Clive. We were so sorry we were out when you called. We shall be at home to-morrow at lunch, when Lady Kew hopes you will come, and see, yours ever, E. N."

Clive went—poor Clive. He had the satisfaction of shaking Ethel's hand, and a finger of Lady Kew; of eating a mutton chop in Ethel's presence; of conversing about the state of art at Rome with Lady Kew, and describing the last works of Gibson and Macdonald. The visit lasted but for half an hour. Not for one minute was Clive allowed to see Ethel alone. At three o'clock Lady Kew's carriage was announced and our young gentleman rose to take his leave, and had the pleasure of seeing the most noble Peer, Marquis of Farintosh and Earl of Rossmont, descend from his lordship's brougham and enter at Lady Kew's door, followed by a domestic bearing a small stack of flowers from Covent Garden.

It befell that the good-natured Lady Fareham had a ball in these days; and meeting Clive in the Park, her lord invited him to the entertainment. Mr. Pendennis had also the honor of a card. Accordingly Clive took me up at Bays's, and we proceeded to the ball together.

The lady of the house, smiling upon all her guests, welcomed with particular kindness her young friend from Rome. "Are you related to the Miss Newcome, Lady Ann Newcome's daughter? Her cousin? She will be here to-night." Very likely Lady Fareham did not see Clive wince and blush at this announcement, her ladyship having to occupy herself with a thousand other people. Clive found a dozen of his Roman friends in the room, ladies young and middle aged, plain and handsome, all glad to see his kind face. The house was splendid; the ladies magnificently dressed; the ball beautiful, though it appeared a little dull until that event took place whereof we treated two pages' back (in the allegory of Mr. Tomkins and Miss Hopkins), and Lady Kew and her granddaughter made their appearance.

That old woman, who began to look more and more like the wicked fairy of the stories, who is not invited to the Princess's Christening Feast, had this advantage over her likeness, that she was invited every where; though how she, at her age, could fly about to so many parties, unless she was a fairy, no one could say. Behind the fairy, up the marble stairs, came the most noble Farintosh, with that vacuous leer which distinguishes his lordship. Ethel seemed to be carrying the stack of flowers which the marquis had sent to her. The noble Bustington (Viscount Bustington, I need scarcely tell the reader, is the heir of the house of Podbury), the Baronet of the North, the gallant Crackthorpe, the first men in town, in a word, gathered round the young beauty forming her court; and little Dick Hitchin, who goes every where, you may be sure was near her with a compliment and a smile. Ere this arrival, the twins had been giving themselves great airs in the room—the poor twins! when Ethel appeared they sank into shuddering insignificance, and had to put up with the conversation and attentions of second-rate men, belonging to second-rate clubs, in heavy dragoon regiments. One of them actually walked with a dancing barrier; but he was related to a duke, and it was expected the Lord Chancellor would give him something very good.

Before he saw Ethel, Clive vowed he was aware of her. Indeed, had not Lady Fareham told him Miss Newcome was coming? Ethel, on the contrary, not expecting him, or not having the prescience of love, exhibited signs of surprise when she beheld him, her eyebrows arching, her eyes darting looks of pleasure. When grandmamma happened to be in another room, she beckoned Clive to her, dismissing Crackthorpe and Fobsby, Farintosh and Bustington, the amorous youth who around her bowed, and summoning Mr. Clive up to an audience with the air of a young princess.

And so she was a princess; and this the region of her special dominion. The wittiest and handsomest, she deserved to reign in such a place, by right of merit and by general election. Clive felt her superiority, and his own shortcomings; he came up to her as to a superior person. Perhaps she was not sorry to let him see how she ordered away grandees and splendid Bustingtons, informing them, with a superb manner, that she wished to speak to her cousin—that handsome young man with the light moustache yonder.

"Do you know many people? This is your first appearance in society? Shall I introduce you to some nice girls to dance with? What very pretty buttons!"

"Is that what you wanted to say?" asked Clive, rather bewildered.

"What does one say at a ball? One talks conversation suited to the place. If I were to say to Captain Crackthorpe, 'What pretty buttons!' he would be delighted. But you—you have a soul above buttons, I suppose."

"Being, as you say, a stranger in this sort of society, you see I am not accustomed to—to the exceeding brilliancy of its conversation," said Clive.

"What! you want to go away, and we haven't seen each other for near a year," cries Ethel, in quite a natural voice. "Sir John Fobsby, I'm very sorry—but do let me off this dance. I have just met my cousin, whom I have not seen for a whole year, and I want to talk to him."

"It was not my fault that you did not see me sooner. I wrote to you that I only got your letter a month ago. You never answered the second I wrote you from Rome. Your letter lay there at the post ever so long, and was forwarded to me at Naples."

"Where?" asked Ethel.

"I saw Lord Kew there." Ethel was smiling with all her might, and kissing her hand to the twins, who passed at this moment with their mamma. "O, indeed, you saw—how do you do?—Lord Kew."

"And, having seen him, I came over to England," said Clive.

Ethel looked at him, gravely. "What am I to understand by that, Clive?—You came over because it was very hot at Naples, and because you wanted to see your friends here, n'est-ce pas? How glad mamma was to see you! You know she loves you as if you were her own son."

"What, as much as that angel, Barnes!" cries Clive, bitterly; "impossible."

Ethel looked once more. Her present mood and desire was to treat Clive as a chit, as a young fellow without consequence—a thirteenth younger brother. But in his looks and behavior there was that which seemed to say not too many liberties were to be taken with him.

"Why weren't you here a month sooner, and you might have seen the marriage? It was a very pretty thing. Every body was there. Clara, and so did Barnes really, looked quite handsome."

"It must have been beautiful," continued Clive; "quite a touching sight, I am sure. Poor Charles Belsize could not be present because his brother was dead; and—"

"And what else, pray, Mr. Newcome!" cries Miss, in great wrath, her pink nostrils beginning to quiver. "I did not think, really, that when we met after so many months, I was to be—insulted; yes, insulted, by the mention of that name."

"I most humbly ask pardon," said Clive, with a grave bow. "Heaven forbid that I should wound your sensibility, Ethel! It is, as you say, my first appearance in society. I talk about things or persons that I should not mention. I should talk about buttons, should I? which you were good enough to tell me was the proper subject of conversation. Mayn't I even speak of connections of the family? Mr. Belsize, through this marriage, has the honor of being connected with you; and even I, in a remote degree, may boast of a sort of an ever-so-distant consinship with him. What an honor for me!"

"Pray what is the meaning of all this?" cries Miss Ethel, surprised, and perhaps alarmed. Indeed, Clive scarcely knew. He had been chafing all the while he talked with her; smothering anger as he saw the young men round about her; revolting against himself for the very humility of his obedience, and angry at the eagerness and delight with which he had come at her call.

"The meaning is, Ethel"—he broke out, seizing the opportunity—"that when a man comes a thousand miles to see you, and shake your hand, you should give it him a little more cordially than you choose to do to me; that when a kinsman knocks at your door, time after time, you should try and admit him; and that when you meet him you should treat him like an old friend: not as you treated me when my Lady Kew vouchsafed to give me admittance: not as you treat these fools that are fribbling round about you," cries Mr. Clive, in a great rage, folding his arms, and glaring round on a number of the most innocent young swells; and he continued looking as if he would like to knock a dozen of their heads together. "Am I keeping Miss Newcome's admirers from her?"

"That is not for me to say," she said, quite gently. He was; but to see him angry did not displease Miss Newcome.

"That young man who came for you just now," Clive went on—"that Sir John—"

"Are you angry with me because I sent him away?" said Ethel, putting out a hand. "Hark! there is the music. Take me in and waltz with me. Don't you know it is not my door at which you knocked?" she said, looking up into his face as simply and kindly as of old. She whirled round the dancing room with him in triumph, the other beauties dwindling before her; she looked more and more beautiful with each rapid move of the waltz, her color heightening and her eyes seeming to brighten. Not till the music stopped did she sink down on a seat, panting, and smiling radiant—as many, many hundred years ago I remember to have seen Tagliani, after a conquering pas seul. She nodded a thank you to Clive. It seemed that there was a perfect reconciliation. Lady Kew came in just at the end of the dance, scowling when she beheld Ethel's partner; but in reply to her remonstrances Ethel shrugged her fair shoulders; with a look which seemed to say je le veux, gave an arm to her grandmother, and walked off, saucily protecting her.

Clive's friend had been looking on observingly and curiously as the scene between them had taken place, and at the dance with which the reconciliation had been celebrated. I must tell you that this arch young creature had formed the object of my observation for some months past, and that I watched her as I have watched a beautiful panther at the Zoological Gardens, so bright of eye, so sleek of coat, so slim in form, so swift and agile in her spring.

A more brilliant young coquette than Miss Newcome, in her second season, these eyes never looked upon, that is the truth. In her first year, being engaged to Lord Kew, she was perhaps a little more reserved and quiet. Besides, her mother went out with her that first season, to whom Miss Newcome, except for a little occasional flightiness, was invariably obedient and ready to come to call. But when Lady Kew appeared as her Duenna, the girl's delight seemed to be to plague the old lady, and she would dance with the very youngest sons merely to put grandmamma in a passion. In this way poor young Cubley (who has two hundred a year of allowance, besides eighty, and an annual rise of five in the Treasury) actually thought that Ethel was in love with him, and consulted with the young men in his room in Downing Street, whether two hundred and eighty a year, with five pound more next year, would be enough for them to keep house on? Young Tandy of the Temple, Lord Skibbereen's younger son, who sate in the House for some time on the Irish Catholic side, was also deeply smitten, and many a night in our walks home from the parties at the other end of the town, would entertain me with his admiration and passion for her.

"If you have such a passion for her, why not propose?" it was asked of Mr. Tandy.

"Propose! propose to a Russian Archduchess," cries young Tandy. "She's beautiful, she's delightful, she's witty. I have never seen any thing like her eyes; they send me wild—wild," says Tandy—(slapping his waistcoat under Temple Bar)—but a more audacious little flirt never existed since the days of Cleopatra."

With this opinion likewise in my mind, I had been looking on during Clive's proceedings with Miss Ethel—not I say without admiration of the young lady who was leading him such a dance. The waltz over, I congratulated him on his own performance. His continental practice had greatly improved him. "And as for your partner, it is delightful to see her," I went on. "I always like to be by when Miss Newcome dances. I had sooner see her than any body since Taglioni. Look at her now, with her neck up, and her little foot out, just as she is preparing to start! Happy Lord Bustington!"

"You are angry with her because she cut you," growls Clive. "You know you said she cut you, or forgot you; and your vanity's wounded; that is why you are so satirical."

"How can Miss Newcome remember all the men who are presented to her?" says the other. "Last year she talked to me because she wanted to know about you. This year she doesn't talk; because I suppose she doesn't want to know about you any more."

"Hang it. Do—on't, Pen," cries Clive, as a schoolboy cries out to another not to hit him.

"She does not pretend to observe; and is in full conversation with the amiable Bustington. Delicious interchange of noble thoughts! But she is observing us talking, and knows that we are talking about her. If ever you marry her, Clive, which is absurd, I shall lose you for a friend. You will infallibly tell her what I think of her; and she will order you to give me up." Clive had gone off in a brown study, as his interlocutor continued. "Yes, she is a flirt. She can't help her nature. She tries to vanquish every one who comes near her. She is a little out of breath from waltzing, and so she pretends to be listening to poor Bustington, who is out of breath too, but puffs out his best in order to make himself agreeable. With what a pretty air she appears to listen! Her eyes actually seem to brighten."

"What?" says Clive, with a start.

I could not comprehend the meaning of the start; nor did I care much to know, supposing that the young man was waking up from some lover's reverie; and the evening sped away, Clive not quitting the ball until Miss Newcome and the Countess of Kew had departed. No further communication appeared to take place between the cousins that evening. I think it was Captain Crackthorpe who gave the young lady an arm into her carriage; Sir John Fobsey having the happiness to conduct the old Countess, and carrying the pink bag for the shawls, wrappers, etc., on which her Ladyship's coronet and initials were emblazoned. Clive may have made a movement as if to step forward, but a single finger from Miss Newcome warned him back.

Clive and his two friends in Lamb Court had made an engagement for the next Saturday to dine at Greenwich; but on the morning of that day there came a note from him to say that he thought of going down to see his aunt, Miss Honeyman, and begged to recall his promise to us. Saturday is a holiday with gentlemen of our profession. We had invited F. Bayham, Esquire, and promised ourselves a merry evening, and were unwilling to balk ourselves of the pleasure on account of the absence of our young Roman. So we three went to London Bridge Station at an early hour, proposing to breathe the fresh air of Greenwich Park before dinner. And at London Bridge, by the most singular coincidence, Lady Kew's carriage drove up to the Brighton entrance, and Miss Ethel and her maid stepped out of the brougham.

When Miss Newcome and her maid entered the Brighton station, did Mr. Clive, by another singular coincidence, happen also to be there? What more natural and dutiful than that he should go and see his aunt, Miss Honeyman? What more proper than that Miss Ethel should pass the Saturday and Sunday with her sick father; and take a couple of wholesome nights' rest after those five weary past evenings, for each of which we may reckon a couple of soirées and a ball? And that relations should travel together, the young lady being protected by her femme-de-chambre; that surely, as every one must allow, was perfectly right and proper.

That a biographer should profess to know every thing which passes, even in a confidential talk in a first-class carriage between two lovers, seems perfectly absurd; not that grave historians do not pretend to the same wonderful degree of knowledge—reporting meetings the most occult of conspirators; private interviews between monarchs and their ministers, even the secret thoughts and motives of those personages, which possibly the persons themselves did not know—all for which the present writer will pledge his known character for veracity is, that on a certain day certain parties had a conversation of which the upshot was so and so. He guesses, of course, at a great deal of what took place; knowing the characters, and being informed at some time of their meeting. You do not suppose that I bribed the femme-de-chambre, or that those two city gents, who sate in the same carriage with our young friends, and could not hear a word they said, reported their talk to me? If Clive and Ethel had had a coupé to themselves, I would yet boldly tell what took place, but the coupé was taken by other three young city gents, who smoked the whole way.

"Well, then," the bonnet begins close up to the hat, "tell me, Sir, is it true that you were so very much épris of the Miss Freemans at Rome; and that afterward you were so wonderfully attentive to the third Miss Balliol? Did you draw her portrait? You know you drew her portrait? You painters always pretend to admire girls with auburn hair, because Titian and Raphael painted it. Has the Fornarina red hair? Why we are at Croydon, I declare!"

"The Fornarina"—the hat replies to the bonnet, "if that picture at the Borghese palace be an original, or a likeness of her—is not a handsome woman, with vulgar eyes and mouth, and altogether a most mahogany-colored person. She is so plain, in fact, I think that very likely it is the real woman; for it is with their own fancies that men fall in love—or rather every woman is handsome to the lover. You know how old Helen must have been."

"I don't know any such thing, or any thing about her. Who was Helen?" asks the bonnet; and indeed she did not know.

"It's a long story, and such an old scandal now, that there is no use in repeating it," says Clive.

"You only talk about Helen because you wish to turn away the conversation from Miss Freeman," cries the young lady—"from Miss Balliol, I mean."

"We will talk about whichever you please. Which shall we begin to pull to pieces?" says Clive. You see, to be in this carriage—to be actually with her—to be looking into those wonderful lucid eyes—to see her sweet mouth dimpling, and hear her sweet voice ringing with its delicious laughter—to have that hour and a half his own, in spite of all the world—dragons, grandmothers, consequences, the future—made the young fellow so happy, filled his whole frame and spirit with a delight so keen, that no wonder he was gay, and brisk, and lively.

"And so you knew of my goings on?" he asked. O me! they were at Reigate by this time; there was Gatton Park flying before them on the wings of the wind.

"I know of a number of things," says the bonnet, nodding with ambrosial curls.

"And you would not answer the second letter I wrote to you?"

"We were in great perplexity. One can not be always answering young gentlemen's letters.

I had considerable doubt about answering a note I got from Charlotte Street, Fitzroy Square," says the lady's chapeau. "No, Clive, we must not write to one another," she continued more gravely, "or only very, very seldom. Nay, my meeting you here to-day is by the merest chance I am sure; for when I mentioned at Lady Fareham's the other evening that I was going to see papa at Brighton to-day, I never for one moment thought of seeing you in the train. But as you are here, it can't be helped; and I may as well tell you that there are obstacles."

"What, other obstacles?" Clive gasped out.

"Nonsense—you silly boy! No other obstacles but those which always have existed, and must. When we parted—that is, when you left us at Baden, you knew it was for the best. You had your profession to follow, and could not go on idling about—about a family of sick people and children. Every man has his profession, and you yours, as you would have it. We are so nearly allied that we may—we may like each other like brother and sister almost. I don't know what Barnes would say if he heard me? Wherever you and your father are, how can I ever think of you but you know how? I always shall, always. There are certain feelings we have, which I hope never can change; though, if you please, about them I intend never to speak any more. Neither you nor I can alter our conditions, but must make the best of them. You shall be a fine clever painter; and I—who knows what will happen to me? I know what is going to happen to-day; I am going to see papa and mamma, and be as happy as I can till Monday morning."

"I know what I wish would happen now," said Clive—they were going screaming through a tunnel.

"What?" said the bonnet in the darkness; and the engine was roaring so loudly, that he was obliged to put his head quite close to say—

"I wish the tunnel would fall in and close upon us, or that we might travel on forever and ever."

Here there was a great jar of the carriage, and the lady's maid, and I think Miss Ethel, gave a shriek. The lamp above was so dim that the carriage was almost totally dark. No wonder the lady's maid was frightened! But the daylight came streaming in, and all poor Clive's wishes of rolling and rolling on forever were put an end to by the implacable sun in a minute.

Ah, why was it the quick train? Suppose it had been the parliamentary train?—even that too would have come to an end. They came and said, "Tickets, please," and Clive held out the three of their party—his, and Ethel's, and her maid's. I think for such a ride as that he was right to give up Greenwich. Mr. Kuhn was in waiting with a carriage for Miss Ethel. She shook hands with Clive, returning his pressure.

"I may come and see you?" he said.

"You may come and see mamma—yes."

"And where are you staying?"

"Bless my soul—they were staying at Miss Honeyman's!" Clive burst into a laugh. Why he was going there too! Of course Aunt Honeyman had no room for him, her house being quite full with the other Newcomers.

It was a most curious coincidence their meeting; but altogether Lady Ann thought it was best to say nothing about the circumstance to grandmamma. I myself am puzzled to say which would have been the better course to pursue under the circumstances; there were so many courses open. As they had gone so far, should they go on farther together? Suppose they were going to the same house at Brighton, oughtn't they to have gone in the same carriage, with Kuhn and the maid of course? Suppose they met by chance at the station, ought they to have traveled in separate carriages? I ask any gentleman and father of a family, when he was immensely smitten with his present wife, Mrs. Brown, if he had met her traveling with her maid, in the mail, when there was a vacant place, what would he himself have done?

A RUSSIAN REMINISCENCE.

UPON one of the coldest days of February, 1858, I left Paris by the Orleans Railway. The weather was extremely severe, the frozen snow lay thick in the streets, the asphalt of the boulevards was slippery as glass, sledges scoured the Champs Elysées and Bois de Boulogne. An icy wind whistled round the train as we quitted the shelter of the station, and I regretted, as I buttoned myself to the chin, and shrank into my corner, that the carriage was not full, instead of having but one occupant besides myself.

Opposite to me sat a hale man of about sixty-five, with a quick bright eye, an intelligent, good-humored countenance—somewhat weather-beaten—and the red rosette of the Legion of Honor in his button-hole. During the first half hour he pored over a letter, whose contents, judging from the animated expression of his physiognomy, interested him strongly. He seemed scarcely aware of my presence. At last he put up the letter, and then for the first time looked me in the face. I had been but a few days out of a sick bed, and was sensitive to the cold, and doubtless my appearance was chilly and woebegone enough, for I detected a slight approach to a smile at the corners of the stranger's mouth. To one or two commonplace remarks he replied courteously but laconically, like a man who is neither unassociable nor averse to conversation, but who prefers his own thoughts to that bald talk with which travelers sometimes weary each other rather than sit silent. So our dialogue soon dropped. The cold increased, my feet were benumbed, and I stamped them on the floor of the carriage to revive the circulation. My companion observed my proceedings with a comical look, as if he thought me a very tender traveler.

"This carriage must be badly closed," I remarked. "It is bitter cold to the feet."

"For that discomfort I have little pity," replied the Frenchman. "A ride on the railway is soon over, and a good fire or a brisk walk is a quick and easy remedy. Mine is a different case. For forty years I have never known warm feet."

"For forty years?" I repeated, thinking I had misunderstood him.

"Yes, Sir, forty years; since the winter of 1812—the winter of the Russian campaign."

"You were in that terrible campaign?" I inquired, in a tone of interest and curiosity. My companion, previously taciturn, suddenly became communicative.

"All through it, Sir," he replied; "from the Niemen to the Kremlin, and back again. It was my first campaign, and was near being my last. I was in others afterward; in Germany in 1813, when the combined Germans and Russians drove us before them, for want of the brave fellows we had left in Muscovy's snows; in France in 1814, when the Emperor made his gallant struggle against overwhelming forces; and at the closing scene in Flanders: but not all those three campaigns put together, nor, as I believe, all that this century has witnessed, can match the horrors of that dreadful winter in Russia."

He paused, and, leaning back in his corner, seemed to revolve in his mind events of powerful interest long gone by. I waited a while, in hopes he would resume the subject. As he did not do so, I asked him to what arm he belonged when in Russia.

"I was assistant-surgeon in a regiment of hussars," he answered, "and in my medical capacity I had abundant opportunity to make acquaintance with the horrors of war. On the 7th of September, for instance, at the Moskwa—Heavens! what a shambles that was! Ah, it was fine to see such valor on both sides—for the Russians fought well—gallantly, Sir, or where would have been the glory of beating them? But Ney! Ney! Oh! he was splendid that day! His whole countenance gleamed, as he again and again led the bloody charge, exposing himself as freely as any corporal in the ranks. And Eugene, the Viceroy, with what vigor he hurled his masses against that terrible redoubt! When at last it was his, what a sight was there! The ground was not strewn with dead; it was heaped, piled with them. They had been shot down by whole ranks, and there they lay, prostrate, in line as they had stood."

The surgeon paused. I thought of Byron's beautiful lines, beginning, but I said nothing, for I saw that my companion was now fairly started, and needed no spurring.

"Even as they fell, in files they lay;"

"Monsieur," he presently resumed, "all those things have been brought strongly to my mind by the letter you saw me just now reading. It is from an old friend, a captain in 1812, a general now, who went through the campaign, and whom I was so fortunate as to save from a grave in those infernal plains where most of our poor comrades perished. I will tell you how it happened. We were talking of the battle of Borodino. Seventy thousand men, it is said, were killed and wounded in that murderous fight. We surgeons, as you may well think, had our hands full, and still could not suffice for a tithe of the sufferers. It was a rough breaking-in for a young hand, as I then was. Such frightful wounds as were there, of every kind and description—from shot, shell, and bullet, pike and sabre. Well, Sir, all the misery and suffering I then saw, all that vast amount of human agony and bloodshed, whose steam, ascending to Heaven, might well have brought down God's malediction on His creatures, who could thus destroy and deface each other, was nothing compared with the horrible misery we witnessed on our retreat. I have read every thing that has appeared in France concerning that campaign—Ségur, Lebaume, and other writers. Their narratives are shocking enough, but nothing to the reality. They would have sickened their readers had they told all they saw. If any body who went through the campaign could remember and set down all he witnessed, he would make the most heart-rending book that ever yet was printed, and would be accused of gross exaggeration. Exaggeration, indeed! there was no need to heighten the horrors of the winter of 1812. All that frost and famine, lead and steel, could inflict, was then endured; all the crimes that reckless despair and ruthless cruelty could prompt were then perpetrated."

"And how," I asked, "did you escape, when so many, doubtless as strong and courageous, and more enured to hardship, miserably perished?"

"Under Providence I owed my preservation to the trustiest and most faithful servant ever master had. Paul had been several years in the hussars—was an old soldier, in fact, although still a young man; and at a time when all discipline and subordination were at an end, when soldiers heeded not their officers, officers avoided their generals, and servants and masters were all alike and upon a level, Paul proved true as steel. As if cold and the Cossacks were not enough, hunger was added to our sufferings: there was no longer a commissariat or distribution of rations—rations, forsooth!—dead horse was a luxury I have seen men fight for till death, lean meat though it was, for the poor brutes were as starved as their riders. What little there was to eat in the villages we passed through fell to the share of the first comers. Empty larders—often smoking ruins—were all that remained for those who came behind. Well, Sir, when things were at the worst, and provender at the scarcest, Paul always had something for me in his haversack. One day it would be a bit of bread, on the morrow a handful of grain or some edible roots, now and then a slice of horse-beef—and how delicious that seemed, grilled over our smoky scanty fires! There was never enough to satisfy my hunger, but there was always a something—enough to keep body and soul together. Paul, as I afterward discovered, husbanded his stores, for he well knew that if he gave me all at once I should leave nothing, and then I must have fasted for days, and perhaps have fallen from my horse for weakness. But think of the courage and affection of the poor fellow, himself half-starved, to carry food about him day after day, and refrain from devouring the share secretly set aside for me! There were not many men in the army, even of general's rank, capable of such devotion to the dearest friend they had, for extreme misery had induced a ferocious selfishness, which made us more like hyenas than Christians."

"I should think the cold must have been even worse to endure than hunger," said I, screwing up my chilly extremities, which the interest of the doctor's conversation had almost made me forget.

"It was, Sir, harder and more fatal—at least a greater number died of it; although, to say the truth, frost and famine there worked hand in hand, and with such unity of action, that it was often hard to say which was the cause of death. But it was a shocking sight, of a morning, to see the poor fellows lying dead round the bivouac fires. Unable to resist fatigue and the drowsy influence of the cold, they yielded to slumber, and passed from sleep unto death. For, there, sleep was death."

"But how then," I asked, "did any ever escape from Russia, for all must have slept at times?"

"I do not believe that any who escaped did sleep, at least not of a night, at the bivouac. We used to rouse each other continually, to prevent our giving way, and then get up and walk as briskly as we could, to quicken the sluggish circulation. We slept upon the march, in our saddles, and, strange as it may seem to you, even those on foot slept when marching. They marched in groups or clusters, and those in the centre slept, propped and supported by their companions, and moving their legs mechanically. I do not say that it was a sound, deep sleep, but rather a sort of feverish dozing. Such as it was, however, it was better than nothing, and assuredly saved some who would otherwise have sunk. Others, who would have given way to weariness upon the long monotonous march, were kept from utter despair and self-abandonment only by the repeated harrassing attacks of the Cossacks. The excitement of the skirmish warmed their blood, and gave them, as it seemed, fresh hold upon life. In one of those skirmishes, or rather in a sharp combat, a dear friend of mine, a captain in the same regiment, had his left arm carried off by a cannon-shot. After the affair was over I came suddenly upon him, where he lay moaning by the roadside, his face ashy pale, his arm still hanging by the sinews. His horse had either galloped away, or been taken by the fugitives.

"Ah, mon ami!" he cried, when he saw me, "all is over—I can go no further. I shall never see France again!"

"I saw that, like the majority of those who received severe wounds in that retreat, his moral courage was subdued, and had given way to despair. I was terribly shocked, for I felt how slight was his chance of escape. I need hardly tell you there was very little dressing of wounds during that latter part of the retreat; most of the surgeons were dead, the hospital-wagons with medicine and instruments had been left on the road; transport for the sick was out of the question. I assumed as cheerful a countenance as I could.

"'Why, Prévillé,' I cried, 'this will not do; we must get you along somehow. Come! courage, my friend! You shall see France again, in spite of all.'

"'Ah! doctor,' replied he, in piteous tones, 'it is no use. Here I shall die. All you can do for me is to blow my brains out, and save me from the Cossack lances.'

"By this time I had dismounted, and was by his side. The intense cold had stopped the bleeding of his wound. I saw that there was no lack of vitality in him, and that, but for this mishap, few would have got out of the campaign in better plight. Even now, his despondency was perhaps his greatest danger. I reminded him of his wife and child (he had been married little more than a year, and news of the birth of a daughter had reached him on our forward march), of his happy home, his old mother—of all the ties, in short, that bound him to life. While speaking, I severed the sinews that still retained his shattered arm, and bound it up as best I might. He still despaired and moaned, but suffered me to do as I would. He was like an infant in my hands—that man who, in the hour of battle, was a very lion for courage. But long suffering and the sudden shock—occurring, too, when we seemed on the verge of safety—had overcome his fortitude. With Paul's help I got him upon my horse. The poor brute was in no case to carry double, so I walked and led it, although at that time I could hardly hobble.

"'It is all useless, my dear doctor,' Prévillé said; 'this is my last day; I feel that. Far better shoot me, or leave me by the roadside, than risk your life for my sake.'

"I took no heed, but tried to cheer him. Those unclean beasts, the Cossacks, were hovering around us as usual, and at times the bullets fell pretty thick. Not a quarter of an hour had elapsed since I set Prévillé on my horse, when a shot struck his right eye—not entering the head, but glancing across the globe, and completely destroying the sight. Well, Sir, then there occurred a physiological phenomenon which I have never been able satisfactorily to account for. This man, whom the loss of an arm had reduced to despair, seemed to derive fresh courage from the loss of an eye. At any rate, from that moment he complained no more of his fate, resumed his usual manly tone, and bore up like a hero. Paul was lucky enough to catch a riderless horse, which I mounted. The worst was over, and we soon got a respite. Without troubling you with details, and incredible though it may seem to you, my poor friend escaped with life, although with a limb and an eye the less."

"There must have been many extraordinary escapes from that campaign," I remarked.

"Innumerable. There was a sergeant of dragoons, a former comrade of my servant's, who, for many days, marched beside me and Paul. He received a severe wound. There were some vehicles still with us at that time, and we got him a place in one of them, and made him as comfortable as we could. The following night we stopped at a town. In the morning, as we were about to march, the Cossacks came down. There was great confusion; several baggage-carts were captured in the street, and some of the wounded were abandoned in the houses where they had passed the night. Among these was Sergeant Fritz. Not many houses in the town were still in good condition—most of them had been burned and knocked to pieces by the soldiers. The house in which Fritz lay had still its doors and windows, and was one of the most comfortable in the place, on which account it had been converted into a temporary hospital. Well, the Russians came in, brought their wounded, and turned out our poor fellows to make room for them. Some, who could not move quickly enough, were brutally pitched through a low window into a garden behind the house, there to perish miserably. Fritz was one of these. Only just able to crawl, he made his way round the garden, seeking egress. He reached a gate communicating with another garden. It was locked, and pain and weakness forbade his climbing over. He sat close to the gate, propped against it, and looking wistfully through the bars at the windows of a house, and at the cheerful glow of a fire, when he was perceived by a young girl. She came out and opened the gate, and helped him into the house. Her father was a German clockmaker, long settled in Russia, and Fritz, a Swiss, spoke German well. The kind people put him to bed, hid his uniform, and tended him like a son. When, in the following spring, his health was restored, and he would have left them, the German proposed to him to remain and assist him in his trade. He accepted the offer, married the German's daughter, and remained in Russia until his father-in-law's death, when he was taken with a longing to revisit his native mountains, and returned to Switzerland with his wife and family. I met him since at Paris, and he told me his story. But although his escape was narrow, and romantic enough, there must have been others much more remarkable. Most of the prisoners made by the Russians, and who survived severe cold and harsh treatment, were sent to Moscow, to labor at rebuilding the city. When the fine season came, some of them managed to escape, and to make their way, in various disguises, and through countless adventures, back to their own country."

I have set down but the most striking portions of our conversation—or rather, of the doctor's narrative, since I did little but listen; and occasionally, by a question or remark, direct his communicativeness into the channel I wished it to take. We were now near Orleans.

"The letter I was reading when we started," said my companion, "and which has brought back to my memory all that I have told you—at risk, perhaps, of wearying you," he added with a slight bow and smile, "and a host of other circumstances, to me of thrilling and everlasting interest, is from General Préville, who lives in the south of France, but has come unexpectedly to Orleans to pass a month with me. That is his way. He lives happily with a married daughter; but now and then the desire to see an old comrade, and to fight old battles over again, comes so strongly upon him, that he has his valise packed at an hour's notice, and takes me by surprise. He knows well that 'The General's Boom' and an affectionate reception always await him. I received his letter—full of references to old times—yesterday evening, and am now hurrying back to Orleans to see him. He may very likely be waiting for me at the station; and you will see that, for a man who gave himself up for dead forty years ago in the snows of Russia, and begged, as a favor, a bullet through his brain, he looks tolerably hearty and satisfied to live."

"There is one thing, Monsieur le Docteur," I said, "which you have not yet explained to me, and which I do not understand. Did you mean literally what you said, that since the Russian campaign you have never had your feet warm?"

"Literally and truly, Sir. When we got to Orcha, where Jomini was in command, and where the heroic Ney, who had been separated from the army, rejoined us with the skeleton of his corps—having cut his way, by sheer valor and soldiership, through clouds of Platoff's Cossacks—we took a day's rest. It was the 20th of November, the last day of any thing approaching to comfort which we were to enjoy before crossing the Russian frontier. True, we made one more halt, at Molodetschico, whence Napoleon dated his bulletin of our terrible disasters, but then only a portion of us could find lodging; we were sick, half frozen, and numbers died in the streets. At Orcha we found shelter and tranquillity; the governor had provided provisions against our passage, the enemy left us quiet, and we enjoyed a day of complete repose. My baggage had long since been lost, and my only pair of boots were torn to shreds. I had been riding with fragments of a soldier's jacket tied round my feet, which I usually kept out of the stirrups, the contact of the iron increasing the cold. At Orcha, the invaluable Paul brought me a Jew (the Jews were our chief purveyors on that retreat) with boots for sale. I selected a pair and threw away my old ones, which for many days I had not taken off. My feet were already in a bad state, sore and livid. I bathed them, put on fresh stockings and my new boots, and contrived with a pair of old trousers, a sort of leggings or overalls, closed at the bottom, and to be worn over the boots. From that day till we got beyond the Niemen, a distance of one hundred and ten leagues, which we took three weeks to perform, I never took off any part of my dress. During that time I suffered greatly from my feet; they swelled till my boots were too tight for me, and at times I was in agony. When we at last were comparatively in safety, and I found myself, for the first time since I left Orcha, in a warm room, with a bed to lie upon and water to wash, I called Paul to pull off my boots. Sir, with them came off my stockings, and the entire skin of both feet. A flayer's knife could hardly have done the thing more completely. For a moment I gave myself up as lost. I had seen enough of this kind of thing to know that my feet were on the verge of mortification. There was scarcely time to amputate, had any been at hand to do it, and had I been willing to preserve life at such a price. Only one thing could save me, and I resolved to try it. I ordered Paul to bring a bottle of brandy; I put a piece of silver between my teeth, and bade him pour the spirits over my feet. I can give you no idea of the excruciating torture I then endured. While it lasted, assuredly no martyr's sufferings ever exceeded mine. It was agony—but it was safety. I bit the florin nearly in two, and broke this tooth." (Here the Doctor drew up his lip and exhibited a defective tooth, in company with some very white and powerful grinders.) "The martyrdom saved me; I recovered, but the new integuments, which in time covered my scarred feet, seem chilled by the recollection of their predecessors' sufferings, and from that day to this I have never had my feet otherwise than cold. But here we are at Orleans, Sir, and yonder, as I expected, stands my old Préville."

The train stopped as he concluded, and a fine-looking veteran, with white hair, an empty sleeve, and a silken patch over one eye, peered inquisitively into the carriages. I have a particular aversion to the Continental fashion of men kissing and hugging each other, but I confess I beheld with interest and sympathy the cordial embrace of these two old comrades, who then quickly separated, and, with hands grasped, looked joyously and affectionately into each other's faces, while a thousand recollections of old kindness and long comradeship were evidently swelling at their hearts.

LOSS AND GAIN: A TALE OF LYNN.

I.

EVERYBODY, possibly, does not know that there is a place on the sea-shore, nine miles from Boston, called Lynn. It has been duly chartered by Act of Legislature as a city. I am an Anglo-Saxon, and am not supposed to lack the chronic reverence for parchment peculiar to that race. But when I think of Lynn as a city, I can not forbear a smile at the assumption. I have the utmost possible regard for the Legislature of my State; the act of incorporation was read three times, and passed to be engrossed by a sufficient vote of both Houses; every thing was done that could be done, I have no doubt; but human nature, even in the Anglo-Saxon bosom, is not to be legislated down always. When Babylon and Nineveh stand imperial in your imagination—when New York and Boston stretch vast, noisy, and dirty to a degree, in your memory—what is the use of looking at quiet, beautiful, rustic Lynn, and persuading yourself that it is a city, even if a large majority has agreed that way? This is one of the points on which I agree with Sydney Smith, that it is better to be ruled by a minority for another century. At the expiration of that period, I have no doubt Lynn will be in a fit condition to claim the title I should like meanwhile to deny her. A city is, properly, an idea. In connection with a great number of edifices and paved streets, you must have a profound impression of confusion, noise, dirt, wickedness, and sadness, to form that idea. You do not get it at Lynn! There are gardens on the skirts of the streets from which the summer sunshine draws an invisible vapor of perfume, and scents the air for miles away; there are white houses in the gardens which are luminous in the transparent fire of the sunlight; there are long reaches of green waving pines stretching in a semicircle around the deep west, and shaking their balsamic odors upon the western wind as it runs over the purple sea. Do you have such things in New York or Boston? Deacon Titcomb remarked to me the other day, with a face like the chief mourner's at a funeral, that Lynn was clean g'n' over to Satan, and was a-gittin' wickeder every day. I do not deny it, although the Deacon's opinion was formed while brooding over the larceny of a Shanghai rooster from his hencoop, by some unknown vagabond, and was therefore not entirely free from the suspicion of prejudice. But if he was right, and the progress continues, what I consider to be false as history, is only true as prophecy. Prophetically, Lynn may be a city. Certainly the chartered fact before you needs to be looked at through Jacob Böhmen's (or some other mystic's) glasses to favor such a construction. I think the Legislature made a mistake—it is not at all uncommon in that body, and the Venerable Codfish who presides over their orations knows it!—I think they made a mistake when they agreed that Lynn was bad enough to make a city of. It is not, yet; but, Deacon Titcomb being witness, it is getting up to the proper civilization mark, and may soon be even equal to the total depravity of a daily newspaper!

Meanwhile the citizens make great quantities of boots and shoes there. The odor of their industry is in the streets. I mentioned just now that the air was rich with perfume from the flower gardens. So it is, but there is at certain seasons a more penetrant perfume. Walk down Common Street, or Summer Street, in the month of June, and the scent of leather floats out of the open doors and windows of the shops, and traverses the golden air in all directions. I like it. It is fragrant with New England enterprise. Down by the railroad you smell the tanneries. It was some time before I could open my conviction to the fact that there were a few shops that were not shoe manufactories. But the shoe-trade is the special occupation and interest of the majority of the citizens, and all things rotate around it. A friend of mine declares stoutly that the city authorities are leagued with the manufacturers with a view to the special maintenance of that business. He bases his opinion on the fact that the unpaved sidewalks of the place are covered with a layer of knobby gravel, which no personal economy in the matter of boots can survive. We had debated why the streets were not paved. A day or two after he brought in his new boots with the soles worn through. "Behold!" said he, "I smell a rat!" It was tinted with the town odor of leather! Moreover, the city authorities themselves are in the shoe-business, and if they do not cobble old boots, they sell new ones. My friend has a story, which he uses, I believe, as a safety valve to prevent the explosion which might otherwise ensue, when he thinks of the mayor and aldermen in this connection. He says (but I doubt the rogue) that he was expressing his amazement to a townsman at the number of persons engaged in the business: "Why," said he, "there's a manufactory even next to the meeting-house yonder!" "Yes," replied the ingenuous townsman, "that's Mr. B——'s, the Methodist minister's shop." "The Methodist m-in-i-st-er's s-h-o-p!" trailed out of the open mouth of my astonished friend. "For the Lord's sake, Cap'n, don't any body do any thing here but make shoes?" "O yes," answered the other, "there's Mr. F——, the Orthodox minister jest below; he makes boots!" My friend commonly concludes this anecdote with an extra flourish about having swooned away at that stage of the dialogue, and not coming to for twenty-four hours, which I do not advise any one to believe.

I do not purpose taking upon myself the office of town historian just now; else I might enrich these pages with much like the foregoing. Indeed, my previous remarks bear but a cousin-german relation to the narrative I am about to put down lightly here. The return of the rich June weather, which blooms and glows around me as I write, is the magic that calls up some ghostlike memories. For it was in the month of June in a year gone by, that, escaped from my clerky duties in my father's counting-room, I found myself there in Lynn, in the house of an old friend of his—Captain John Martin by name—commonly called Cap'n Martin by the townsfolk. I consider the fact of my being at his house there and then the nucleus of my story, and now I gather every thing around it.

We were all at dinner. That is to say, we had dined, and were yet lingering at the table. I was in that mood of pensive cheerfulness which usually succeeds a good repast. A light wind waved the curtains of the windows, and stirred the leaves of the geraniums on the sill. One million-moted ray of sunshine stretched its oblique line of light from the upper corner of a window, and gilded a small fly that had been resting for some time, undisturbed, on the snub end of Cap'n Phineas D. Bugbee's nose. Cap'n Bugbee's rough face was upturned to the ceiling, and both eyes were fixed thereon in a stolid stare. Next to him was little Turly Martin (short for Thurlow), gravely endeavoring to fish a fly from a tumbler of water with a fork, and sweet-faced May Martin watching him with a soft shadow of reverie in her dear blue eyes. Aunt Huldah looked benignantly from the frill of her mob-cap (the only mob-cap in Lynn!) upon nothing in particular, and patted her withered hands together in unconscious approval of every thing. Mrs. Martin, as usual, sedate and patient—it was not unusual for her to be silent. My quiet, roving eye took in the whole group, and rested upon Captain Martin. I always liked to look at him—the broad-shouldered, stalwart man. His was a fine, rude countenance, and grandly honest. The sun of many a latitude had given his rugged features their tint of iron brown. Weather of all kinds had beaten him, but he was none the worse for it. Time had marked crows-feet around his frank blue eyes—seamed his sinewy cheeks with rifts and lines—made his knobby forehead knobble, and touched his crisp dark hair with a little gray. Here was one whom the buffeting world had attacked sorely, found unconquerable, and left in peace, a strong, simple, tender-hearted man. There was his friend, Captain Phineas D. Bugbee, opposite him. The sun of many latitudes, time, and the buffeting world had worked on him too: made him brown, and bluff, and doggedly genial, but had taken the child all out of him. Nothing had taken the childlike nature out of Captain Martin. You saw it in his mild blue eyes and frank face. Look at Cap'n Bugbee, and his burly figure suggested Cape Cod, and a whole fleet of sea-boats, from a fishing dory up to a merchantman. Hear him gruffly mumble out his hoarse speech, and you heard a whole beach of tumbling surges. His big mouth reminded you of the gills of a codfish. I think he was born in canvas ducks and a pea-jacket. You could not rid yourself of the notion for your life, if you saw him once. Summer and winter he wore a pea-jacket and canvas trowsers—I think he slept in them. Somebody told me once that in Swedenborg's Heaven people keep the manners and costumes, as well as the professions, of earth—only spiritualised a little. Perhaps Swedenborg's view was misrepresented to me. But I always favored it on account of Cap'n Bugbee. It was impossible to imagine him, even in his celestial state, out of canvas ducks and a monkey-jacket. I am sure that when he gets to heaven—and if genuine good-heartedness can recommend a man for future bliss, I am sure that he will get there—his earthly garb will be unchanged. As for the common idea of wings, in his case it is impossible—though I am not so sure about fins.

The silence into which we had all lapsed was broken by little Turly springing up from the table, throwing himself into a dramatic attitude, and rattling off in a shrill voice,

"Ah—ah—de nix cum rowse, de bollhotchet, de criune, de spruce and de colokena, a-chased de monse all rounde de house—"

"ThurLOW Martin!" exclaimed his astonished mother; "you little Simon Magus!"

I laughed in spite of myself to hear this sudden volley of gibberish from the lips of the child. Captain Martin laughed too, and the stolid Bugbee tumbled out of his musings, with a dab at the fly on his nose, and gave a snort of mirth, quenched in a kind of a groan. Every body looked at Turly, and Turly, looking at every body, said, plaintively—"Now, what have I bin a-doing?"

"O ThurLOW Martin!" ejaculated Aunt Hul-dah, with a mild horror in her benevolent face, "how kin you be a-repeatin' the talk of them wicked critters at the secks—how kin you! It's a d'rect flyin' in the face of Providence!"—"And Newpport," mumbled the mirthful Bugbee, with another snort.

"I'll put a stop to his going to the circus," said Mrs. Martin, severely.

Turly began to whimper, and said he "hadn't done nawthin'—only made a little fun—that's all!"

"I want have such fun," declared his mother.

"Now, don't be hard on him, Mary," said the good-natured Captain Martin; "don't you do it agin, Turly; that's all. It ain't proper."

Nevertheless Turly was taken in hand, and went through a regular course of admonition on the spot. The large Bugbee rolled out of the room, hoarsely chuckling, in the midst of it, and I thought it a good opportunity to slip away too. I stopped in the entry, and beckoned to May. She came. I shaded my face with my Panama hat for a minute, and then, looking in her smiling eyes, said,

"I am going over there, May-blossom. Any message?"

How her fair face saddened! She turned away for a moment—

"No, Charley, nothing. Yes—wait a minute," I waited. She came back presently with a white rose-bud.

"Give him this, Charley. Good-by."

She flitted away. I put the bud in my button-hole, and tried to whistle an air from Er-nani, as I softly opened the street-door; but it died on my lips.—Now, by the tomb of the Capulets! here is a lovely kettle of fish!

The very first object on which my eyes rested was the broad figure of Captain Martin leaning on the garden gate with his back toward me!

It was evident—he had left the dining-room by the back door, gone round the garden, and there he was. What was to be done? I had no intention of letting him know where I was going—nor that I was going any where. But I smiled a summery smile under the shadow of my Panama, and went down the steps to him.

"Where are you going, Captain?" I asked. I knew—down to the shop, of course—he said so.

"Where are you going, Charley?" he asked. I replied, diplomatically, that I was disposed for a stroll "this way," and my hand indicated a western prospect ranging from Lover's Leap to Sanguis.

"Well," said the Captain, changing his mind, "s'posin' we do."

And he stepped off so suddenly in my direction that I had nothing to do but follow him. I was out-generaled! A cloud sailed over the summer of my smile beneath the Panama. I thought of Sinbad with the Old Man of the Sea on his despairing back. It was the symbol of my condition! However, I submitted with a semi-civilized grace to what I really felt was a dispensation, for I wanted to be off on my own private excursion. I submitted; I mean by that phrase, that, as we walked up the rustic street with its pleasant houses and gardens—the Captain meanwhile chatting in his cheery, affectionate way—I, with some qualms of conscience very much to my credit, was plotting ways and means for a retrieval of my discomfited attempt at a solitary exit. In this manner we reached the Salem road, and saw, northeasterly, old High Rock far up and away in the hazy air, with the little pagoda set like a wisdom-cap on the top of his bald head. It was the dawn of a new inspiration. "I'll land the Captain at his own shop-door, and then for Swampecot!" was my idea. So down a side street I turned him.

"Now then, Charley, what tack is this 'ere you're on?" curiously surmised the Captain; for if we originally intended to reach the shoe-manufactory, we certainly had been going out of our way.

"Captain," I answered, with a very grave face, "didn't you tell me you were going down to the shop?—and isn't this the nearest way?"

"Bless my soul!" ejaculated the Captain, "and so I did. I did tell yo' so, but I didn't calc'late workin' sech a Tom Cox's traverse on yo', Charley, my boy, though it looks mighty like it. I own I was a leadin' yo' wrong; but I didn't guess yo' meant to steer for the shop, when yo' p'inted theraway yonder; an' I forgot to think yo' might easy miss the course, seein' that it's three months sence yo' were here, and it's not likely yo' would have an eye for out-of-town bearings. All right; we're straight now."

This was rich! Here was the Captain laboring under the delusion that I did not know the way to his shop. Don't I, Captain? I'll show you where brogans are made, my fine man, and you'll supervise the making! Once there, you're anchored, and I'll slip my own moorings for another bight of the stream. No eye for out-of-town bearings?—Haven't I though? We'll see.

We reached the main street, with its long green common reaching down, between a double fringe of white houses, gardens, and fresh trees, to Lynn Centre. The ocean seen by glimpses from the eastern streets was level sapphire, flecked with dancing and dazzling gleams.

"That 'ere sea looks bright and blue to-day, Charley," remarked the Captain, with a sad gravity in his mellow voice, "but it's got a hungry maw. What's the chance a ship and crew 'd find down this 'ere coast in the November gales? Ask Captain Bugbee! He knows. That's the water kin bile right smart in cold weather, and cook your duff for yo'. Cape Horn ain't a suck-umstance. 'Twont compare for stress of foul weather. I've weathered the Horn many's the time, and know. Captain Bugbee 'd tell yo' there's no danger there 'worth mention, if yo' don't manage ship like a cook's mate; but here you've got to look sharp for your soul. Ah! they're dreadful gales, and that's a fact."

And the Captain sighed, and lapsed into a kind of anxious reverie. I had an intuition that he was thinking of his son—Frank Martin, a fine lad who had gone to sea some three years before, and was now, if rumor said rightly, on his homeward way. It seemed to me, as I watched the pensive sadness that brooded upon his brown visage, that the great, tender heart was yearning for the boy. So I remarked quietly,

"When do you expect him home, Captain?"

"Well, we've ben a looking for him this—" He stopped short—jerked up the rim of his straw hat from his forehead, and fixed his blue eyes upon me with a solemn stare.

"How'd yo' guess I was mindful of Frank, Charley? Answer up, yo' witch!"

"Captain—I saw it in your eye," I believe was my explanation.

"Um-m—well, it's not unlikely. You're cute, Charley: in my eye it was, maybe—mind likewise. Well, Frank ought to be home'ard bound about now. Charles, I feel dre'ful uneasy 'bout him, times—I do."

"He will come home safely, Captain," I suggested; "never fear that."

"Ah, well; yes. The middle sea's safe as the harbor, for the Lord's over all. But my mind 'rbodes somethin', and I feel onrestful like, times. Now I know some folks say it's all stuff and nonsense, though the Bible's full of it, but—d'ye ever trust dreams, Charley?—that's the question."

"No, I don't, Captain: why?"

"Don't?—Sho! Now, I'll tell yo' the reason why. Tother night I dreamed I saw Frank aboard ship. Ship bowlin' along in a runnin' sea. Right afore my eyes the youngster scuds up the rattlins, and perches h'elf clean on the tip end of the main-yard. There he sot."

"Well, Captain," said I, "what does that signify?"

"Peril! Hark yo', Charles, and don't call me an owl!" And the Captain laid the big forefinger of his right hand in the big palm of his left, in a demonstrative sort of a way, and lowered his voice to a hushed bass—"When I was in the fo'castle of the Nancy—off Madagascar—I dreamed that of a shipmet—a great lubberly Manxman. Next day that chap was a man overboard, and afore we could pick him up, the sharks had him. Fact! they did. Hark yo' agin. When I was first mate of the John Darvil, merchant'm'n, in the Bay of Biscay, I dreamed that dream. I saw a man perched up there, but I couldn't make'm out—though I knew he was one of our crew. Next day a white squall struck us, and blew that m'nail clean out of the bolt-rope, and down come the yard, and hit a New York fellow, named Jervis, on the head, and knocked the life out of him! I never had that dream but somethin' happened—never! Last time but one, I was Cap'n of the Ann Arbor—brig with produce and lumber from Bangor. That time it was m'self that sot up there on the m'nyard. Sure enough—"

"Hold on, Captain," I interrupted, "did you say it was yourself you dreamed sat up there on the yard? How is that? You are not dead, you know—at least you look as if you were alive."

"Ah, well," replied the Captain, smiling grimly, "I was comin' to that. Off the Isle of Shoals, the Ann Arbor went ashore in a tramogony gale, and stove to flinders on the rocks of White Island. We all made out to git clear with our souls in our buddies that time; but, I tell you, 'twas a close chance. Besides, the eventooal consequences of that wrack to me, might be counted in."

"Captain," I said, not noticing his last sentence, "you got clear in spite of the dream; so will Frank. Don't be anxious; don't borrow trouble."

"Ah, well," replied the Captain, musing aloud with a sad face, "he's in the hands of the Lord, and that's my anchor. Eighteen years, come next October—and it's little short of your own age, Charles. In the hands of the Lord—that's a best bower. But anxiety's human and nat'ral."

What could I say? I was touched with his solicitude for Frank, and tried to mould a speech that would show him my sympathy. While I meditated to this effect, my good intentions were suddenly ended by a question—

"Now, Charley, what yo' goin' to do with yourself this afternoon?"

How my heart jumped! Shall I tell him? Feeling carried the day. I threw disguise to the winds.

"Captain, I am going over to Swampscot." His face paled a little beneath its swarthy brown.

"I am going to visit Gervayse Phillips. Captain, don't you want me to go?"

A flush came to the brown visage, and his eye sparkled. He answered quickly,

"Of course I do. He's your friend, Charley, and its nateral you'd want to see him. Do yo' know old man Phillips?"

"Not much; I have met him several times."

"It's all right, Charles. I've no dislike to young Vayse; he's a fine fellow, but his father—oh! his father's a villain—a cold, hard, proud, mean villain! There, God forgive me. I didn't mean to say it; it's not talk fit for a Christian man, but I can't help it."

"Oh, Captain Martin, don't speak so. Don't let your antipathy for the father prejudice the son in your eyes. Now hear—"

"Entipathy I've none—leastways for Vayse," he broke in with nervous energy; "but look here, Charles—I see through yo', and I don't dislike yo' for't. It's nateral for yo' to be spokesman for your friend. But hark yo', no son of that family shall ever be husband to my darter, and if my word's law, May Martin shall be took to her grave afore she treads up the church-aisle with Gervayse Phillips. It's said and done. Charles, he's your friend—tell him that. I don't dislike him, and my sperit's sorely grieved for May; but it's fixed, and there's the end on't."

His face glowed, and his firm lip trembled, but there was grief in his passion. I could not account for this strong aversion to the elder Phillips. I had been long aware of it, and I knew it lay at the base of his opposition to the intimacy between May and Gervayse, but I had never been able to discover its motive. I was determined to discover it now.

"Captain," said I, "will you tell me why you entertain so bad an opinion of Mr. Phillips? Did he ever injure you—or what is his fault?"

He hesitated. He had grown very pale, and a great struggle worked beneath his fine, rude features. His lip quivered as he spoke.

"Charles, why do yo' ask me? I didn't mean ever to speak of this. Your father knows all about it. Did he never tell yo'? He didn't; well, I will. Here's the shop—come in."

We had reached the manufactory, and now entered the neat counting-room, which was partitioned off from the ample space in which the workmen plied their trade. There was no one in the counting-room but ourselves, and we sat down. I was now in no hurry to be off; I wanted to hear the Captain's relation. Besides, it was only a few minutes past one o'clock, and the long summer afternoon was before me. My heart fluttered under my gay vest like a bird in the hand, as the Captain sat wiping away a light perspiration from his forehead, and smoothing his iron-gray hair in silence. A great elm tree stood near the open window, and all its pendent leaves were trembling in the still summer air, and listening. The confused tapping and clicking of the workmen's tools in the outer room, seemed faint and far away. I fanned myself with my Panama until I began to grow warm, and then desisted.

"It's a long story, Charley," he began at last, "but I'll make it a short one. Listen, boy.

Fifteen year ago, I was skipper of the brig Ann Arbor. That's the vess'l I told yo' was wracked off the Isles of Shoals—d'yo' remember?

"Yee, Captain; the lumberman you spoke of."

"The same. Brig with produce and timber from Bangor to Boston. The owner of that craft and cargo was Squire Phillips. Yee, sir; Squire Phillips was the owner—that was one of his ventures, and I was Cap'n of the brig. Mark yo', Charles, Squire Phillips was a rich merchant even then; he was wuth full twenty thousand dollars—he's taxed for seventy thousand now. I was nothin' but a poor seaman, servin' his interest, and keepin' my family above water with my pay. Frank and May were two and five year old babies. Young Turly wasn't born. One afore that time, and one sence, of our children, we laid down sorrowful in Lynn churchyard. Hard times were they, and m'urnful with us, but they're gone. Squire Phillips did all he could to make 'em harder.

"I'll tell yo' how. That vess'l, in as mad a gale as ever blew, lost her fo'mast and tiller, and was thrown up on the rocks of White Island, where she lay with her hull beatin' the stones, and the awful surge breakin' over us. There was a light-house, yo' know, on that island, and fearful it was in the howlin' gale and the black night to lie right under the dim light of the beacon—jest bright enough to show us our perilous state—and the brig goin' to pieces, and we grappled to the riggin'. But that saved us, enyhow. A mighty sea lifted us a rod from there, and sendin' the craft inland, down she came smash, with her hull jammed into the rocks. That wave had sent her on to the edge of a kind of cove, and drow her up a leetle under the lee of a cliff, so that she didn't feel the swell so much, though the surge poured over the rocks onto her in torrents every minute. Now right under the p'int, about twenty yard from us, was a narrow ledge runnin' out from the landin'. The beacon showed it, all mad with foam and spray. It was our only chance, but we never could hev reached it; for if we trusted ourselves overboard in that crazy sea, we should hev ben dashed to death on the rocks, or sweep' off by the undertow. That's what we thought. But one of us did try it. He was a nigger fellow, and did the cookin'—a mighty powerful-built man, and brave. Lord! how the feller jumped down deep into my heart! He actilly went overboard on the reek, and though he was gashed some, he did reach that ledge. He wedged h'self into a split of the rock to keep from bein' sweep' away—for the water broke over there from the p'int under our lee to wind'ard, at times clean coverin' him—and we made out to get him a rope at last. We saw him try to make his end of the line fast to the crags, but he couldn't do it; and at last that fellow wound it round and round his buddly, and braced himself. He was a brave nigger, and we owed him our lives. He sung out to haul taut on the rope, and lash ourselves to it one by one. That we did, and us aboard keepin' the line as taut as possible—so that the fellow slung to it shouldn't be split to nothin' on the rocks—the nigger hauled us in, we payin' out the line gradual, and keepin' her taut. Jest as soon as a man gained the ledge, he unsling himself from the rope, and watchin' his chances, when the undertow sweep' the reef bare, he struggled in upon the beach. In that way the whole crew, seven in number, were got ashore, bruised bad, but none lost. I was the last to leave the brig; and havin' no one to keep the line taut, I was hauled in loose, and got bruised considerable on the rocks. But we were all saved, and got sheltered in the light-house, and doctored up by the keeper.

"Next day the wind hed hauled off to the south'ard, and the storm hed broke. We went, some of us, down on the beach. A strong off-shore breeze had flattened the ocean pretty smooth. But no sign of that brig, or a bit of her cargo, could we see. She had gone to pieces in the night, and we never found enny thing belongin' to her but the anchor, which was lyin' among the breakers, atween rocks. Nothin' was saved but the brig's papers: I hed brought 'em ashore in my bosom. She was about half insured.

"Well, we got up to Boston at last, and the first thing I did was to call on Squire Phillips. He was very kind; didn't seem much grieved for the loss. He knew I hed done my duty like a seaman and a man, and he said so. He mentioned that he was so trustful of me, that another vessel would be placed under my charge in two or three weeks—a coaster. I made up my mind to take the skipper's berth offered me, and told him. I was mighty stiff and sore with my bruises on White Island rocks. I come down here to Lynn, and Mrs. Martin was rejiced greatly at my safety. She was stayin' with her mother then and the two babes. And there and then she persuaded me to quit seafarin' for reason of the danger, and to begin in this business. It wasn't hard pleadin', for I felt sick of the sea jest then, and promised easy. Besides, I knew somethin' about shoe-makin', and more about shoe-dealin', and thought I should make out. Well, it needed some capital for a start, and I made my calculations on what was owin' me from Mr. Phillips. I'd ben Cap'n for him several years, and hed let my account run up pretty much with him—only drawin' jest what my wife wanted for her use—and there was quite a balance in my favor. I calculated on that. So I looked up a shop; I got a month's credit for my stock, kit of tools, and so on, and made ready generally. Then I went up to Boston, and saw Squire Phillips.

"It was one morning, and he was alone in the counting-room. I told him I'd concluded to give up seafarin', and mentioned my intentions in regard to the shoe-trade. He seemed a lee-tle disappointed at first, and said he was sorry my interests were to deprive him of a good Cap'n, who had been always so prompt and sure for him. But he wished me all manner of success in my new occupation, and said he'd be glad to do enny thing for me if I wanted it. Well, at last I spoke about a settlement, and he jumped up, and said he was ready, and at my service. His books told how the account stood in a few minutes. There was a clear balance in my favor of twelve hundred dollars. Squire Phillips looked a-kinder thoughtful as I made out my bill for that amount, and reated it. 'Captain Martin,' says he, 'I owe you a larger sum than I expected. Now I'm a leetle pressed for money just at present, and if yo' can without inconvenience let this stand for a couple of weeks, you'll oblige me. But if you want the money now, I'll give yo' a check at once. Only say the word.' I'd hev done enny thing to oblige him; he'd always treated me well, and I told him so, and let the debt stand. Amen! God forgive him!"

The Captain paused, and wiped his damp forehead. There was that in his voice and in his face that made my heart throb thick and fast. I felt timid under the mild and sad look of his eyes, and looked away to the street. The pendant leaves of the elm still seemed to listen, and then, as a light wind swept through the tree, they were a mass of agitations; and tremblings, and low sighs, and murmuring voices, over the divination of a secret and a shame.

"Charles, that man has prospered in this world. He's got wealth and worldly goods; but there's a sin at his heart, and he want be a thrivin' man when he comes afore his God. Listen, boy: I was a poor man then, toilin' for my wife and babes, and that money was hard to lose. But it isn't that I consider now—it's the baseness and fraud. It's the mean act that moves me. I felt it then like madness; but that's gone, and I've tried sence to forget and forgive, like a Christian man; but I can't forget it! I came back to Lynn with a trustful sperit, and commenced business. At the very outset I was prosperous; I got a good connection for my trade, and all promised fair. I told yo' that I hed my stock, kit of tools, and so forth, on a month's credit. I couldn't git more at first, for I wasn't known, and I trusted sure on my wages to meet that bill. Three week went by, and in another my creditor—he's a man of this town, and a close man, but honorable—he'd be after his lawful due. Well, I went up to Boston town, and saw Squire Phillips. He was very smooth and kind, and asked after my business; and I told him jest how matters stood, and mentioned that I hed come, agreeable to request, after my money. I didn't know what made him look so puzzled, and I thought he'd not understood me; so I told him over. The blood in my baddy chilled cold in me when he said, 'Hev you another demand against me, Captain Martin?' I thought he was jokin' at first, but he looked so proud and cold that I knew better in a minute. 'Mr. Phillips,' I said, 'I never hed but one, and that ain't canceled. Yo' don't mean to say you're not owin' me twelve hundred dollars?' He looked at me with his proud, stern face for a long minute, and then he said slowly, 'Captain Martin, I want you to understand that I never pay the same bill twice.' 'What do yo' mean, Sir?' I said, in a fury, for I saw the villainy. 'What do you mean?' thunders he: 'do you mean to deny your own resate, man?' And he jumped up to the desk, and took out a paper, and held it before my eyes. I saw it all! I'd put my head in the noose. I told yo', Charles, that the first day I called on him, three weeks before, I'd made out my bill, and signed it in full for all demands to date, thinkin' that I was to get the money then. And that resate I'd left on his desk, and forgotten! Never remembered aught about it till then! There it was, in his hands. Not a witness—not a grain of evidence—to help me to my right! Says he, 'If this resate is not enough, I can prove that I sent a check to the bank with your name on it for this amount, on the very day you were here, and drew the money. Do yo' recollect the circumstance?' says he to a clerk. The young man said yes. No doubt he'd carried the check, and got it cashed, but the sum had went into Mr. Phillips's pocket. 'The check is in the bank,' says he, 'and kin be produced if necessary: here's my voucher that the money was paid you,' holdin' up the resate. I was a ruined man!

"Charles, the feelin' that my claim was under that man's foot—the thought that wife, and children, and business were beggared and bankrupt, if he chose—made me meek. I humbled myself to that proud swindler. I told him of my state. I told him that my business—the bread for my family—depended on that money. I begged it of him! He heard me for a time. I'll credit him for not makin' me doubtful that somethin' of the feelin' that makes every human man—the worst and the best—own up to the hand of the Lord that made him—was in him; for by the twitchin' of his face, and his changin' color, I saw that his conscience was grapplin' with his lie and fraud. Then, at last, it ended; and he told me to leave the office! The cuss that was in my heart never came to my lips, and I went and left him.

"Fifteen year have passed sence then. Often have I met him, and I see him 'times now. And when I pass him, silent, I see shame and trouble in the proud face where I saw aforetime uprightness and honor; and I know there's a sin at his heart, and a worm that'll never die! And now his son—a fine, brave boy, with a face that makes me 'murn in secret for the likeness to his father's afore he wronged me, and 'murnful for the world's sin that may change it—he comes a-courtin' my May; and he don't know—for his father 'll keep his own counsel on that matter from his boy—he don't know why I tell him he can't have my consent to his marryin' my gal. I've seen him lookin' troubled when he saw by my face my heart was kindly to him, and I knew he was tryin' to think out the riddle, and couldn't. And May, too—she's pale; and my gal's happiness is dear to me. Don't I know he'd make her a good husband, manly and true, with great store of the world's goods for house and home—don't I know it? And May's not poor; for her father's independent, spite of all; and her mother goes in favor of the match, in her love for the child, and her forgiveness for what's past; but I can't forget the injury done against me by that man, and I'll never bring a cuss upon my child by consentin' that the unrepented sin of that father, visited on his son, shall be shared by her and the babes unborn who'll call her mother. I'm set against it. It's my dooty. The worst wrong Squire Phillips could do me he did, and I never harmed him; and he knew 'twould be my mortal hurt and ruin. I can't look with favor on his son for the memory. Charles, yo' can't blame me."

"No, no," I said, with my heart swelling, and dimness blotting out the sight from my eyes, "I can not blame you. It was base—it was unmanly. He was a rich man, and he spoiled the feeble fortunes of the poor. The father of my friend! O Captain, I never thought Mr. Phillips capable of an act like this! No honor—no reparation. It was base. No, no; I understand your feeling, and I must respect it. I am sorry for Vayse and for May, but I can not blame you."

My voice failed me, and I choked down a sob that rose from my heart. How still the room was—how dim the sound of the workmen's tools without—how the green leaves trembled on the tree.

"Look up, boy, and don't yo' grieve. You're a true friend, and Gerayse Phillips ought to be proud of you. Glad would I be to sink the reef on which these young hearts are wrackin', for I mind the time when I was young. I can't! It's a wide, sharp, solid ledge of wrong. I've seen sorrow and trouble; but this is wild, and worst of all, and I shall bear it heavy on my spirit till I go down to the low moorings in Lynn churchyard, and anchor close by my dead babes. I can't but think of that man's wrong, and its ruin to the love of his own boy!"

A long silence followed. I could not but feel that in his opposition to the union of his daughter with my friend, if there was not a particle of logic, there was all the reason in the world. I felt too that their love was without hope or promise—the fruitless blossom was to wither on the tree.

"Captain," I said at length, anxious to divert my mind from the thought, "you told me that when Phillips defrauded you, your property in trade was at the mercy of your creditor. Did you lose it? Of course you did, I suppose."

A sudden flush blazed out on his sun-browned face; a glisten in his blue eyes. His lip trembled once, and then was firm again under the dilating nostril, and still, in the strange stir of his features. And when he spoke, a blind, agonized feeling in my bosom rose up, and groped toward his meaning at the gathering thrill that quivered in his hoarse and earnest voice.

"Charles, shall I mention what befell? Listen. I waited patiently for the day of my ruin. I could in no fashion make up that sum. I waited, and on the day afore that bill came due, when I must go and say I couldn't meet it—I found a friend. In the street I met him, and I hadn't seen him for long, though we'd ben boys together. And he met me so cordial, that my heart warmed in my despair. So when he asked me why I looked so down-hearted, a feelin' came that made me tell him all, though I never counted on his bein' able or willin' to help me. I never told that story out of my family to aught but him and you; and I told him then. And that good man saved me! Prompt was he; and he said it musn't be so, and that he'd lend me the money, and, if need be, twice the money; and he sot me up straight. He did; and I've never forgot it!"

A cloud had darkened my brain—a sudden light burst through it. I divined the spirit in his eyes—the emotion on his face—the meaning that kindled in his words, and shot through the electric currents of my frame with an inspiration, and a triumph, and a pride. I rose to my feet.

"It was—"

I stopped. He had risen with me, and his hands were on my head. A great change worked in his large features, and the glisten in his eyes went out in brimming tears.

"God bless yo', boy. There's truth and honor in your bright eyes and your honest forehead. It's his blood that's warm in your face, and his soul's in you. Ay, Charles, it was him that rescued me. It was your own father."

Over that revelation long minutes passed away. The tears dried from my eyes. I was filled with a calm sense of satisfaction, but my heart was too full to speak. I sat and watched the waving of the tree, which now swayed musically in the west wind of the afternoon. I remember that a spotted butterfly fluttered down upon a twig near the window, and poised alit upon its balancing, slowly moving its gorgeous wings, like the brilliant spirit of the summer. And then, when it flitted away into the sunshine, a bright blue-bird swooped suddenly from the air, and, resting in the green agitation of the branches, warbled out a clear brief trill that was hope and happiness to hear, and flew away.

"Captain, I will go," I said. "We have talked long enough, and I want to think of what you have told me, and settle my mind."

"Yes, Charley," said the Captain cheerily, "it's nigh on to two o'clock; I feel yo' had better leave me, for I'm thoughtful in spirit with these recollections. But, now—not a word to your friend about what's ben said—not a word to Vayse!"

"Not a word, Captain," I replied; "I will not speak of it. Good-by, Captain."

"Farewell, Charley; come home to tea."

On the steps I saw, rolling along toward the shop, the great Bugbee. Straw hat pushed back, neckerchief untied, monkey-jacket all flying. Bugbee was in a tropical heat. There was a red mark from the hard rim of his hat on his swarthy forehead; his face was wet with perspiration; he was holy-stoning it with his rough sleeve.

"Hullo!" he said, with a hoarse, subdued roar, "Taint hot. Ain't it, though? I'm briled. Back's hot's a roast hog, and the hide's cracklin'. I'm done—eat me!"

"Cap'n Bugbee," I ventured, "why in the world don't you put on a thin coat?"

He careened, and rolled off with a growl: "Thin coat! Hoo! Thin coat be——" No matter what he said about the thin coat.

II.

Off I went. Gervayse Phillips's house was out behind the town of Swampscot, which, as every body knows, lies northeast of Lynn. I went that way, musing on all I had heard, and was just going by old High Rock, lost in a trance of reverie, when two firm hands were laid upon my shoulders, and, from a proud and noble face, with a flush of pleasure lighting up the golden brown of its healthy tan, two large hazel eyes, with real star-fire in their liquid shadows, looked straight into mine. My heart leaped up to greet him.

"O Vayse! I was just going over to your house," I shouted, with his strong grasp in my ardent hand.

"And I was going after you," said Gervayse Phillips. "Father saw you in the cars from Boston yesterday afternoon (though you did not see him), and as you did not come over to me this forenoon, I made up my mind that you were, as usual, at Captain Martin's, and came over to you. A special Fate directed my route, for here you are."

"And right glad I am to see you," was my impulsive retort. "You are as strong as ever, I feel," for his grasp had hurt my hand. "Now then, whose horse and carriage is that? Yours, I think. And what cloud did you drop out of?"

"My dear Charley, there is not a cloud in the sky, therefore it is fair to presume I drove soberly on the road. It is strange you did not see me; but I noticed that you were blind with meditation. Come, what were you thinking of?"

"You, of course. Love is always blind," I said, with a gay laugh.

"Really!" he replied with his grave smile; "And is love deaf too? for you might have heard the carriage wheels, at all events. If love had been blind on both sides, you might be marching over to Swampscot on a vain look-out, and I driving over to West Lynn—"

"Without this," I interrupted, handing him May's white rosebud from my button-hole.

"Ah! for me?" he said slowly, his face changing to a dusky pallor, from which the beautiful eyes glistened their starry lustre; "do you know the language of flowers? This, for instance, means—Hopeless Love." He held the rose to his fine, thin nostrils; but I am sure, if I had not looked at him, he would have pressed it to his lips.

"Yes," said I, "hopeless love."

The illuminating flash had died away. He was very pale. I hardly noticed then that, during the three months which had elapsed since I had last seen him, a quiet sadness had stolen into his face, and a more pensive tone into the clear, grave music of his voice. I only noticed the same inexpressible delicacy and nobility of face and figure which had so often charmed me. The proud and graceful demeanor of the head, with its chivalrous fall of dark waving hair—the dark brilliant eyes, under the calm arch of their black brows, giving light and soul to the sun-tinted, angust features—the broad, full chest—the piled muscle of arm and thigh, and the whole lithe, elegant outline of the elastic frame, unconcealed by its close-fitting garments, made up an image from the days of the cavaliers. It seemed to me then the perfect ideal of manly beauty. It was the dream of gallant Richard Lovelace, with the graver grace of Philip Sidney, realized in the New England sunlight, beneath the Puritan shadow of old High Rock. So fabled the imagination. Yet, as the memory of what the Captain had told me a little while before gilded into my mind, and the silent sorrow of the face slowly revealed itself to me, I hooded the eyes of vision, and remembered that this was Gervayse Phillips, with the white rosebud in his fingers, and the truth of which it was the symbol, cold and silent in his heart. And I, with my counsel, was to aid Time, and medicine that hopeless love to its cure—renunciation and forgetfulness.

So we entered the carriage and drove over to his father's house, behind Swampscot. Behind Swampscot meant a mile back from that town. His father's house meant, on the outside, a fine square wooden mansion, gabled and ornamented, standing near a carriage-road that ran past thick green pine-woods, with an everlasting murmur and a song in their Gothic branches. It meant stables and barns, with horses and cows, and fowls of all descriptions, from the arrogant turkey-gobbler to the stilted Shanghai hen; and an ample range of farm, and orchard, and meadow-land, girdling its precincts. On the inside, it meant all that is elegant and tasteful in the way of rich furniture, pictures, and delicate perfume pervading its cloistered air. Perhaps it included the gentle, quiet lady that came forward to welcome me, whom I saluted as Mrs. Phillips; and the fair young girl, the daughter, Clara—so beautiful and saintly—who gave me her small white hand, with a thrill in it that stole quietly to my heart, and smiled a greeting from the mystical deeps of her brown eyes.

Now, I am not going to be minute. I should like to present you a finished and carefully tinted picture, instead of this uncolored sketch, whose scenes and figures are only traced in outline, and no more. These outlines you must fill up for yourselves. When I say that I passed a very pleasant afternoon, let it suffice. Part of the time I sat with Gervayse in a little summer-house in the garden, advising him earnestly to renounce his passion for May Martin. He answered with his usual eloquence; but every thing he said was an evasion of my counsel, and an effort to lead me into some disclosure of the reason for Captain Martin's opposition to his suit. He knew well that I could tell him, but I was on my guard, and he learned nothing. I felt that it was better for him to remain in ignorance. But I told him there was earnest truth in May's rosebud, and that Captain Martin was as inflexible as granite; urging him to be wise, and let the love of hope pass silently into the love of memory. It pained me deeply to say this, but I said it.

His last answer was a mystic smile that stole slowly over his face, and passed away in a sombre cloud of dark reverie, which overcast his calm white forehead, and dimmed the brilliance of his shadowy eyes. My own reflections took a deeper color, as I saw the tall figure of Mr. Phillips, black and silent—the head bent upon the chest—walk slowly up the sun-lit avenue with his hands behind him, and his long shadow going before. He entered the house without seeing us. Strange, I mused, that that man can know of his son's love for the child of one whom he has so deeply wronged, and yet never discountenance it! Or is it cold wisdom on his part, and does he know that the matter will cure itself without his interference? A few minutes after we went into the mansion.

Mr. Phillips was reclining on an ottoman. I had made up my mind that I could not now meet him without aversion. But he rose, and gave me his hand with so much of the irresistible magnetism of the gentleman in his demeanor—so mild a smile upon his proud, fallow countenance—that I could not, for my soul, help respecting him. Though I loathed the sin, I could not despise the sinner. He excused himself for the position in my presence—he was weary and unwell, he said—and again lay down upon the couch. There was a secret pain in his thin, worn visage—for the welcoming smile had faded. I thought of Captain Martin's words—"There's a sin at his heart, and a worm that'll never die!" It was true. I pitied him.

We had conversed but a few minutes, when Gervayse left us, remarking that he would return soon. We were alone. I felt uneasy in the hush of the perfumed air. The white and crimson draperies of the windows drifted to and fro in the light wind. I saw his wife and daughter walking in the garden under the sun-flecked shadow of the trees. The pale and saintly face of Clara was turned toward the window. I knew that she could not see me, but it seemed as if she looked at me like a warning spirit. I turned my head away, and met the sad and brooding gaze of his dark eyes. He dropped them when I looked at him, and spoke in his calm, distinct voice:

"Mr. Seymour," said he, "you are stopping at Captain Martin's house, I believe?"

I rejoiced that he did not look at me when he said this, for a burning flush shot up on my forehead; but I answered, "Yes." A long pause ensued.

"Gervayse tells me," he resumed, "that his suit does not advance with Captain Martin's daughter. You look startled. Gervayse confides his troubles to me always. This matter is no secret."

"Mr. Phillips," I said, "you surprise me. I know that Gervayse has told you of his feelings toward Miss Martin. Do you countenance this affair?"

"Why not?" he replied, fixing his melancholy eyes on my face—"why not? You do not answer. I love my son. I think him best competent to choose his own wife. I will never interpose my parental authority between the loves of these young people."

"Well, Sir," I said, "I suppose you think that the matter does not require your interference."

This was a rash speech, and for a moment I regretted it. Mr. Phillips was silent. A perverse audacity was the birth of that silence in my brain.

"You do not intend that Gervayse shall enter into mercantile pursuits, Sir?" I remarked.

"With my consent—no!" he answered. "You may think my tone in relation to what is held to be an honorable profession, somewhat fanatical. Well, you are a young man, Mr. Seymour, and I—am no longer young. God makes human nature noble, but the foul fiend of Trade leads it into mean paths, thickly sown with pitfalls of temptation, and destroys it. No: Gervayse will probably be a physician—he must never be a merchant."

"Surely, Sir," said I, "you do not think that a merchant must of necessity be dishonest?"

He fixed his eyes on my face with a look that searched my soul. I schooled my features into an expression of stolid simplicity.

"Mr. Seymour," he remarked, "I did not mean, of course, to imply that. But if commerce does not always break the mirror, its breath always stains it. The principles of the counting-house are cold and mean, at best. I have found them so, and I have no wish to train my son by them. I speak of things as I see them. Study the character of our New England ancestry! Then look at the life and character of our people to-day! We are now little better than a tribe of peddlers. What has wrought the change? The love of gain! It has absorbed every noble passion, and every generous instinct. We are energetic at nothing but making money. The blood of the Puritans has been sopped up from our veins with bank-notes. The heart of the nation has been crushed out with dollars. You think I am morbid? No: I am sound. Professions at last become institutions in the life of every people. Art—Literature—Mechanics—do they not foster certain tendencies common to every mind, until they become ruling passions, and vital forces in the man? The merchant's profession too, has become an institution. It nurtures greed—avarice! Do you know how many natures—upright, honorable, proud natures—have foundered on those rocks of Trade?"

His face was calm when he said this, though the expression of remorseful pain had deepened on it like a shadow; but a strange, subdued passion seemed to writhe and groan in the cold, still tones of his voice.

"Mr. Phillips"—I spoke now with a religious fervor mantling in my veins like liquid fire—"you are undoubtedly correct; but then, I have been taught to believe that no profession in life is without its temptations, and that the best of us are liable to fall. But I also feel that no nature indeed upright and honorable will be content with mere regret or remorse for its past sin, when it can practice the redeeming virtue—which includes repentance—REPENTANCE!"

He rose from his recumbent posture and looked at me. His face was livid, but not with anger. The melancholy pain was woven with a frightful smile. I felt then that this was an erring, not a bad man.

"Mr. Seymour," said he at last, "they used to say of the sermons of an old English preacher, that there was a congregation at the end of every line. You too, I see, shape your sermons to the comprehension of your auditory. Well, Sir, at least you are frank and honest."

At this moment Gervayse entered the room, followed by Mrs. Phillips and Clara. Mr. Phillips resumed his former position on the ottoman. We all began to converse with vivacity, and he bore his part in the conversation with apparent ease. At last the slanting shafts of the sunlight warned me to depart. I rose to go. Mr. Phillips came forward and gave me his hand. There was nothing but kindness in the firm clasp. He said he should always be happy to see me at his house. They were going to Newport next week for the summer months; if my inclinations led me thither, he would be glad to see me there. So said Mrs. Phillips—so said the gentle Clara. Gervayse insisted on driving me to Lynn. Jim Blake the natty groom came up to the gate in a few minutes with the horse and carriage. While I lingered at the hall-door, speaking with Mrs. Phillips, and dying my death under the sweet, brown eyes of Clara, Jim Blake aforesaid went through a course of dramatic posturing at the horse's head. We relieved him at last, and drove away. Little was said on either side until we came to Lynn Centre. There I insisted on getting out and walking the rest of the way. Gervayse stopped the horse, and we both descended from the vehicle, and stood with clasped hands on the narrow path by the Common.

"Charles," said he, with his fine eyes steadfastly fixed on mine, "what were you and father talking about this afternoon when I came in? You were pale, and he was dead-white."

"Gervayse Phillips," I answered, with an energy that made him lift his calm eyebrows in wonder, "if you love me never urge that question! I can not answer it! My heart is full of grief for you. I am going back to Boston."

Resign all hope for May; she loves you, but it is all in vain."

His beautiful face colored to a fiery crimson, and his earnest eyes tried to search my mystery. But no! Then he said that it was strange, and he took a little note from his breast-pocket, and asked me to give it to her. I took it. We clasped firm hands and parted. When I had gone a hundred paces, I turned with a swelling heart to look after him. He was standing in the same place. The elegant figure—the graceful head, with its locks drooping from under one of the most cavalierish of brown Panamas—all in all, it was a form worthy of a place with the fairest of our dream-pictures of the gallant rufflers of old days. He lifted his hat in token of adieu, and I saw him no more.

Captain Martin's yellow house, and garden, and full-foliated trees were radiant in the glorious sunset when I stopped before the door. A great hull of dark cloud lay anchored on the edge of the horizon. The upper sky was full of crimson vapors like floating pennons. A vast purple cloud, fringed with brilliant gold, rested between the streamers and the lowest mass, like a sail; and the sun descending, as I gazed, behind it, rained down his rays, like golden cords, into the moveless bulk below, and completed the splendid phantasma of the Ship of Sunset! As I looked, Captain Martin put his large hand on my shoulder from behind.

"Ah, Captain! isn't that beautiful?" said I.

"Lovely, Charley. The sun's settin' up his shrouds and backstays. That's what we called it at sea."

I admired the Captain's phrase very much. It described the appearance admirably. By-and-by, I went around the house into the garden. Near a dwarf lilac-tree—one of many that freshly scented the air—with some of its flowers in her hand, stood May. With her slight, graceful figure—her fair tresses lightly bound, and touched with pale gold from the sunset—she looked like the spirit of the Lilac. Her white forehead was bent over the flowers in her hand, and she did not see me.

"Come here, O Fair One with the Golden Locks," said I; "come here and be lectured."

She came lightly, with an innocent smile in her violet eyes.

"Now, Mr. Charley, what are you calling me names for?"

"For fun, May-blossom. That was a nice errand you sent by me to-day. O, if I had known your flower-language, never a thorn of your white rosebud would I have planted in Ger-vayse's bosom! But here is the answer;" and I gave her the note.

The lightest tint of scarlet suffused her fair face as she put it in her bosom—the lightest shade of sadness succeeded.

"Come, now; that's good, I declare. You're not going to read that billet aloud to me then?"

"Hush, Charley; here's Aunt Huldah." Captain Martin's sister came from the back door into the garden. An old maid! It is the world's flippant gibe. I think it is the flesh and the devil's too. At any rate, I never had any patience or sympathy with it. Apart from the poetic reverence which I love to throw around the sacred image of virginal Age—apart from the Ideal, there is the homage due to the Fact. They are, as a class, the best women in this wicked world. Aunt Huldah was the gathered excellence of the species.

"Good evening, Aunt Huldah," said I—she was not my aunt, but I always called her so—"it is a beautiful evening."

"Beautiful evenin', Charley," replied Aunt, with a benignant smile lighting her wrinkled face to the crimped border of her white mob-cap, "smells sweet as pennyroyal out here."

Round the garden I went with Aunt Huldah, and learned the names of the flowers and herbs. May fitted off into the house to read her note. Down by the hen-coop the fowls recognized the mob-cap, and a yellow clucking hen, evidently schooled liberally on the subject of Hens' Rights, acted as chief spokesman, and petitioned for corn. Aunt Huldah, like a wise legislator, took it by handfuls from her ample pocket, amidst general satisfaction, and threw it in. The yellow hen croaked out "luck, luck," as plainly as a hen could, when we went away. Slowly the last gold of sunset melted from the sky. Out of the east arose, large and yellow, and rounding up in pearl and purple vapor, the early moon. Young Turly Martin came running out with the thin summons of his childish treble, and fided us in to tea.

The evening passed agreeably. May joined her pleasant voice to the music she touched from the piano, and Mrs. Martin's tenor, and young Turly's treble, flowed together in one harmony that made the songs, plaintive or gay, soften the heart like the dear hymns of childhood. Not out of place either was the monotonous undertone of Cap'n Bugbee's bass. It growled in finely. But Cap'n Bugbee's mind was always throwing up old grievances, and he stopped the concert with one of his hoarse chucklings of inner mirth, and said "It allers riled him to think on't." "What's now, Bugbee?" questioned Captain Martin, smiling at the rough Cape Codder, who was surging about on the sofa in a tumult of oceanic merriment. "It's that peep of a mate, Sprague," roared Bugbee, choking with laughter, "and it riles me awful. There, right off Nantucket—last winter—hoo! what'n ugly sea, an' night a-comin' on pitch black, and the Borax pitchin' about till ye'd think judgment's comin'."

I interrupted him for a minute by laughing vehemently at the idea of his bursting in upon us with a story about something that happened to him last winter! His stories, however, never dated any nearer.

"Board o' the schooner, yo' know, we'd shingles, an' a pile o' notions, an' a load o' pigs; an' some of the pigs were mine, and t'others warn't. Schooner pitched 'bout till ar'y thin' got knocked round noways, an' the pigs got loose, and mixed 'bout yelpin' and gruntin'. So I seed things was in a brile, an' next thing I shouldn't know my pigs from next man's. So I sings out to Sprague to fetch the paint-pot from b'low decks, so's I could mark my pigs; then let 'em wix, I thought, and I'll know 'em 'n mornin' eunny way. Long time comin' with the pot, I thought, and the pigs gittin' wus an' wus, an' more of it. So I shuffles down arter Sprague, an' the fast thing I hears him a-tellin' on to Jim Brown in his cased squeak of a vice—says he, 'Bless'd if I ever heerd the like o' Cap'n Bugbee. Here's the schooner likely to go to the Old Scratch ary minit, an' Cap'n Bugbee's so cussed greedy he wants the paint-pot to mark his pigs so's he'll know 'em in Eternity!' Darned if it didn't upost me! The ugly mink! An' I ony wantin' to score the pigs so I'd know 'em in the mornin'!"

Cap'n Bugbee's uncouth mirth struck the key-note for a general burst of merriment. The story lasted him all the evening. He had exhausted himself, and could not tell another. But Captain Martin told us some, with a genial humor that made them mellow as light. Aunt Huldah, too, gave us some experience of her feelings during a voyage from Martha's Vineyard in a sloop with a very Sinbad of a skipper, who falsified all the known rules of navigation, and had hurricanes that blew the anchors into the cross-trees, storming through all his narrations of the perils of the coast, until her nerves and credulity gave way together.

Ten o'clock came, and we all retired. All but me. I sat alone at the eastern window of my chamber, thinking vaguely of all the day had revealed to me. At last I became restless—I wanted to be out in the dewy silence and moonlight for a night ramble. To get out without going down stairs was not possible without disturbing the sleepers. But directly under my window was the sloping roof of the woodshed. I took my hat, gained the roof silently, and, dropping lightly into the garden, in a minute I was in the street. I lit a cigar, and walked away from the house. The night was very beautiful. The moon that rose so large and yellow, had lessened into an orb of silver lustre, and soared slowly up the blue zenith. Its quiet glory lay softly on the sleeping town like a veil of charms and slumber, and rested dimly in languor and beauty on the Saugus hills. Far out upon the melancholy sea the red brilliance of the Light-house glowed like the Great Caruncle of the legend. In a faint murmur the surge breaking on the distant beach, and around the rocky bases of Nahant, sang lullaby to the dreaming air. Heavy balm drifted up from the gardens. The night-dew steeped out the rich spice of rose-carnations—the perfume of heliotropes and roses, and the fragrance of pine and cedar trees. Light and noiseless winds flitted about in the trance of the summer moonlight, laden with their odors. I wandered about like the sole phantom of an enchanted land—lost in the vaguest musings.

So, at last I found myself returned to the house—languid with a delicious weariness. I stood in the shadow of the lilac trees in the front garden, leaning on the fence. I looked at my watch; it was just ten minutes of twelve. As I turned to enter the gate I saw a figure emerge from the bend of a dark street at some distance, into the moonlight, and approach the house. Quicker than thought I was in the garden behind the leafy screen of the lilacs and rose-bushes, peering out at the coming stranger. Something in the proud, erect demeanor of his form made me start when I first saw him, without precisely knowing why. Could it be? In a couple of minutes he came up to the outside of the open fence behind whose foliage I was lurking, and stood in the shadow within two feet of me. It was Gervayse Phillips!

I was petrified. What brought him here from his distant home at such an hour? He stood very quietly. I got a glimpse of his face through the leaves, and saw his dilated eyes, slightly luminous under the shadow of a broad felt hat, fixed intently on the door. Instinctively I turned my head toward it. The moonlight rested on the fluted pillars of the porch, which cast a shadow on the upper portion of the dark panels. As I gazed, I saw the shadow creep slowly down, and then pause. The door was opening! I sank down like a dew drop into the wet grass. The next instant the white and sylph-like figure of May glided out into the moonlight, and passed noiselessly through the gate, under the shadow of the lilacs. The note! I saw it all.

Crouched in the dewy grass, and peering through the leaves of the bushes within a yard of them, I saw her go quickly into his arms. No word was spoken. Then she suddenly disengaged herself with a low sob. I saw her face, white and sad in the shade. A thin ray of moonlight, floating softly through the leaves, touched her tresses with a golden glory, and rested on the graceful outline of her white drapery. Then her sweet voice, low and calm, filled the silence:

"Gervayse, I must go in. It is wrong to be here. I came because you urged me, but only to see you once more, and for the last time. Now you must go, and try to forget me."

"I shall never forget you, May," said Gervayse, "never—never!"

"Be good and happy, Gervayse, for my sake," said the sad, sweet voice, "and promise me that you will never see me again. Promise! I must not disobey my father. My heart is breaking to leave you—but you must never see me again. Promise me, Gervayse!"

"Oh! May, May!" said Gervayse—his calm voice passionate and broken—"I will not promise—I can not! You will kill me! Tell me why your father opposes our love—tell me, I implore you. Charles Seymour knows, and he will not tell his friend. And your father knows, and will not tell me—and you will not. Every one knows but me. Tell me, May—tell me!"

My heart was swelling to agony in my hiding-place. I longed to be away—but I dared not move.

"Gervayse, I can not tell you. Forgive me, Gervayse—forget me! And now go. Promise never to see me again, till I meet you in heaven. I shall wait for you there. Now I must go in."

He took her to his arms with a passionate clasp. The light figure was still—the fair head rested on his bosom. I cowered in my concealment, with my straining eyes spell-bound to the pair, and my wild heart beating. She lifted up her patient face to his. The gleam of moonlight stole across it, and showed it white and wet with streaming tears.

"Farewell, lost May," said Gervayse. "Life has lost every thing but memory in losing you."

The answer was low and sweet, though it rose from the agony of a broken spirit—

"I shall love you forever!"

Their lips met in one long, silent kiss, and the whole night was still. The moon passed behind a cloud—the magic light faded from the garden. A low wind passed through the shadow of the air with a weird sigh, and darkness filled the chambers of my brain. Then—a faint rustle—the spot where they had stood was vacant, and I saw her glide into the house, like a noiseless ghost through the door of a tomb. The minutes passed away. I rose from the ground. Weak, and crushed with emotion, I gained my chamber as I had left it. Once there, I threw myself on the bed and wept freely. Sleep, mournful and dreamless, came and soothed that sorrow.

III.

The afternoon sunshine of the following day found me in my father's counting-room in Boston—deeply absorbed in (if Mr. Phillips's views of commerce were correct) the Black Art of Double Entry. The summer waned drearily away. That day and night at Lynn had cast a shadow over it. I received one or two letters from Gervayse, dated at Newport—brief, blank, calm letters, that were painful to read. He found no pleasure in the ghostly fopperies of that watering-place, he said, and longed to be at home again. He purposed going to Europe, to continue his studies as a physician. I saw him for a day in Boston in the early autumn. He was sorrowful and careworn. The lustre of his eyes was fed from a consuming fire in his heart. He said nothing of the love which had dissolved into an eternal memory, and a dream of the dream which had passed. The beauty of his youth was withering.

In the month of November—during a storm which held out nearly a week, and strewed the Atlantic seaboard with wrecks—I went to Salem on business, expecting to be absent from the counting-house for two or three days. When I reached that city, the gale was at its height. Houses were blown down—trees torn up by the roots—the wharves and cellars flooded, and every few hours brought intelligence of vessels foundered or driven ashore along the coast by the fury of the tempest. The streets were dangerous to pedestrians, with falling slates, and signs, and toppling chimneys. It was a time of panic and peril. An unforeseen circumstance enabled me to complete my affair at Salem much sooner than I had anticipated. I set out for Boston the following morning in the cars. As they rattled over the tram-road, my thoughts were busy in reveries of May and Gervayse, mingled with the rushing of the rain and the wailing of the wind. When the wheezy engine stood, panting and snorting as if from the speed of its course, at West Lynn, I yielded to my impulse and got out. The rain came down steadily from the brown clouds, but the wind seemed to have lulled somewhat, although a whirling blast now and then swept the drenched fallen leaves from their shelter, and blew the rain in my face. I walked through the wet and dreary streets, now disenchanted of their summer beauty, to Captain Martin's shop, and was welcomed heartily. The Captain vowed that I should not go on to Boston until the next day on any consideration; and, at last, I abandoned my intention of only staying a few hours, and acceded to his wishes.

Going home with him at dinner-time, I astonished Mrs. Martin and Aunt Huldah very much. Aunt said she would as soon have expected "a seraphim" as me in the month of November. May greeted me with a hectic bloom on her pale face—it faded soon, and I saw there was deep and patient suffering there. She was dressed in black, which made her pallor almost spiritual by contrast, and relieved the pale gold of the curls that rested on her sable drapery. But she spoke very cheerfully, and almost charmed me out of my anxiety for her.

And now, these reminiscences are nearly ended. What happened afterward came very suddenly upon us all. Whenever I think of it, I am reminded of the stories they relate of the East Indian jugglers. They put, it is said, two or three seeds in the dark, sad ground—cover the spot for an instant, and then, uncovering it, up shoots a little tree, which in a moment bears leaves and blossoms, and in another you eat fruit therefrom. So Destiny, out of our darkness and sadness, juggled up a sudden tree of Life and Love, and gave us the golden apples of the Hesperides! In this way:

We had tea very early that evening. If Cap'n Bugbee had been on the premises, I might have staid in and studied him. But he was gone to Nantucket. So, about six o'clock in the stormy gloaming, I took it into my head to go out. Out I went, and up street. The rain had ceased. The gale was rushing and howling about the streets like an invisible maniac, and the low, sullen sky was full of shadows that fled in pallor and darkness to the horizon, like an army of chased ghosts. The air was chill, but not cold. In the fitful pauses of the wind I could hear the dull, continuous roar of the breakers on the beach. They were loud that night. All muffled up, I walked down the main street by the Common. There were lights in the houses and the stores—some, dim and dismal, in the windows of the shoe-shops; but I hardly saw a single person in the streets. As long as there was no rain, I had no care for any thing else in the ordinary way of tempest.

I was going along very placidly when I heard a carriage behind me. As it came abreast, the horse, trotting quite rapidly, and guided by a slack bridle, suddenly slipped on the miry road and tumbled headlong on his knees. I sprang into the street, and caught his head as he staggered up again under the firm check of the rein.

"I am much obliged to you, Sir," said the occupant of the carriage, descending; "I was driving very carelessly."

I turned round with a great start, and caught him in my arms. I knew that grave, distinct voice immediately.

"Vayse! by all that's wonderful!" I cried.

"Charley! And in Lynn! This is worth any thing on the right side of a broken neck!"

We embraced like two girls, for the manner of the thing; for the ardor, like two bears! He broke the crystal of my watch in my vest pocket with the strength and closeness of his clasp; and, if I had been on the right side, I would have broke the crystal of his with the energy of mine. Locomotive—not a bad name for a horse who went down on the road!—was not hurt; his forelegs were well daubed with mud—that was all. We entered the carriage and drove on. Gervayse had driven from East Boston, and was on his way home. I told him how I happened to be in Lynn, and we agreed that it was a fortunate meeting. Taking the sequel into account, I think it was.

Talking very rapidly, we turned the curve of the long street near Lynn Centre, when the full sweep of the blast came down from High Rock into our faces, with a force that shook the carriage beneath us in its motion. At the same moment we became sensible of some new movement in the street. First some men passed us, all running in one direction; then others came out of the shops, and stood looking after them, or followed in full chase. We drove up under the lee of the Exchange Building, and reined in. Gervayse leaned from the carriage, and accosted a man who stood in the doorway of a basement store:

"What is the matter, Mr. Brown?"

"Ah, Mr. Phillips! It's a vessel going ashore on the coast."

How the answer thrilled us! We drove at full speed down to the Railroad House, and put the horse up. Then we ran down Ocean Street to the beach, with the heavy thunder of the surge sounding in our ears, and the mad wind shrieking and rushing past us. In the distance we saw the wild glare of fires kindled on the Nahant road, lighting up the low, dark ridge of dwarf pines along the coast, between them and the roaring sea. It was not until we passed the last houses on our left, and ran down the slope of the street to the dead level of the low land, that the full fury of the wind pounced upon us. For a moment we paused, and turned our backs to it. Then we rushed on blindly, with the frantic gale yelling and staggering down from the northeast, and rushing about us in a wild vortex of confusion, and the tremendous uproar of the breakers hoarsely tearing through it, and growing louder as we neared them. Dark figures passed to and fro, or stood grouped about the fires, with their long shadows waving and flickering on the lurid flats, and dancing on the flashing sheets of wild light shaken out upon the barrier of stunted trees, from the writhing and leaping flames. The very ground shook beneath our feet with the tremendous concussion of the surges, as we gained the sea-wall, and paused breathless among the excited crowd by the fires. In a few minutes I recovered my self-possession sufficiently to observe the scene around me in its details. Two drenched sailors, who had got ashore, crouched near the flames. Presently a small body of men came rushing from the opening in the trees, dripping wet, and bearing two more. They were thoroughly exhausted with their desperate struggle in the breakers, and sank down feebly on the wet sand. Some one had brandy for them; others threw tar-barrels and driftwood on the hissing fire, which shot up anew around the inflammable fuel in volumes of black smoke and blood-red flame. What with the bristling heat—the wild splendors awaying about from the fiery piles—the yelling of the wind—the crashing din of the waters—the quakings of the earth under the solid blows of the surf—the pallid faces of the cowering mariners—and the multitude hurrying and crowding around them—every one shrieking (for every one was talking, and, to be heard, you had to scream at the top of your voice)—it was a spectacle that reminded one of the hideous Hells of the Dantean Inferno!

Presently Gervayse, who stood by me, caught me by the arm, and shouted in my ear, "Come and see the ship!" We ran along the barrier till we reached the opening, and plunged through into full sight of the vast and heaving mass of turbulence swinging in thunder on the shore, within twenty feet of us. For a moment I saw nothing, for the spray and small pebbles and sand were dashed in my face, and blinded me. I was wet through in an instant, and cowered down, half expecting to be submerged under a black and weltering wall that rose in the air crested with white foam, and stood gathering and swaying above me. The next moment it toppled down with a blind and heavy crash that shook the beach, and rushed out seaward in seething spray. It was not until we reached a group of men who stood up the strand toward Nahant, that the awful sublimity of the scene burst upon me. The vast shadows, black and livid, fled in torn masses across the wild sky. Through the raking scud of spray and flying sand I saw the ocean—an avalanche of dark and thundering water, that came drifting and rushing to the shore, with a sweep and a roar of gathering foam, and fell down upon the strand, shattered into a frantic mass of tumbling surges, that leaped and poured over each other, and spoomed up in white madness to the sky, until they were swept off by the boiling undertow. The howling of the wind, whose ponderous currents swayed above us, filled up the pauses of the tremendous din. I could not see the vessel at first, and was about to scream out a question about her, when some men around me made a rush to the water, and pulled out a man who was floundering in the shallow breakers. He was carried off at once to the fires which shot out their lurid gleams through the dark screen of dwarf pines behind us. Just then I saw the vessel, careened on the summit of a gigantic surge. It was a brig: her masts were stumps; and as she rose I saw a hamper of spar and canvas lifting against the dark hull. The next moment she plunged headlong to the shore, staggering wildly in the swell. Then it combed from under her, and I heard the heavy thump of her hull as she struck, and saw the waves pour over her in torrents. She lay very near the shore, with her bows jammed into the sands, and her stern lifting heavily. Another fire had now been lit on our side of the sea-wall. By its light we saw her deck, and a few figures clinging to the bulwarks, at times completely covered by the surges that broke over them. Two or three men set off for ropes to aid them in venturing near the breakers—it was perilous work without them. Before they got back, there was a catastrophe!

By the strong glare of the fire, we saw a figure drop from the side into the rising trough of a coming wave, and plunged forward for the land. We lost sight of him an instant after. I felt a wild excitement as I saw him emerge, struggling or swimming gallantly. The mounting wave swept over him, and rushed on the shore. When it broke he was floundering in the foam. Two men sprang forward and caught him. As they turned to regain the beach, a second wave combed over the three, and then a third. A long minute passed. Out of the mad tumble I saw two men stagger blindly and reach the sands. The sailor was not with them! He was swept out to sea!

An awful pity filled my heart. Gervayse stood by me, white in the darkness, with his long hair wet with spray and streaming in the gale under his slouched hat. Suddenly he caught my arm with a grasp that hurt me, and pointed to the ocean. I looked—there was the sailor again! He was swimming convulsively. No one stirred to save him. The men were intimidated by the danger they had escaped so narrowly in their last effort. They shrank away from the coming surge, shaking their heads. I felt at once that he must perish. By the light of the flames, I saw his livid face in the black sea, and the energetic struggles he made for life. The waves rushed over him. He emerged again. Again the waters covered him, and then in the wild tumble upon the shore I saw him battle—and yield! That instant, Gervayse Phillips, stripped to the waist, rushed past me with the spring of a tiger into the breakers, and clutched him in his arms. My heart stood still. It was only one masterly exertion, and with the body heaved to his left shoulder, and his vigorous arm clasped around it, he plunged forward with the water to his knees, when suddenly he slipped, and fell with his burden in the seething undertow. The wave combed over him with a stunning roar—swept back—he was gone! I stood palsied and aghast. I looked around me—there was horror on every face. The mad fright that rose up in me suddenly changed into a flood of excitement that poured through every vein like molten fire. Right out of the black and awful sheen of a weltering mass of foamless surge rushing inland, I saw him rise, with his naked breast sheer above water, and saw a single powerful sweep of his right arm. There was but one impulse in the group—we all sprang forward to save him. The surge crashed down—there was a struggle in its roaring roll—a plunge—and he tore through, with an overleaping wave behind him, into the shallow breakers—the body in his arms. A dozen hands clutched him—he broke away from all in the desperate impetus of his passage, and never paused till he bore his burden twenty feet up the beach, and sank fainting beside it.

We took them up and carried them hurriedly behind the sea-wall to the fires. On the way we met a crowd, cheering lustily, with a double file of men in their midst running along with something on their shoulders. It was the Swampscot fishermen bearing the life-boat. We joined in the cheer as they passed us, but we did not pause until we reached the fire. Gervayse revived in a few minutes under the usual restoratives, and began very leisurely to put on his wet clothes, which some one had brought him. He was thoroughly exhausted with his effort. I had often seen his feats in Boston, when he was the foremost athlete of the gymnasium, and matched the best of the German Turners at their play, but I never saw him make such an exertion of skill and strength as this in all my life. When he rushed by me from the water, and I ran along with him, his very stature seemed dilated with his energy, and the muscles and veins of his frame were swollen and starting like balls and cords. He had at that moment the steel thews of a Titan. His first lift of the body looked like the slight effort of one catching up a child. Brave, gallant Vayse!—I was too glad to speak to him.

The sailor lay insensible on the ground in the arms of those who were laboring to restore him. For a long time their assiduities were fruitless. Gervayse knelt down with them, and lent his aid to chafe the cold limbs till their pulses began to beat again in the flow of the life-current. He recovered slowly, and looked about him in fear, for his last thought of desperate terror in the surf was the first memory of returning life. He was a young man, seemingly about twenty years of age; of a slight but muscular mould. His face was well-featured, and swarthy even in its pallor, like that of one who had cruised in warm latitudes. He recognized Vayse with a bewildered smile; then fainted again. One fellow near me, with a face which reminded me of a pig and a hatchet, piped out in a shrieking voice,

"Guess he ain't got much stiddy grit in him; ain't rugged, and good to bear."

"Yuh damned blubber!" roared up a guttural voice from the brown and hairy chest of a weather-battered seaman, with an intense disgust in his rough features—"ef it arn't enough to make a man green-sick to harken to ye! Had yuh ben bowed about in that swash like young Frank here, yu'd feel your grit scuttlin' too, yuh blue lan'shark!"

"Frank!" I said quickly—the fact was, the young sailor's face had been haunting me. I yelled into the old tar's red conch-shell of an ear—"What's your shipmate's name?"

"Franky Martin!" he roared back into mine.

I nearly fainted myself. In the pale, swart face of the young man, just looking out of its swoon, I recognized the Captain's son, as I saw him three years before! I remembered the dream—the man perched out on the main-yard! Then I made one stride, caught hold of Gervayse, pulled him through the group with a force that nearly upset him, and screamed out the discovery. He stared at me, with his hands clasped in mine, and his firm lips set. But the scarlet shot up into his pale face, as I shouted, wild with hope and joy—

"May's brother; do you hear?—her brother! O Vayse, you've saved his life—you've risked your own! It's coming right—hurra!"

I ran off, with a shout, ten steps; then I walked back calm, and told him that we must bring Frank home—and told him to have him carried as far as the first houses on the road, where I would fetch the carriage. Off I dashed at full speed—reached the hotel, and drove the vehicle from thence to the place appointed, where I met Gervayse, and two or three men, with Frank in their arms, just coming up the slope in the streaming wind. We lifted him into the back seat—(it was a four-wheeled, double-seated, covered carry-all)—Vayse got in beside him, and I, taking the front, seized the reins and turned the horse's head for West Lynn. It was a great relief to get away from the full stress of the gale, and the thundering din of the waves. We could talk now without screaming, as we went along at a tolerably rapid pace over the road. Frank told us how it chanced that he was cast ashore so strangely in a coasting brig on the beach of his native town. I may as well tell that story here, as it is a short one. He had sailed from Boston in the merchant-ship Salome, bound for Liverpool, and from thence to Calcutta. She was an old vessel, and a bad sailer. In addition to the two ports above-mentioned, she had been heard from at Fayal in the Azores, and at the Cape of Good Hope.

From the Cape she was expected homeward. She was obliged to put in at St. Helena for repairs. It appears she sailed from thence to New Orleans, her last destination before she reached Boston. Homeward bound at last, she sprang a leak in the Gulf Stream, and was forced to put in at Norfolk, Virginia. There she was condemned as unseaworthy, and the crew discharged. Frank found a berth in the coasting brig Judith, bound from Norfolk to Boston. The Judith had lain beating about in the gale, and was finally driven in upon Lynn beach, a total wreck. It appeared subsequently that all the crew got ashore—the Swampscot fishermen man their life-boat well! I saw the hull of the brig afterward, lying high and dry on the sands in the summer sunshine, and the sea playing with the pebbles on the shore, like a gray sloth that could not be roused.

We were all silent as we reached the house. As we drove slowly at a walk up to the garden-gate, Frank again fainted from weakness and agitation. Gervayse took him in his strong arms like a child, and descended from the carriage, telling me to push open the gate, and open the hall door. I accordingly swung the gate back, and running quickly up the short walk, mounted the steps with a bound, and pushed the door ajar. He was coming slowly up the path with his burden. There was a light shining from the parlor-windows on the left side of the house. The windows were on a range with the steps, and the curtains were undrawn. I leaned over from the porch, holding to the fluted pillar near me, and looked in. I saw Captain Martin standing in the centre of the room—his arms folded—the lamplight shining full on his face—the face sadly fixed toward me. I should have wondered at the attitude and expression, if I had not seen instantly a dark figure seated near the window, with its back to me—the head bent low upon the bosom. Great Heaven! It was Mr. Phillips!

A frozen sweat started on my forehead. What had happened! I turned just as Gervayse entered the house with Frank in his arms. I sprang after him—threw open the parlor door, and entering the room before him, crossed behind the Captain. The pause could not have been more than a second, but there was a pause. Then Gervayse, erect and pale, passed the threshold with his load, and crossing the chamber, laid it on the sofa.

"Captain Martin, do not be alarmed; it is your son."

He turned. Mr. Phillips had risen with the deathliest face I ever saw. Front to front with him—their gaze bound to each other—stood Gervayse in his drenched garments, his wet hair hanging by his pallid countenance, and a shadowy light moveless in his dark, dilated eyes. Captain Martin stared at them aghast. Behind him, I watched them all. Not a word was spoken in that rigid trance of wonder. I opened the door near me, and stood in the adjoining room. Mrs. Martin was on her knees weeping. May stood by her, pale as death. I whispered to them that Frank was there! They vanished past me into the parlor with a cry; then all was lost in a confusion of words inarticulate to me, and sobs and tumult.

I stood silently with my beating heart in the chamber they had left. In the dimly lighted gloom a rigid form sat bolt upright, surmounted by a white mob-cap. Her face too was ashen in the crimped border that encircled it. Not a wrinkle on it moved.

"Aunt Huldah," said I, "Frank has come home."

"Lor! Charley," she sighed, putting her trembling hands to her bosom, and looking at the dim ceiling, "you don't say! O what a fluster I'm in. I shall die sure."

"Aunt, what is Mr. Phillips here for? What has happened?"

"Don't ask me," she said, getting excited, "it's done! John Martin kin read his title clear to mansions in the skies! Charles, he hes forgiven him—he hes. Sech a time. He hes forgiven him. Hallelujah! By Jemime!"

It was the first time I ever heard Aunt Huldah swear. In her excitement she mixed up a drop of profanity in her well-spring of piety. I rather liked the flavor.

"Aunt, Frank has been shipwrecked on the coast. Vayse Phillips saved him, and brought him home. Frank is in a swoon. You must doctor him."

Up she started. Penny-ryal, sage, catnip tea, peppermint, aniseed, ginger, a little composition, hot bricks for his feet, hot blankets, carry him to bed this minute! These were the leading items of the prescription she poured out with a torrent-rush of excited garrulity in the next room, whither I had followed her. Frank had revived; his parents bent over him. Gervayse had sunk into a seat, silent and bewildered. Mr. Phillips stood mute, with his colorless face fixed upon the group. The slight figure of May in its black dress drooped over her brother. It was she who discovered that his clothes were dripping with sea-water. Aunt Huldah's last command was instantly obeyed—he was borne off to bed. But before he went his tremulous hands were stretched to Gervayse, who came to his side, and took them in his own.

"I owe him my life," said the husky and broken voice; "father—mother—he saved me. Thank him—thank him."

The failing voice wandered into a hoarse murmur. Captain Martin, with his lips compressed, and the tears streaming on his brown face, grasped the hand of Gervayse—I saw how they both trembled. Mr. Phillips came over, and said they had better go: he would call on Captain Martin again when it would not be intrusion. But the Captain asked him to stay a few minutes, and he sat down. Frank was led off to rest and medical treatment. Aunt Huldah vowed that Vayse and myself would perish in our wet clothes, and but for our assurances to the contrary we would have been carried away, filled to the lips with cordials, and smothered in hot blankets, for aught I know.

They all came back, except Mrs. Martin, who would not leave her son—and Mr. Phillips was the first to ask for an explanation of all this. And I told them the whole story of the wreck as I have told it here—only with a ten-fold vigor and enthusiasm, and with a pictorial effect of expression and gesture which illustrated my words, and made all their meaning plain. Mr. Phillips listened in apparent calmness, but I knew by the still lustre burning in his sad eyes that he was proud of his son. Captain Martin could not speak, but he clasped the hand of my friend with a fervor of gratitude which was more than speech.

Mr. Phillips stood up. His face was mournful and humbled, but I could see no shadow of the secret pain that once brooded there.

"Captain Martin," said he, "there is no one present who is not familiar with the mean wrong I once did you, except my own son. I have yet to tell him of that shame—not all a shame, now that it is repented of. The four-fold reparation I have offered, and you refused—forgiving me freely, you will not decline—you must not—you shall not. I do not deserve your forgiveness, but you have given it in your charity, and I take it as such. Sir, I have told you that it was my one sin; it has been the bosom-sin of my life. I have told you the temptations that led me to it. I have carried it in my heart for fifteen years. Pride kept it there. Pride steeled me against my conscience. Pride delayed repentance. It is over now. Pity me from your soul, and, if you can, forgive me."

He paused. How the words thrilled me from the lips of that cold, proud man! Was it alone the remorse of fifteen years that had been at work, building up a new nature in the silence of his being—this nature, nobler than that which had fallen into ruins by the blasting magic of a single sin! Silently it had grown behind the obdurate, concealing barrier of pride. Yes; but in a night, a hand from the unearthly had thrown down the outward shell; a spirit, not of earth, had crowned the structure with the granite of repentance. The man stood ennobled and redeemed; but he confessed the hand of the shadowy Master who perfects mortal life! The touch, never felt on earth but once, was cold at his heart. The still, small voice, so awful to us all, and never heard on earth but once, had spoken to him!

His son sat with his pale cheek resting on his hand—an unearthly brilliance in his shadowy eyes. I felt as if some tranquil and awful Presence stood unseen in the silence of the air and blessed us.

"Mr. Phillips," said the Captain, "I have forgiven all. It's never to be remembered against yo'. God alone knows the stress of our temptations, and their power to drive us. I forgive yo'—may He be merciful to us all!"

You have canceled my m'urnful remembrance; your brave boy has given me back my son from the hungry maw of the sea. Let fifteen year agone be forgotten."

Clasped hands. A proud head sunk upon a heaving breast. A bronzed face bright with heavenly compassion. Deep and hushed, and swifter than all, that sense of a tranquil Presence shadowing the quite air.

"Come here, May. Your face is pale, my girl; it's grieved me long. Stand by me, Gervayse; I've mourned for the fever in your eye, and the whiteness of your cheek, but the sorrow's passing. Mr. Phillips, I know your spirit's will; yo' can bless this night for your boy and my daughter. Their hearts hev ben married for long."

Silently the pale man took his son's hand, and laid it in the little palm that rested on the Captain's brown fingers. The other hand lay upon his son's head, and his trembling lips were moving in prayer. The old seaman's eyes were glistening. But May and Gervayse! The erect and gallant figure bore a head whose eyes were filled with flashing star-fire, and the carmine of youth had leaped up radiantly to his cheeks from the rich, red blood of heart and vein! The fair face of May had a faint stain of spiritual crimson in its halo of golden hair, which the loveliest tint of the light-red rose never had, and, in the brilliant light of the room, her graceful figure in its sable robe, stood like the spirit of mild Love! Soft, rich, mellow words of old Jean Paul—you came like music to my memory then! "Two pure heavens had opened in two pure hearts, and there was nothing in them but love, peace, and joy, and the little tear-drop of earth that hangs upon all our flowers."

"O, it's awful!" ejaculated Aunt Huldah, with her apron over her mob-capped head; "it's perfectly consumin'. I shall die, as I hope to live and be saved. Hosanna!"

No one heard this singular ebullition of joy but I, who stood near the old lady, and chuckled in secret.

"Faith, Captain," I remarked, "if you had any more Mays to give away, I'd be urging my claim! As it is, I must resign myself to the doom of a bachelor."

"Ah! Mr. Charley," said Gervayse, "you look like it! Whose eyes charmed your fluttering fancy one day last summer at Swampscot? Who was it you asked after so often in Boston a couple of months since?"

This was a retort with a vengeance. I was completely unmasked, and blushed like a fool.

"Mr. Seymour," said Mr. Phillips, "will be well received at Swampscot, if he will come. I shall be grateful to him if he always speaks his mind as freely to Gervayse as he did to me last summer."

I succumbed, and went off to bring Mrs. Martin down. She came. Always a quiet woman, she was speechless under strong emotion. She only held her daughter to her heart, and wept. We were all very happy.

A moment, and I am done. Mr. Phillips had risen to go, and Gervayse with him. One carriage still stood at the door—there was another at the hotel. Captain Martin gave him his hand. He grasped it firmly, with a sad and mild smile on his wan face.

"Good-night, Captain. I feel light at heart. A strange feeling, Sir. I have not felt it since boyhood. I have sinned. God be merciful to me a sinner!"

"Amen!" said the Captain, solemnly; "to us all!"

They were gone. An invisible shape seemed to have passed with them, and taken away some light from the slowly saddening room.

Five months after there was a gay bridal at Captain Martin's house. I stood groomsman to Gervayse. Clara was May's bridesmaid. Her mystical brown eyes smiled so during the ceremony, that I grew dizzy, and shortly afterward, at Swampscot, lost the bacheloric equipoise. There was another bridal a year afterward—but not there.

Not there! The invisible Presence had darkened the house with its shadow, and it lay there long. Cold and strange would have been the festal glory on walls where the solemn and benignant Phantom, who comes but once to all, had left its icy breath. A proud spirit, humbled and broken, and purged, as I trust, from all the sins and stains of earth, had gone home to God. The wedding throng that met there in joy, and gallant raiment, came again a month after in sorrow and in funeral robes. The April rains were heavy upon land and sea when we stood by his tomb. And when the mourners were all gone, I still lingered in the place of sepulture, and saw, with a solemn heart, among the brown weather-stains upon the granite portal of the vault, one which my sombre fancy fashioned to the semblance of a worm. Yet, as I mused upon the mournful symbol of our littleness and mortality, I saw, with a feeling gliding over my spirit like a soft rebuke, rising, in the same brown tracery, from the body of the creature, the faint and shadowy outline of two wings!—Farewell.

SICK BODY, SICK BRAIN.

OCCASIONAL illustrations of the superstition of the middle ages have led writers to remark on the great prevalence of insanity, caused in the good old times by the mixture of horrible thoughts and lumps of diseased fancy with the ideas common among the people. Of the wretched position of unhappy lunatics, persecuted, maimed, tortured, and burnt by neighbors and magistrates, who accepted as facts all their delusions, and convicted them by the testimony of their own wild words, illustrations are common. But the region of superstition that remains yet to be sketched is very rich in produce of this kind. I do not mean to pass into that region now, because it was not by superstition only, or only by that and the oppressive forms of a debased church system, that the minds of men were broken down, powerful agencies as they both were. These moral pestilences acted upon brains that had been first weakened by the physical plagues to which bodies were subject.

We are not free from such afflictions yet. We are at this hour shrinking from the breath of cholera. It comes home to the poor. It comes home to the minister of state. He may sacrifice sanitary legislation to the first comer who attempts to sneer it down, and journey home to find the grateful plague sitting in his own hall, ready with the only thanks that it can offer. At this we sincerely grieve, and perhaps tremble; but we know nothing of the terror of a plague as it was terrible in the old times of famine among the poor, wrong living and bad housing among the rich, of townships altogether drainless, of filth, ignorance, and horrible neglect. The ravages made formerly in Europe by the small-pox or measles, the dreadful spread of leprosy, the devastation on the path of the black death and the sweating sickness, have no parallel in our day. Extreme as are the sufferings of our poor in the hungry winter season, we understand but faintly the intensity and extent of the distress which the old poet had often seen who wrote—

Short days, sharp days, long nights come on apace:
Ah, who shall hide us from the winter's face?
Cold doth increase, the sickness will not cease,
And here we lie, God knows, with little ease.

From winter, plague and pestilence, good Lord, deliver us!

I particularly wish to show how in the good old times men's bodies were wasted, and how there was produced out of such wasting a weakening and wasting of their minds. We can not study rightly sickness of the mind without bringing sickness of the body into question. It is necessary to begin with that.

There was one disease called the black death, the black plague, or the great mortality. The most dreadful visitation of it was one that began in China, spread over Asia, and in the year thirteen hundred and forty-eight entered Europe. Europe was then, however, not unused to plagues. Six others had made themselves famous during the preceding eight-and-forty years. The black plague spread from the south of Europe to the north, occupying about three years in its passage. In two years it had reached Sweden; in three years it had conquered Russia. The fatal influence came among men ripe to receive it. Europe was full of petty war; citizens were immured in cities, in unwholesome houses overlooking filthy streets, as in beleaguered fortresses; for robbers, if not armies, occupied the roads beyond their gates; husbandmen were starving feudal slaves; religion was mainly superstition; ignorance was dense, and morals were debased; little control was set upon the passions. To such men came the pestilence, which was said to have slain thirteen millions of Chinese, to have depopulated India, to have destroyed in Cairo fifteen thousand lives a day. Those were exaggerated statements, but they were credited, and terrified the people. Certainly vessels with dead crews drifted about in the Mediterranean, and brought corruption and infection to the shores on which they stranded.

In what spirit did the people, superstitious as they were in those old times, meet the calamity? Many committed suicide in frenzy; merchants and rich men, seeking to divert the wrath of Heaven from themselves, carried their treasure to the churches and the monasteries; where, if the monks, fearing to receive infection with it, shut their gates against any such offering, it was desperately thrown to them over their walls. Even sound men, corroded by anxiety, wandered about livid as the dead. Houses quitted by their inhabitants tumbled to ruin. By plague and by the flight of terrified inhabitants many thousand villages were left absolutely empty, silent as the woods and fields. The Pope, in Avignon, was forced, because all the churchyards were full, to consecrate as a burial-place the river Rhone, and assure to the faithful an interment, if not in holy ground, at least in holy water. How the dead were carted out of towns for burial in pits, and how the terror of the people coined the fancy that through indecent haste many were hurried out and thrown into those pits while living, every one knows; it was the incident of plague at all times. Italy was reported to have lost half its inhabitants. The Venetians fled to the islands and forsook their city, losing three men in four; and in Padua, when the plague ceased, two thirds of the inhabitants were missing. This is the black death, which began toward the close of the year thirteen hundred and forty-eight to ravage England; and of which Antony Wood says extravagantly, that, at the close of it, scarcely a tenth part of the people of that country remained living.

Churches were shunned as places of infection, but enriched with mad donations and bequests; what little instruction had before been imparted ceased; covetousness increased, and when health returned men were amazed to observe how largely the proportion of lawyers to the rest of the community had been augmented. So many sudden deaths had begotten endless disputes about inheritance. Brothers deserted brothers; even parents fled from their children, leaving them to die untended. The sick were nursed, when they were nursed at all, by greedy hirelings at enormous charge. The wealthy lady, noble of birth, trained in the best refinement of her time, as pure and modest perhaps as she was beautiful, could sometimes hire no better nurse than a street ruffian to minister to her in her mortal sickness. It appears most probable that this pestilence, which historians often dismiss in a paragraph, destroyed a fourth part of the inhabitants of Europe. The curious fact follows, which accords with one of the most mysterious of all the certain laws of nature, that the numbers of the people were in some degree replenished by a very marked increase in the fruitfulness of marriage. We know how the poor, lodged in places dangerous to life, surround themselves with little families, and how births multiply as deaths increase among them. To this natural law the attention of men was strongly forced, even at the time of the black plague.

But lesser local pestilences arose incessantly, and the bodies of multitudes who were not slain were weakened by the influences that destroyed so many, while, at the same time, few minds escaped the influence of superstitious dread, arising out of such calamities. The best physicians ascribed the black plague to the grand conjunction of Saturn, Jupiter, and Mars in the sign of Aquarius, which took place about Lady-day, in the year thirteen hundred and forty-five. Such conjunctions always foreboded horrors to men, and every plague was in this way connected with the stars. Many a deed that proved the dignity and beauty of man's nature was done quietly during those days of trial; bands of Sisters of Charity at Paris perished in the work of mercy to the sick, and were supplied with unflinching troops of new recruits; but bigotry and folly had the loudest voices, and took possession of the public ear.

Then arose in Hungary, and afterward in Germany, the Brotherhood of the Flagellants—men and even women and children of all ranks entering the order, marched about towns in procession, each flagellant with a red cross on the breast, back, and cap, and carrying a triple scourge, and all recommended to attention by the pomp of tapers and superb banners of velvet and cloth of gold. They multiplied so fast, and claimed rights so independent—for they even absolved each other—that they came to be regarded by the Church as dangerous. They were put down at last by persecution, the enthusiasm of the populace in their behalf being converted into a relentless rage against them.

The rage of the populace was felt most severely by the Jews. Pestilence was ascribed usually in those days to poisoned wells, and the wells, it was said commonly, were poisoned by the Jews. So it was at the time of the black plague. The persecution of the Jews began in those days at Chillon, and spread from Switzerland through Europe. Tortured and maddened, many poor Jews confessed all that men would have had confessed by them, and told horrible tales of powdered basilisk, and of the bags of poison sent among the faithful of Israel from the great Rabbi at Toledo. All the Jews in Basle were shut up in a wooden building, and therein smothered and burnt alive. The same fate happened to the Jews at Freyburg. In acquiescence with the popular idea, wells had been bricked over and buckets removed. If, therefore, in any town, a man rose to plead for the unhappy children of Israel, the populace asked why it was, if they were not guilty, that the authorities had covered up the wells. But there was not wanting other evidence: poison-bags, which Christians had thrown there, were found in springs. At Spire, the Jews withdrew into their houses, and, setting fire to them, burnt themselves and all they had, with their own hands. At Strasburg, two thousand Jews were burnt alive in their own burial ground—those who, in frantic terror, broke their bonds and fled, being pursued and murdered in the street. Only in Lithuania this afflicted people found a place of safety. There they were protected by King Casimir the Great, who loved a Jewish Esther, and the Lithuanian Jews still form a large body of men who have lived in much seclusion, and retained many of the manners of the middle ages.

It was among people weakened physically and mentally by desperate afflictions and emotions, that there arose certain dancing manias, which formed a fresh disease, affecting both the body and the mind. The same generation that had seen the terrors of the black death, saw, some twenty years afterward, men and women dancing in a ring; shrieking, and calling wildly on St. John the Baptist; and at last, as if seized with an epileptic fit, tumbling on the ground, where they desired to be trodden upon and kicked, and were most cheerfully and freely trodden upon and kicked by the by-standers. Their wild ways infected others with diseased bodies and minds, and the disease called St. John's Dance, which was supposed to be a form of demoniacal possession, spread over the Netherlands. The St. John's dancers were exorcised and made wonderful confessions. If they had not put themselves under the patronage of St. John (to whose festival pagan rites and dances had been transferred by the Germans) they would have been racked and burnt. Their number increased so fast that men were afraid of them; they communicated to each other morbid fancies; such as a furious hatred of the red color, with the bull's desire to tear every red cloth to rags, and a detestation of pointed shoes, against which, and other matters of fashion, the priests had declaimed often from their pulpits. The St. John's dancers became so numerous and so violent that, in Liège, the authorities were intimidated; and, in deference to the prejudices of the dancers, an ordinance was issued to the effect that no one should wear any but square-toed shoes. This madness appeared also at Metz, and Cologne, and extended through the cities of the Rhine.

A similar lunacy broke out some time afterward at Strasburg, where the dancers were cared for by the town council, and conducted to the chapel of St. Vitus, a youthful saint, martyred in the time of Diocletian. For this saint, because little was known of him, a legend could be made suited to the emergency, in evidence that he, and he alone, was able to cure the dancing plague. The plague, however, spread; and, as the physicians regarded it as a purely spiritual question, it was left to the care of the Church, and even a century later, on St. Vitus's day, women went to the chapel of St. Vitus to dance off the fever that had accumulated in them during the past twelvemonth. But at that time the lunacy was near its end, for I need not say that it had little in common with the disease known as St. Vitus's Dance by the f sicians of the present day. In its first years it attacked violently people of all ranks, especially those leading sedentary lives, and impelled them to dance even to death sometimes, to dash their brains out against walls, or to plunge into rivers.

Every one has heard of a madness of this kind that arose in Apulia, among people who had been, or fancied that they had been bitten by a ground spider, called the tarantula. Those who were bitten were said to have become melancholy, very open to the influence of music, given to wild joyous fits of dancing, or to miserable fits of weeping, morbid longings, and fatal paroxysms either of laughter or of sobs. At the close of the fifteenth century the fear of this malady had spread beyond Apulia. The poison of the tarantula, it was believed, could only be worked off by those in whom it begot a violent energy of dancing—it passed out then with the perspiration; but if any lingered in the blood, the disorder became chronic or intermittent; and the afflicted person would be liable to suffering and melancholy, which, whenever it reached a certain height, would be relieved by dancing. The tarantati, or persons bitten by the tarantula, had various whims, and they also had violent preferences for and antipathies to colors. Most of them were wild in love of red, many were excited by green objects, and so forth. They could only dance to music, and to the music of certain tunes which were called tarantellas, and one man's tarantella would not always suit another. Some needed a quick tune, others a melancholy measure, others a suggestion of green fields in the music as well as in the words that always went with it. Nearly all tarantati required some reference to water, were mad in longing for the sea, and would be ecstatic at the sight of water in a pan. Some even would dance with a cup of water in their hands, or plunge their heads after dancing in a tub of water, set for them, and trimmed with rushes. In the beginning of the seventeenth century, the cure of the tarantati was attempted on a grand scale. Bands of musicians went among the villages, playing tarantellas; and the women were so especially interested in this way of bringing relief to the afflicted, that the period of tarantella-playing was called "the women's little carnival." The good creatures saved up their spare money to pay for the dances, and deserted their household duties to assist at them. One rich lady, Mita Lupa, spent her whole fortune on these works of charity.

A direction was often given by this little carnival to the thoughts of hysterical women. They sickened as it approached, danced, and were for a season whole; but the tarantati included quite as many men as women. Even the skeptic could not shake off the influence of general credulity. Gianbattista Quinzato, Bishop of Foligno, suffered himself, in bravado, to be bitten by a tarantula; but, to the shame of his episcopal gravity, he could obtain a cure only by dancing.

When bodies are ill-housed or ill-nourished, or by late sickness or other cause depressed, as most men's bodies were in the middle ages, minds are apt to receive morbid impressions. The examples just given show how rapidly across such tinder the fire of a lunatic fancy spreads. People abounded who were even glad to persuade themselves that they were changed into wolves every night, that they were witches, or that they were possessed by demons.

About fifty years ago, a young woman of strong frame visited a friend in one of the Berlin hospitals. On entering a ward she fell down in strong convulsion. Six female patients who saw her became at once convulsed in the same way; and, by degrees, eight others passed into the same condition for four months; during which time two of the nurses followed their example. They were all between sixteen and twenty-five years old.

Other madneses of this kind will occur to the minds of many readers. They are contemporary illustrations, each on a small scale, of a kind of mental disorder which was one of the most universal of the sorrows of the middle ages. Men were liable in masses to delusions so absurd, and so sincere, that it is impossible to exclude from a fair study of the social life of our forefathers a constant reference to such unsound conditions of their minds.

WHAT DO YOUNG MEN MARRY?

A VERY important question this, and well deserving of profound attention and a serious answer. Truly, marriage is itself so serious a matter, that it is a pity any one should for a moment attempt to view it as ought else. And, indeed, none but the most confirmed kind of bachelors—who know not "what marriage means"—can ever do so.

Joke about rheumatism if you will; jest on toothaches as you list; make merry upon the subject of Chancery proceedings; be facetious about your income-tax; but eschew levity when writing, speaking, thinking about matrimony. Of all serious subjects place this at the head.

But if to marry be so serious a business, the question, What do young men marry? can not be an unimportant one. Now, methinks, some of my readers—if I may be allowed to credit myself with readers—have already answered the inquiry in their own minds, or at least have concluded it to be one mightily easily answered. Not so fast, fair Sir or Madam. No, not "wives," certainly; for while a man may not marry his grandmother, paternal or maternal, nor yet some others of his relatives, he can not marry his wife, for being his wife, they are already wedded, neither can he legally marry his neighbor's wife. And have but a little patience, kind reader, and you may find that you are just as completely at a nonplus to answer the question, in some cases, as we are ourselves; and, we assure you, cases have come within the range of our observation, in which we were fairly puzzled to say, or to see, what a young man married—or what for.

Take notice, we confine the question to young men. We might indeed include elderly men; but we purposely exclude what are known as middle-aged men. We give them credit for usually forming judicious matrimonial connections, and for being able and ready to give a reason for their selection of a life partner.

Once more. What do young men marry? We reply—any thing, every thing, the most extraordinary things conceivable: e.g. my cousin, Fred Courtenay, a young man of small fortune, practicing a good profession, a rising young man, went to a gipsying party—and married a gipsy? Oh no, madam; pray, hear me out—a pic-nic, “just a few friends, you know,” that sort of thing. There he met Fanny Harley, who was on a visit to her aunt. Fanny wore curls, which, on this occasion, combs and bandoline were ineffective to confine. Especially one ringlet, in spite of her thousand coquettish attempts to secure the stray lock, would wave in the light breeze, and dance with each zephyr that fanned her cheek. ’Twas charming; so graceful, so, so— Fred glanced at this curl again and again, admired it, thought of it, after he had parted with her for the night, dreamt of it, called in the morning to see it, courted it. But it was not to be too easily carried off. Fred found to his deep concern that he had a rival. When he went to pay his wonted visit, there he was, seated, chatting away gayly. And his co-competitor for this prize was one of those careless, easy, good-natured fellows, who are the most disagreeable and intolerable of all rivals, inasmuch as they are never disconcerted at the appearance of another candidate in the field, and never risk their position in the lady’s esteem, or affection, as the case may be, by becoming melancholy and moody at the presence of a rival. Nay, Fred’s tormentor actually made friendly overtures to him, and insisted on making him his confidant. Fred did his best to retain his equanimity under the infliction, but, like all true lovers must have done, he succeeded but ill. He endured all his rival’s cold-blooded commendation of Fanny with praiseworthy, and, under the circumstances, extraordinary patience, until one day the loquacious youth, after expatiating on the beauty of his mistress’s eyebrows, eyes, nose, lips, and other features, which Fred listened to with an indifferent affectation of ease, unfortunately introduced the particular curl which was the object of Fred’s semi-adoration. This was too much. He could have borne any thing short of this. This maddened him. He felt the bitter pangs of jealousy. He retired from the field. He armed himself with heroic pride. He fortified himself with noble resolutions. “What!” said he, “shall I succumb to a daughter of Eve—to a smiling face—to a—to a glossy curl? Shall I yield even to a curl? He walked forth in his newly-regained freedom—elate, triumphant. But, somehow or other, these unworthy trainmels, as he called them, were not to be so easily broken from. He had over-estimated his power. In vain did he determine to banish the recollection of the past. Go where he would, the curl accompanied him. It waved in every tendril; it visited him in his dreams by night, and in his thick-coming fancies by day; it was ever present; it haunted him in solitude, and he could not forget it in company. His resolution failed him; he returned to the pursuit with redoubled ardor; the fair one—moved by such evident fondness—relented; again he was received into favor; again he courted his curl; fairly made love to it. Shame fall on me, to be so reluctant to write the truth, the whole truth, and what is nothing but the truth—he married it! Fortunately for him, it was attached to a nice, sensible, affectionate girl, and things did not turn out so badly as might have been expected from such a beginning. But the fact remains—he married a curl. To all intents and purposes did Mr. F. Courtenay wed a ringlet. He was enamored of it; and I verily believe would have worn his hair long, gone about with his hands in his pockets, sighed, hummed sentimental tunes, refused his due sustenance, and, in short, have manifested the customary symptoms of unrequited affection, had this curl passed into the possession of some happier bridegroom, just as regularly and orderly as though he had lost some fervently-loved, worthy young woman.

Singular case! say you. Nay, that is just the point at issue. I say it was the commonest, every-dayest thing imaginable. Take another instance.

You remember Tom. No—oh, yes, you must remember Tom. Well, he married an ankle. A fact, upon my word. A foot and ankle—the latter principally. He saw it, followed it about—danced with it; and, in fine, was so pleased with it, that nothing would serve but he must make it his own. He could see nothing else; he wanted nothing else; he cared for nothing else; he thought not of aught else. It served him for head and heart, for waist and shoulders, for eyes, and nose, and mouth, for soul and body. He wrote a proper allowable lover’s sonnet, which would pass muster in any collection of amatory effusions—on it and to it, commencing “Oh ankle.” He cautiously approached it, made himself agreeable to it, wooed it, won it, and bore it off in triumph to his home—if home it could be called, for poor Tom was woefully disappointed. He had concluded that every thing must be comprised in, or, at least, conjoined with such an ankle. Alas! he was deceived! There was nothing but ankle—no warm heart, no sympathy, no intelligence. He has no wif. He has what he married, and that was an ankle. He has a grate, and a good fire in it; a fender, poker, tongs, shovel, a hearth-rug, and a lounging-chair; but he has no fireside. He has no real, no complete home. He has no helpmate. And yet he is not a widower: he has a house of his own, and an ankle and family.

In like manner we have known a young man marry an eye. Charles Wilson was smitten by a hand; and the lady to whom it belonged kindly and liberally gave it to him. It was all she had to give him, for heart she had none.

One young friend of ours married a nose, another a lip, and a third allied himself to an eyebrow. The nose made a very good wife, but this was purely accidental.

What George Bateson married, we may, perhaps, be excused for not being able to make out, since George does not seem to know himself exactly. Questioned very closely on the subject, George will say—"Eh! Well, you know, there was a something about Jane that—eh! you see we can't very well tell what it was—a sort of indescribable kind of, eh!—you know what I mean—?" Curiously enough, whatever this was which George wedded, it made him, on the whole, a fair enough sort of wife.

Some young men marry dimples, some ears; one I know married a beauty-spot made of court-plaster, while a second cousin of my wife's married an expression—I believe an amiable expression.

It is difficult, in the absence of any accurate statistics on the subject, to say, decidedly, which feature is most frequently sought in marriage. The contest, however, certainly lies between the eyes and the hair. The mouth too, is occasionally married; the chin not so often.

Poor partners these, you will own; but what will you say to Will Carson, who actually married a blue ribbon—neither more nor less? It was employed to bind up some bonny brown hair. Will liked it, and, scorning all those antiquated saws which tell us that "Like blood, like good, and like ages, make the happiest marriages," and the counsel of a friend who advised him to seek a more suitable match, he clung honorably and firmly to the humble object of his affection, and married his bunch of blue ribbons.

Only the other day, a very sensible young fellow of my acquaintance fell over head and ears in love with a braid—braid, I believe, young ladies style that mass of hair that, descending from the forehead, forms a sort of mouse's nest over the ear. He was so far gone in his infatuation, that he became engaged to this braid, but the Eugénie mode of hair-dressing coming in just then, the charm was dissolved, and the match was happily broken off, and there is no present appearance of its being renewed.

What do young men marry? Why, they marry all these and many other bits and scraps of a wife, instead of the true thing. Some, more sagacious than the ordinary run, are not content with an eye or a lip, but marry a set of teeth, a head of hair, and a neat foot and ankle, all at once. Some marry a fortune, and as Providence sends a female with it, they wed her too. Some marry a silk dress, and others a pretty bonnet, and yet others a pair of gloves. One youth was so fond of cards, that meeting with a girl whose mother was a good hand at whist, he married the lass, and so may be said to have married his mother-in-law.

So young men marry, and so they settle; and such as the marriage is, such is the after-life; and then, after wedding such features, or possessions, or attributes, or what not of females, they are surprised to find that, though married, they have no wives. He that would have a wife must marry a woman. If he can meet with one of equal social position, like education, similar disposition, kindred sympathies, and habits congenial to his own, let him marry. But let him beware of wedding an instep, of marrying a bust, however fair, or a neck, however swanlike, or a voice, however melodious.

Young ladies do also make some queer matches, and unite themselves to whiskers and imperials, to waistcoats and breastpins; but it is unnecessary to enter into details; and, besides, much may be said in extenuation of their folly, and this much at least, that, commonly, they do not, as young men do, go forth, courting and to court, but rather wait to be sought for; and having, generally, so much narrower a circle to choose from than the sterner sex, they may be the more readily excused when perhaps their best choice does not nearly equal their best imaginings. But fare they well. And fare thee well, courteous reader!

ADAM BENNETT'S HEIRS.

PEACEFUL and beautiful beyond description was the face of Adam Bennett, as he lay dead in his old house. There was none of the agony of death left on the countenance; there was, indeed, none of the agony of life there, for his life had much of pain, sorrow, and anguish, and it would not have been strange, now that all his years were added up, and the sum of them lay there in the coffin, had there been more appearance of the sorrow of the past than of the joy into which they hoped he had entered. But it was not so, for the light, as if of the better country of glorious lights, was on his forehead, and the outline of his marked and strikingly beautiful features shone, gleamed, fairly radiated that splendor which we have sometimes read of as indicating the complete blessedness of the righteous dead.

Adam Bennett had been a good man. It were perhaps as well to add that he had been a great man. For greatness is relative, and, measured by ordinary standards, it is possible that he might have been esteemed an ordinary person or even less; but measured by a soul measure, the measure of the stature of a noble man, living for his fellow-men, loving and laboring for them, honored and beloved by them, Adam Bennett stood head and shoulders above every one in the country around.

His house was an old straggling farm-house, built at different periods, and in different styles, overgrown with a dark mass of trees, underneath which the grass grew long, and rank, and slender, where you could see the grass, for the ground was mostly covered with a tangled mass of roses and vines of various sorts, which grew much to wood in the shade, but which blossomed luxuriantly in the spring.

It was late spring when the old man died. All the farmers in the neighborhood were just finishing their spring work, and the brief space of comparative leisure which precedes harvest was approaching, and to the old farmer came a period of leisure that was not altogether welcome at the first, but which, when he knew that it was the rest he was required to take, preparatory to the great journey, seemed to him a space of calm and blessedness such as he had never before known, such as he had not dreamed that this world could offer. It would have been a time of perfect and triumphant joy to the good man, surveying the life in which he had struggled much, suffered much, and accomplished much, and looking into the life where he was confident his reward was awaiting him, but for one consideration which saddened and disturbed him. It was this:

In his youth he had loved and married, and lost and buried a young, gentle, and lovely wife, whose memory never failed to bless the twilight of every day from her burial, until the last twilight, the dimness of the eyes, and the fading of the earth-light which preceded his death. She left him one child, a son; like his mother in his childhood, more like her in his boyhood, and dearer than words can express to the heart of the strong man on whose breast he lay for many years.

It has been said that the children of good men turn out oftener to be themselves unworthy. It is not so; but the few instances of this kind are so striking, and cause so much observation and pity, and remark, that men have gotten to speaking of them as illustrations of the rule instead of the exceptions.

As he grew older, the boy George grew to be disobedient, thoughtless, and reckless. Even in the early years of school life he was the leader of the worst boys in the village; and not unfrequently his father's heart was wrung with pain at reports of his juvenile iniquities. But when he was twenty years old he disappeared from home, nor could all the exertions of his father and of the entire community prevail to ascertain his whereabouts; and the old man, prematurely old though in the prime of life, mourned for his lost boy in unutterable grief.

Years passed, and the wanderer came not. The old farm-house grew older; the trees grew over it; the roses ran riot, and grew into wild masses of uncultivated beauty; the moss gathered on the rocks about the spring; the robins, that had built for years in the old apple-tree, ceased to return, having doubtless died in another land; and the old man went about his labor, hither and thither over his farm, with slow, feeble steps, wondering whether his boy were living or dead, homeless or happy, outcast or clothed and loved; and so the time approached—steadily, calmly, peacefully—when he must depart, and leave a world—a broad, boundless world—with the wanderer still in it, without a father, without a mother; he trembled when he added, without a God.

He had been ill a week—nearly two weeks—and an evening of unusual quiet and lustrous beauty of moon and stars was coming down on the country side. He lay in his own large room, with the doors and windows open, and as he lay he could look out and down toward the church and church-yard, where lay the wife of his bosom, who had now slept for more than thirty years in the village burial-ground. And as he looked, the thought of meeting her again took possession of his whole soul; and he grew not only calm, but happy and exultant, and broke out into a song of rejoicing, the words of which had been favorite words with her, the dead wife. And while he sang, there came down the road two persons, a man leading by the hand a child; the man walking feebly and with pain, the child occasionally lifting her eyes to his face, and apparently encouraging him. The old man did not cease to sing, and as the strangers approached the house, his voice, clear and distinct, floated on the night air, and seemed, broken though it was, to be musical, and soft as the moonlight. The two, who were drawing near, suddenly paused as they heard that voice, and the words fell on their ears with surprising distinctness:

"Through sorrow's night, and danger's path,
Amid the thickening gloom,
We soldiers of an injured King
Are marching to the tomb."

The child felt the hand which held her own suddenly tighten. She looked up, and saw that the face of her companion was pale—ashy—in the moonshine, and she stopped suddenly, and said, "You are ill, father!"

"Whose voice was that?" asked the sick old man in his room. For the child's voice had penetrated the thicket which surrounded the house.

No one could reply, for no one had seen the approach of the strangers. The man did not notice the child's voice or question, but standing for a moment silent, gazed into the mass of trees and flowers which skirted the roadside and shut in the view of the old house, and then staggering a few steps further on, grasped feebly at the bars of the gate, and failing to take hold of them, fell heavily on the ground.

A child's shrill cry of distress startled the inhabitants of the old house, and rushing out into the road they found a man lying in the dust, and a child of ten or twelve years with her arms around him, weeping bitterly, and exerting all her strength to lift him, while she alternately sobbed and called him father, and begged him to rise.

They brought him in and laid him on the porch, in the doorway, and he breathed for a little time heavily, and moaned once; while the child constantly wept, and begged him to wake—to speak to her.

The old man grew violently excited as the sounds of the child's voice came in to his room, and at length bade them lift him to the door.

He stood there, with his white locks streaming about his face, on which the moonlight trembled and glanced through the trees; and the white sheet wrapped around his form gave him a wierd, unearthly aspect. He looked down at the figure of the man, and the upturned face of the child, who was awed into silence by this strange apparition, and at this moment the stranger opened his eyes.

There was a visible shudder passing through his body, and his gaze for one instant clung wildly to the eyes of the old man—that thrilling, piercing, agonizing gaze—and then he said, in a broken voice, full of anguish, penitence, and woe, “Father—father—my child—Annie—forgive—my father!” and he straightened his tall form suddenly, and compressed his limbs rigidly, and his arms fell, one on each side, and his hands were clinched and then relaxed, and a swift tremor passed through his frame, and remained about his lips after all else was hushed, and the son lay dead in the old doorway, with his face turned up to the stars that had shone on him in the long gone years, a child playing before his father on the same old door-stone.

And now Adam Bennett was ready to be gone. The instant that he saw his dead son, and knew that the world no longer contained him a wanderer over its inhospitable surface, he was ready to depart, and anxious to be away. This was the first impulsive thought; but before the dead son was buried by his mother, the old man, lying on his bed, had learned to love Annie Bennett, his grandchild, and to grow anxious for life that he might devote it to her. During the few weeks that he lived after that night of sorrow, his whole heart grew to the child; and although he was now content to depart, and his desire was toward the other and better country, he still had much fear and much anxiety about the child, and he sought advice from his pastor and friend, the old clergyman, and made every preparation that was possible for her benefit, thus to be left alone in the world.

The old farmer was wealthy for a farmer, and his broad lands were located where a few years promised to make them of double or treble value, from the steady approach of the growing city. He had made a will, giving his property to a brother, with whom he had not been on good terms in early years, or rather, it should be said, who had not been on good terms with him; for Adam was too gentle to retain a thought of anger, and had even desired thus in dying to leave his still estranged brother the evidence of his love. But now he changed his will, and gave his entire property to Annie, his grandchild, and made the clergyman her guardian, who, with the old judge, his neighbor, were to be executors of his will. And when all was arranged, his will was executed, and in the presence of the same witnesses he destroyed the old will.

And having arranged all this, the old man went quietly to his rest. There was no one with him but Annie and the old servants when he died. He called her up in the night-time from her light slumber, which she always took in his room; and when she crept up to his bed, and saw the pallor of his countenance—reminding her of that which preceded her father's death—she threw her arms around his neck and pressed her cheek close to his; and with that tight clasp close around him, the old man slept, dreaming of the clasping arms of his beloved wife, and woke in her embrace.

Seven years passed swiftly over Annie Bennett in the parsonage, and she had grown into rare and perfect beauty. The good pastor was well worthy the charge he had undertaken, and he had well performed his duty. She was as gentle as beautiful, and the whole country was full of her praises.

Wealth and beauty united are seldom likely to fail in winning admiration; but the throng of suitors who surrounded her, after the pastor permitted her to receive guests in his house, met poor encouragement from her universal kindness and gentleness. No one could feel himself in any way distinguished above his fellows, and none dared say he had more of her smiles than another.

Judge Morton, the other executor of the will of Adam Bennett, had a son, who was sent to college at just about the period of the old man's death, and although he was at home occasionally during his four years at Princeton, he never saw Annie Bennett. Immediately after graduating he was sent to travel in Europe, and becoming enamored of life in one of the German universities, he had remained there for several winters; and great were the wonders expressed in the village at his quiet and comical letters describing the raw beef-steaks, and as raw brandy, which, if he were serious, formed the main support of life in Heidelberg.

The brother of Adam Bennett also had a son, whom he had educated with the utmost care and expense, and who was now a student at law in the neighboring city, and one of the most devoted suitors for Annie's favor. For some reason which she would not explain, perhaps could not, she had a great dislike, amounting even to aversion, for her cousin John. It was not his personal appearance, for he was remarkably elegant and manly in form and feature. But there was doubtless an intuitive knowledge of his real character, an involuntary dislike to the bad heart which he concealed under a smiling and affable manner.

A pleasant party was gotten up one summer morning for a pic-nic on the mountain, and the day passed off with the accustomed amount of merriment and gayety. Toward evening a muttering of distant thunder warned them homeward, and there was a swift gathering to the carriages and horses, and the entire party hastened away as rapidly as they could procure seats in the conveyances. Annie Bennett was on horseback, and, accepting a proffered hand, she sprang into the saddle and hastened down the road at a long gallop, not waiting for the gentlemen to mount, who were her guardians for the time, but leaving them to follow as they might.

She reached a place where the road for a mile or more ran along the creek, flowing swift and deep under high banks, and was still considerably in advance of John Bennett, who led the young men that were following her on their horses, when a sudden, blinding flash of lightning startled her horse into fury, and at a second flash, no less vivid, he sprang over the bank into the rushing stream.

A cry of horror broke from the crowd of pursuers who came up on the instant; but no one of them ventured into the flood to save the girl, whose horse was seen breasting the current while she was nowhere visible.

While the stupefied men were gazing at one another and into the stream, they suddenly perceived a man urging a splendid horse at a furious pace down the road which ran along the opposite bank of the creek. When he reached a point nearly opposite to them he rode down the bank, and plunged into the water. All this had passed in a moment, and the next instant they saw the stranger quit his horse, and strike out boldly for a point in the stream where a mass of clothing indicated that he would find the object of his search; and in a few minutes he stood on the bank, bearing the senseless form of the most beautiful girl his eyes had ever seen. Resigning her to the care of her acquaintances, and without uttering an audible word, he caught his horse—which had crossed the river with him—sprang on him, and was out of sight in a few moments, riding furiously down the road. Those who saw him, soaked, muddy, and hatless—his long hair over his eyes and matted on his face—would hardly recognize him again if they met him in decent dress.

Great was the astonishment of the family of Judge Morton when William, who had arrived at home only the day previous, returned from his afternoon ride in such condition, and greater still when he imposed strict secrecy on all concerning his adventure. It was not difficult to ascertain who was the lady he had rescued, for the whole village and country rang with the story of the unknown rescuer, and nothing complimentary to John Bennett or his companions was added to the account. On the contrary, it was frankly stated, much to their discredit, that Annie Bennett would have drowned but for the boldness of the stranger, who was described as a common-looking, gaunt, ill-visaged fellow, whose sudden appearance and departure were not to his credit.

It is not possible within the limits of this story to describe the growth of love between William Morton and Annie Bennett. He was such a man as she had never before seen—far above the herd by whom she was surrounded—accomplished, learned, dignified, while he was at the same time the soul of kindness and gentleness.

The instant that this love became apparent to strangers, John Bennett, convinced that his own prospects of success with his cousin were gone, began to consider the possibility of laying siege to her fortune in some other way.

"Who was her mother?" had been a question very often put to Annie Bennett by others, still more frequently by herself, but hitherto unanswered. She had, it is true, dim recollections, indistinct memories of a distant country, of strange scenes, of a childhood which had for its companion and guide a beautiful and beloved nurse, whom in her uncertain visions of the past she called "mother." She had dreams that were more clear and vivid. But dreams, visions, and memories, alike failed to locate the place where her childhood was passed, or to name or describe her mother.

John Bennett made a discovery. It was his forte. He was of no value as a law clerk or student, but he was given to finding flaws in titles which he could make pecuniarily valuable by buying up claims of which owners did not know the value.

He found a flaw in the execution of Adam Bennett's will. Slight indeed as it appeared at first, but fatal to the probate and to the will as it proved to be on examination. In fact the will was worthless under our statutes, which are clear and remarkably stern on the subject of last wills, and the property must descend to the heir-at-law of the old man, as if no will existed. This heir was, clearly enough, Annie, but where was the evidence of her paternity? It consisted wholly in the scene at the time of her father's death, and there was no legal evidence there on which to hang a claim as grandchild and heir-at-law.

Hence there was little hope of resisting the claim now set up by the brother of Adam Bennett, and when at this period I was introduced to the parties, I found it impossible to afford them any encouragement, deeply as I became interested in Miss Bennett and her cause. My suggestion of a settlement was met by Judge Morton and his son with a decided refusal, they asserting that the proofs of her birth were of ten-fold more importance to them than her property.

The prospect was as dark for a defense as is often known in a lawyer's office, and when, after exhausting our ingenuity for delays, we were at length driven to trial and defeat, we had a bill of exceptions long enough to occupy appellate courts for a short life-time, while we did not slacken our exertions to trace the footsteps of the wandering son of Adam Bennett. In this search no labor nor expense was spared, and ultimate success rewarded us fully.

It was no easy matter to follow the steps of the truant boy, especially after the lapse of so many years. But we found him at the very start shipped on a vessel which traded regularly with Germany for a long period, and we found that, after the lapse of several years, he left the ship on the other side of the water.

The ship-owner in whose employ he sailed was in many respects a singular man, and one of his peculiarities consisted in a devotion to statistics, which led him to keep a record of every passenger, deck or cabin, that had ever crossed the ocean in one of his vessels. It was by means of this record that we learned that the boy, now grown to a young man, had recrossed the sea, but in the cabin instead of before the mast, and at a period some years later than his sailor life. Still no trace of his marriage could be found. But a sharp clerk in our employ had observed that in the same vessel which had brought him to America, there came as cabin passengers, a German gentleman and his two daughters. This clerk revolved in his own mind the probable results of a long passage on ship-board with young ladies in company; and, with our permission, though we laughed at the feeble foundation of his notions, he pursued the plan of search he had laid.

Arguing that a German clergyman would be most likely to be applied to, under the circumstances, to marry them, he obtained without difficulty a list of the German clergy, Protestant and Roman Catholic, at that time in the city, and then hunted them down, man by man. As each failed to aid him, and his list grew smaller, instead of being discouraged he was only the more sanguine of his near approach to the discovery; and at length he had but one man to look for, and he was confident that this man could solve the mystery.

Two years passed before he obtained intelligence of this person, who was a poor Lutheran clergyman, and who, it at length appeared, had returned to Germany and died about ten years previously.

Morton, the younger, had become much interested in young Stephenson's search, and had imbibed faith in its success. We ridiculed the idea of wasting money on its prosecution; but he determined so to do, and authorized Stephenson to go to Germany, and hunt up the dead pastor's note-books and memoranda.

I pass over the particulars of his examination. To our astonishment he was perfectly successful. He not only ascertained the date and place of the marriage, and the names of the witnesses present, but he ascertained the name of the bride, and the place of her residence in Germany, and he forthwith set out to seek her family. None remained but an uncle, who told him their whole history. His brother was a learned man, but not rich, and had emigrated, hoping for better success in America. On ship-board his elder daughter Meta had met an American, whom she loved, and, on reaching New York, married. The entire family went to the West, and here, after a lapse of five years, Meta died, leaving her child to her husband and sister. Another year passed, and the two sisters were lying side by side in the dust of a strange land. From that time the uncle could tell nothing of Meta's husband. His brother, the old man, was living, very poor, earning a precarious livelihood by teaching in the city to which he had returned.

Great was the astonishment, great the incredulity of the good people of —, when it was announced that the grandfather of Annie Bennett was coming to see and claim her. The story was changed and magnified from lip to lip, so that it was at length made to include her mother, and some half dozen relatives on the maternal side, all of whom were summed up in the weak and weary old man who accompanied me to the village to see a granddaughter, whom he fully expected to clasp in his arms and take on his knee, as he did the day her mother died. The old man was not prepared for the vision of beauty which broke on his sight when we reached the old parsonage. It was to him a resurrection from the grave. It was Meta, the child of his love, the image of one that lay on his breast lovingly, confidingly, in the long gone years in Fatherland. He paused and trembled before he dared address her, and she stood waiting his approach, and not understanding his delay. At length he uttered some words in a broken voice and a foreign tongue, and reached out his arms to her. She sprang into them, and replied in the same language, and the old man held her on his heart. The astonishment of the by-standers may be imagined at hearing her converse in a language which no one had heard her use before, and which she herself was totally unaware of her ability to speak. But the memories of her childhood now returned with vividness and clearness, and, with the aid of the gentle old man's suggestions, she recalled every thing, even to the death of her mother, her parting kiss, her farewell words.

This story is told. A new trial, on the ground of new testimony, and a different verdict from the former, were now almost a matter of course. The old man found himself transformed into the grandfather and protector of a wealthy heiress, and no longer the poor German teacher, wandering from door to door.

Morton and our client were married within a few weeks after the discovery of the grandfather.

An occurrence which took place a few weeks after the marriage, enhanced the bitterness of the controversy between the two branches of the family. Morton had on that morning communicated to his wife, for the first time, the fact that he was her unknown rescuer, and with many a laugh at the descriptions of his uncouth appearance, which had been circulated at the time of the occurrence, they rode out together to view the spot where the rescue had taken place.

John Bennett's evil genius led him along the same road, at the moment that Morton and his wife had dismounted and were looking at the dark flow of the stream. Bennett was essentially a blackguard, and it appeared perfectly natural for him to pause, and invent insulting language and insinuations, to provoke the anger of his opponents. Unfortunately for him, it was equally natural for Morton to resent an insult on the spot; and John Bennett was never able to explain by what process he was transferred from the back of his horse to the bed of the river. The next instant Morton was obliged to plunge in and rescue the poor wretch, who could not swim a stroke, and who would have inevitably been insured against the gallows he merited, if his enemy had not been generous to save him.

Hence ensued a complaint for assault and battery, which was tried at the following Court of Sessions. Never was greater crowd in a courtroom. All anticipated fun, and they had it to their hearts' content. John Bennett was the sole witness for the prosecution, and he actually lied so much, that all hesitation as to our course in the defense vanished at once, and we went into it con amore.

Our theory to the jury was that John Bennett had often threatened vengeance on Morton as his successful rival; and this we proved by a dozen witnesses. Then that he had fallen into the stream, and would have been drowned but for Morton, who nobly rescued him; and this we proved by a fortunate passer-by, a farmer, who had seen Morton plunge in to the rescue, but who was utterly blinded to all previous occurrences by a bend in the road. Then we demolished John Bennett's character piece-meal by piece-meal, till we did not leave him a rag to cover his hideous moral deformity. Witnesses fairly crowded forward volunteering to aid us in this part of our defense; and when we had whitewashed Morton as quiet, calm, gentle, unoffending—in point of fact a rather soft and milk-and-water sort of character—we let the jury consider the case, which they did without leaving their seats. John Bennett has never been seen in the village since that day. The old German teacher has grown marvelously old, and may be seen any pleasant day walking around the old farm-house, which still stands; and, following him, you will generally see two or three glorious-eyed children, who are likely to be Adam Bennett's heirs.

And in still and calm nights, when the moon lies on the western horizon, leaving the world in that dark gloom which is more solemn than is the night when the stars are alone—in such nights the country people fancy there are ghosts around the old house. They say a man, pale, ghastly, and sad, unutterably sad, peers through the bars of the old gate, and looks longingly for admission to the vine-clad porch, where sits, in calm and quiet dignity, an old and weary but stately man, who sees not the wanderer at the gate, but whose steadfast gaze is beyond the stars, and who sometimes gives utterance to the words and notes of a brave old psalm.

The inhabitants within the old house heed nothing of these idle tales, but sleep all the long nights; and Annie Morton, the matron, sometimes dreams of an angel mother, and oftener of a noble old man, the father of her father, who bends over her as she sleeps.

Monthly Record of Current Events.

THE UNITED STATES.

THE State Elections have engrossed attention during the past month. In New York, Illinois, and Michigan they occurred on the 7th of November, and at the moment of closing this Record nothing more is known of the issue than general results, so that accurate statistics must be reserved for the next Number. It may be stated generally, however, in reference to all of them, that partisan divisions have been less rigid than usual, that old party lines have been broken down—in some States by a union of elements hostile to the repeal of the Missouri Compromise, and in others by the advent of a new party, having a secret organization, and having its operations based upon the native American element. In Delaware, where a State Election is still to be held, the Whigs have disbanded, and have merged themselves in this new American organization, the objects of which, so far as they are general, have been more distinctly stated in a speech made in Delaware City by Hon. John M. Clayton, on the 1st of November, than in any other paper that has come to our notice. Mr. Clayton insisted that those provisions of several of our State Constitutions which permit aliens to vote before they have become citizens of the United States, are contrary to just principles and sound policy, and ought to be removed. He urged also that, while he would proscribe no man on account of his birth-place, preference should be given, in filling the offices of the country, to native-born Americans, and that the influence of the foreign element upon our politics should be diminished. He expressed his hostility to the repeal of the Missouri Compromise embodied in the Nebraska bill, but declared that he would not vote for the repeal of the repealing clause. That measure he believed would bring about a more serious and menacing collision between the North and the South than any we have witnessed hitherto; and he thought it, therefore, highly desirable that we should have a party strong enough to overbear these sectional animosities, and sustain the Government in the preservation of the public peace. Such a party he believed would be found in this new organization, and he had no doubt that the appeal it would make to the American sentiment of the people would meet with a decisive and hearty response.

The election in Indiana for State officers and Members of Congress, which took place on the 1st of October, resulted in the election of State officers by the Republican or Anti-Nebraska party—made up of Whigs and Democratic opponents of the Nebraska bill, and in the return of nine Republican and two Democratic members of Congress. The following are the official returns of the vote on the State ticket:

| | Republican. | | Democratic. | Majority. |
| Sec. of State... | Collins... 98,259 | Hayden... | 85,636 | 12,623 |

From California we have intelligence to the 15th of October. The steam-ship Yankee Blade, which left San Francisco on the 30th of September for Panama, on the next day struck a reef of rocks off Point Arguilla, while running in a fog, and within half an hour sunk below her promenade deck. The captain, Randall, took about thirty passengers ashore in one of the boats, but did not return to the wreck. The first officer also went ashore in a boat, which was, however, stranded in landing, and a large number of those on board were drowned. During the night nothing further could be done for the rescue of the passengers, as the fog was very thick. Great confusion prevailed on board. The next morning the steamer Goliath came alongside and took off over six hundred passengers, and landed them at San Diego. About thirty lives were lost, mainly women and children.—Great excitement prevailed in San Francisco in consequence of the discovery that Henry Meigs had forged the new City Comptroller's warrants to the amount of over a million of dollars, and had left the country, in company with his brother, on board a yacht they had previously fitted up, and in which they had sailed, as is supposed, for Australia.

GREAT BRITAIN.

Public attention in England has been almost wholly absorbed by the news from the seat of war. The exultation at the victories of the Alps, and especially at the gallant conduct of the British troops, is profound and universal. Men of all parties vie with each other in the warmth of their eulogies and congratulations, and the position of the Ministry has been immensely strengthened by the fortunate issue of their plans. Leading statesmen have seized the opportunity which events have offered of declaring their sentiments upon the subject. Sir William Molesworth, on the 30th of September, received the compliment of the freedom of the City of Edinburgh, and spoke at some length, in acknowledging the honor, of the government of which he is a member. In the conduct of the war, he said France and England had three objects to accomplish: first, to prevent the armies of Russia from dismembering Turkey and marching on Constantinople; second, to prevent the fleets of Russia from injuring their trade and commerce; and third, to strike such a blow at Russia as would compel the Czar to desist from his designs on the Ottoman dominions. The first two objects had been already attained; the last was to be accomplished by the seizure of Sebastopol. He cautioned them against being impatient for instant victories, and said that, even if nothing further should be accomplished, two results had already been achieved of immense importance to the civilized world—one of which was the frank, firm, and cordial union of the people, the governments, the armies and navies of France and England in the same cause; and the other was the mitigation of the evils of war by the establishment of the maritime rights of neutrals on the firm and solid basis of reason and justice—a step in civilization the importance of which could scarcely be overestimated.—In Aberdeen, Mr. Hume was made the recipient of similar honors, and replied in a long speech upon political topics, the salient points of which related to the war and the government. No man could detest war more cordially than he did; but he had supported the Ministry in declaring it, from a conviction that the liberties of Europe were in danger from the ambition of Russia, and that this danger could be arrested in no other way. He spoke very warmly of Lord Aberdeen, the only man, in his opinion, who could have kept the Cabinet together under existing circumstances, and who, he thought, had been most unjustly assailed.—Mr. Murray Dunlop, a Member of Parliament for Greenock, addressed his constituents on the second of October, censuring the Ministry for having done so little for reform and other important interests of the country, but praising them for the prudence and energy with which they had carried on the war. The real question at issue, he said, was whether Europe should be ruled by dynastic despotism, or by Constitutional liberty. That was the only ground on which the war with Russia could be justified, and yet it was not the ground on which it had been put by the government—and it was the absence of any such declaration which had made him distrustful of the alliance with Austria. He had no objection to that alliance; but would, indeed, rather desire it, if she could be enlisted on the side of the Constitutional monarchies of Europe. But it was of no importance if she was to remain on the side of the dynastic despotisms. She might resist Russia in her endeavor to get more territory; but when it should become a question whether Constitutional freedom or despotic government should rule over Europe, the two would be joined hand in hand. He would say, therefore, to Austria, that if she would give a Constitution to Hungary, and liberal institutions to her own people, and set free the Italians, Great Britain would strengthen her against the Czar; but if she persisted in joining the Czar in the oppression of the people, she should be left to struggle with the difficulties of her position alone.—Lord Aberdeen himself made an extended political address at Aberdeen on the 9th of October, in which he reviewed the history and achievements of the war, without, however, saying any thing new upon the subject, or throwing any new light on the future.—Earl Granville made a speech in Staffordshire on the 6th, in which he insisted on the necessity of taking and either holding or destroying Sebastopol, if they hoped to deprive Russia of the means of menacing and dismembering Turkey.—Mr. Disraeli, in a recent speech, has insisted on the necessity of a more vigorous resistance to Roman Catholic encroachments than is shown by the present Ministry. This sentiment, and the manner in which it has been received in various quarters, is regarded as indicating a purpose to make Protestantism the rallying cry of the Opposition. Mr. Disraeli has also intimated a willingness to undertake the championship of the Licensed Victualers, who complain of the operation of the new act putting more stringent regulations on the sale of intoxicating liquors.—The fate of Sir John Franklin and his companions has been ascertained. Dr. Rae, who has been for several years prosecuting the search of the Arctic zone, has arrived in England with the intelligence, that while on the western coast of Boothia he learned, from a party of Esquimaux, that, in the spring of 1850, they saw a party of white men pushing for the northern coast of America. Somewhat later in the season they found the bodies of over thirty, who had evidently perished from starvation. Dr. Rae obtained from the Indians a great variety of articles which they had taken from the bodies; some of which contained Sir John's name, and all bore unmistakable evidence of having belonged to the party. The bodies were found near the confluence of Back river with the sea.

FRANCE.

The Emperor left the camp of the Army of the North, and returned to Paris on the 1st of October. In his parting speech to the troops, he said that the camp had been created to bring French soldiers near the coast, so that when needed they might the more readily join their English allies; to show to Europe that a hundred thousand men could be assembled on the frontiers without leaving the centre of France exposed to any danger, and to accustom the troops to the labors, hardships, and habits of military life.—An extract of a private letter from the Republican Barbes, who has been in prison ever since the coup d'état, was communicated to the Emperor, in which he said he craved victory for the French—he longed to have the glory of the nation enhanced by conquest; and declared that he pitied the Republican party if there were any among them who thought differently. On receiving this letter, Napoleon inclosed it to the Minister of the Interior, with orders for the immediate release of Barbes, saying that "a prisoner who preserves, in spite of long sufferings, such patriotic sentiments, could not in his reign remain in prison." On receiving the order for his release, Barbes refused to accept any favor at the hands of a usurper, and declared he would not leave the prison. He was forcibly removed, and formally demanded to be restored, threatening to quit France if his request was not acceded to within twenty-four hours. No notice being taken of it, he went to England.—M. Soulé, the United States Minister in Spain, on attempting to return to that country from England, was forbidden to enter France. The incident excited a strong sensation among the Americans in Europe.

THE GERMAN STATES.

Some further diplomatic correspondence has taken place between Austria and Prussia, the only importance of which grows out of the indication afforded that while Austria inclines more and more toward an alliance with the Western Powers, Prussia remains fixed in her purpose of maintaining a neutrality favorable to Russia. On the 21st of September Baron Manteuffel replied to the Austrian circular of the 14th, in which he expresses satisfaction at the explanations afforded, but indicates a wish for further assurances as to the means taken to prevent the German States from being involved in the war. The fact of the evacuation of the Principalities by Russia is regarded as setting aside the danger of a conflict with Austria; but it is suggested that the interests of Germany would be forwarded if those Principalities could be excluded from the territories accessible to military operations. Seeing in the evacuation a proof of the compulsive force of the treaty of April 20, the Prussian government desires to give validity to that policy by having the treaty confirmed and rendered binding by the Diet, so that Russia, as long as Austria does not attack her, shall not make an inroad of war against Austria for occupying the Principalities without finding her sustained by all the German States. In such an event as that supposed, the importance of German local interests to be protected on the lower Danube by the entry of Austrian troops into the Principalities, would have to be weighed against general German interests as involved in a participation in the war. The admission of foreign armies into the Principalities is complained of, and assurances on these points are asked. The Austrian government in reply, insists that German interests are menaced so long as Russia does not give guarantees for the restoration of a sure and lasting peace, and very plainly intimates that if Prussia maintains much longer her position of indecision, Austria will be prepared to act independently, and may perhaps bring forward only such propositions as are calculated to bring the situation of the German Bund into accord with her own.—Another indication that Austria is more and more disposed to join the Western Powers, is found in the fact that Baron Hubner, her minister in Paris, presented to the Emperor the official congratulations of his government upon the victory of the allied Powers over the Russians on the Alma.—The Russian Czar, meantime, not indifferent to these demonstrations, is advancing the Imperial Guards from St. Petersburg to Warsaw, and is raising new levies in Russia, which are regarded as symptoms of meditated attack upon the Gallician frontier of Austria.

THE EASTERN WAR.

The military operations in the Crimea have made a decided and important advance since our last record. The landing of the allied armies was effected at the Bay of Eupatoria on the 14th September, the French being the first to go on shore. No enemy was in sight, nor was any opposition whatever offered to their landing. The French troops disembarked numbered 23,600, and the English 27,000. Marshal St. Arnaud issued a general order, congratulating the French army under his command upon their arrival in the Crimea, and exhorting them to contend with their English allies for superiority in efficiency and good conduct. Lord Raglan, the English general, in an order of the day, exhorted the troops under his command to protect the inhabitants of the country in their persons and their property. On the 19th the allied armies broke up their encampment, and bivouacked for the night on the left bank of the Bulgavac, having decided to attack the Russians, who were strongly intrenched on the heights of the Alma river. After about an hour's march the Russians opened a fire of artillery upon the English cavalry in advance, which was returned, and the Russian squadron withdrew. The day's march had been fatiguing, and the troops bivouacked for the night. The next morning both armies moved toward the Russians, who were very strongly intrenched behind the steep and rugged banks of the Alma, their front extending over two miles, artillery having been planted upon the sharpest heights, and the slopes of the hills covered with dense masses of infantry. A trench had been dug between strongest point and the river, and every possible preparation had been made for an obdurate defense. About mid-day the Allies drew up within sight, but not in range; the French being on the right, and leaning on the sea. It had been arranged that the Russian position should be turned on both flanks; the French taking the left and the British the right. The battle began about half-past twelve, and was fought from right to left. The French, under General Bosquet, crossed the Alma, climbed the heights, and in the face of a very heavy fire established themselves, to the extent of several thousand men, on the left flank of the Russians. They were soon reinforced by two other brigades under General Canrobert and Prince Napoleon, and the battle rolled toward the centre. The French brigades rushed forward with impetuosity, being covered by their artillery, which had been brought to bear, and being soon supported by their second line, won the battle on the Russian left by two o'clock. Meantime the British divisions, halted behind the village of Burlink, were awaiting the moment for an attack on the Russian centre, replying with artillery to the heavy fire kept up by the Russians. About one o'clock the latter set the village on fire, and by its smoke and blaze retarded the operations of the enemy. At length Lord Raglan gave the signal for advance, and the light division under Sir George Brown crossed the river, the troops wading across, climbing over the trees that had been felled to oppose their progress, and under a withering fire. The Russian batteries were brought to bear with great precision upon them before they could form; round after round of shot swept through them; their officers began to go to the ground; and as they rushed up the steep, the ranks were broken by grape, canister, and musketry. But nothing could arrest them. Steadily and sternly each regiment formed as it best could; and, led by Brigadier Cedrington and Sir George Brown, conspicuous on a gray charger, rushed right against the battery. On their right fought the left brigade of the second division, who were hotly engaged against the Russian centre. Sweeping up the hills, they were met by a terrible fire; and as their shattered lines neared the battery of thirty-two pounders in their front, a sheet of lead "swept through them like a sword." Brigadier Pennefather, their brave commander, drew them back to form them anew; and the Russian infantry, emboldened by this appearance of success, leaped out of the battery and began to charge down-hill. The three regiments turned upon their foes, and hunted them up the hill at the point of the bayonet, followed them with a storm of bullets, and sent them flying over the hill beyond. It was at this stage that the crisis of the battle had arrived. The advanced brigade of the light division had crowned the slope, and had seized the battery, when, mistaking for French a dark column of infantry marching toward them, the three regiments ceased firing. Immediately a volley of musketry undeceived them, and forced them to retire with awful loss. But now the First Division, the Highland Brigade under Sir Colin Campbell, and the Guards under General Bentinck, were approaching, with all the regularity and calmness of a review. Their lines were dressed as they came grandly on. The men of the Light Division complained that the Guards were losing time in dressing-up! But the dressing-up did not interfere with their advance. They met and covered the retiring regiments of the Light Division: but they were exposed to a tremendous fire, and the men fell fast. A large square of Russians was advancing toward the battery, but appeared to hesitate. At this moment, Lord Raglan, who with his staff had crossed the river, and who stood in the heat of the fire, ordered up two guns to bear upon the advancing Russians. The guns were speedily in their place; speedily they got the range over the heads of the Guards and Highlanders who still swept on; long lanes of dead were rapidly bored through the Russian ranks: the enemy wavered and fled. On went the Guards and Highlanders. The Duke of Cambridge encouraged his men by voice and example. "Highlanders!" cried Sir Colin Campbell, before they came to the charge, "don't pull a trigger till you're within a yard of the Russians!" They charged, and well they obeyed their chieftain's wish: Sir Colin's horse was shot under him, but his men took the battery at a bound. The Russians rushed out, leaving multitudes of dead behind them. The Second and Light Divisions crowned the heights. The French turned the guns on the hill against the flying masses, which the cavalry in vain tried to cover. A few faint struggles from the scattered infantry, a few rounds of cannon and musketry, and the enemy fled to the southeast, leaving three generals, three guns, 700 prisoners, and 4000 wounded behind them. The battle of the Alma was won. The loss of the Allies in this engagement was 606 killed and 2699 wounded. The Russian wounded were cared for by the victors as well as possible, though the surgeons and attendants provided by the British army were entirely inadequate to their own needs, sities. The Russian army was commanded by Prince Menschikoff in person, but after the battle it suffered a total rout; it was divided, the left wing marching on Bakchi Sarai, and the right on Belbek, toward Sebastopol. Marshal de St. Arnaud, whose health had been very feeble for some weeks, kept his horse twelve hours on the day of battle, though suffering the most acute pain, so that at last he was obliged to be supported by two soldiers. Two days after, though suffering intensely, he still attended to the duties of his post, but on the 26th he could hold out no longer, and issued a general order, announcing his serious illness, and handing over his command to General Canrobert. He died at sea on the 29th. His body was deposited with great pomp in the Invalides, at Paris.

The allied armies remained on the scene of the battle, burying the dead and succoring the wounded, until the 28d, when the British troops were again in motion. On the 25th they seized and occupied Balaklava, encountering slight resistance. The next day they were joined by the French. On the 27th two divisions of each army made a reconnaissance in the direction of Sebastopol. On the 28th the British fleet began disembarking its siege artillery, and on the 9th of October the siege of Sebastopol commenced. Up to our latest dates from that place (the 21st), no serious impression had been made on the fortress, which was held by a large force. The Russians were again concentrating their troops on the Upper Belbek, and were threatening the besieging force. They had sunk eight vessels of their fleet in the harbor, thus rendering the fleet of the Allies useless in the siege. —In the Baltic, the English and French fleet has been ordered into winter quarters, and most of the ships will return home.

Editor's Cable.

HOW HAVE WE BEEN EDUCATED? Our history has disappointed certain classes of thinkers. Men of imaginative art, devoted to the beautiful culture of Poetry and the rapt enjoyment of Romance, have mourned over it as though they had been defrauded of a portion of their inheritance. If their favorite circumstances could have surrounded us; if there had been a twilight age in our existence; there can be no doubt that this continent would have supplied a most appropriate scene for mystic figures and heroic impersonations. Every thing here on such a grand scale; magnitude exciting the senses, and magnificence overpowering the intellect; caves forming subterranean worlds, and lakes swelling into oceans; rivers, whose waters chill at the Pole and warm at the Equator; and vast mountains, stretching a girdle from Terra del Fuego to Arctic regions; what a panorama would all these have afforded, if a classic antiquity could have shed its grace over them! But it has been denied us. Higher laws than the conditions of poetry have been executed. Directed by an unseen hand, circumstances interposed a sovereign sway, and shut out the Western Hemisphere from the realms of imagination. No seductive mythology was allowed to spread its idolatries over the awaiting home of Christian freemen. No gorgeous fables were to be embodied here in captivating rituals. Not even chivalry and feudalism were permitted to have their knights and troubadours, representatives of valor and of song, in these hidden wilds. A new form of culture was to be assigned to man; a new volume of Providence was to be opened; a new series of wonders was to arise on the visions of our race; and hence, the continent was reserved for the maturing stage of humanity.

There is no philosophy in wishing that things had been otherwise. Reviewing the annals of the past, we see how admirably the Old World was fitted to be the nursery of the human family. Whatever could awaken thought and inspire sentiment; whatever could organize social instincts and develop massive power; whatever could fasten in men's minds the great sentiment of an overruling Providence, and engage their attention to the supreme interests of virtue and religion, was bestowed upon its successive generations. And yet it was chiefly the experience of types and shadows through which it passed. The religious culture of the Jew, while it occupied its own select ground and held a sullen reserve to all the rest of mankind, was indicative of the intellectual and political systems of antiquity. As the former appealed to the senses, and stimulated the imagination, so the latter trained the mind to think rather than to enjoy, to anticipate but not to realize. The childhood of our race must undergo just such a moral and social treatment. Not only in its spiritual but in its earthly connections, must it walk amidst mysteries, and commune with prefiguring symbols. Unconscious prophecies of the future were always around the Greek and the Roman—prophecies in statuary, in architecture, in splendid highways, in conquering eagles—picturesque anticipations of what man should be in the high attainment of his renovating glory. The greatness of the Greek in the presence of material nature; the grandeur of the Roman in the presence of men; and last, but more significant than they, the elect Jew, called to the priesthood of truth and the service of love, were the foreshadowings of a culture that should combine all their distinctive beauty, and of a condition that should unite their separate contributions in one calm and completed whole. Its advent past, Christianity assimilated whatever was worthy in these various agencies, and entered on the conquest of the world. The ancient institutions of civilized life crumbled away, and as the barbarian gathered about its cross, the true faith and a goodness above the earth were made known. Centuries of conflict followed. The spirit of the Greek, the Roman, the Jew still struggled for the mastery. Men loved carnal worship, and sought its gratifications. But the age of imaginative discipline waxed old and perished. Side by side, a Christian polity for the State and a Christian creed for the Church, a Christian spirit in art and a Christian truth in literature, arose and transformed the nations. It was then that the world had a westward direction given to its pilgrimage. Its imaginative zeal had expired in seeking the East with its hallowed soil and sepulchre; and now, its conscience aroused by the stern realities of truth, and its genuine heart enlisted in nobler duties, it was ready to follow the hand that traced its pathway toward the setting sun. It was still unconscious of its destiny. The part it was acting was concealed from its eye. Amidst all the wonders of that movement, nothing is so wonderful as the unconsciousness of its most memorable actions. It tried to retain the past; labored to perpetuate old prejudices and passions; celebrated ancient and honored festivals; and strove to keep its hereditary memories fresh and fragrant. Exiled in person but not in feeling, the founders of a new empire sought to stretch their cords across the sea, and bind themselves with their posterity to the land that had given them birth and strength. The future was to be the past purified. But their plans were defeated. A dim conjecture that they were engaged in a strange drama, impelled by unseen forces, and sustained by a mighty arm; a conjecture that took no shape from logic, and yet far removed from shapelessness, was fulfilled, while all their deliberate purposes were doomed to disappointment. One cycle had closed forever; another was now to begin. Despite of themselves, our fathers were torn from all former associations, and set apart for a special task. They were anointed as men had never been—they were anointed for the future. If at Plymouth Rock or at Jamestown they could but have seen, what a vision would have opened! What a finished series of providences! what a completed scroll of historic deeds! what results from slight causes as majestic as miracles! And yet, all end in liberating and ennobling Mind. A single power, Imagination, had always been the herald of a coming regeneration; but centuries of sorrow had to waste the hearts of men, and centuries of effort had to train their returning life, ere the image could be changed into a thought, the aspiration into a sentiment, the beautiful promise into a glad possession. In Politics, idealizing in Plato; in Song, beginning with the blind man of Greece and closing with the blind man of England; in Heroism, wandering as a weeper from Thermopylae, but reappearing in joy at Bunnymede and Marston Moor; in Devotion, uttering its strains in early prophets, and afterward, the summons lost, recovering its magic words in the fiery Luther; Imagination beholds the training of our race complete, and resigns its long-cherished charge to another guardianship.

If we were to specify the fact which, above all others, has been most favorable to the growth of our national mind, we should select its separation from those circumstances which hitherto had excited the imagination. Viewed in its social relations, this great faculty has been ordained to perform a preparatory work in the progress of mankind. It is the symbol, not the substance; and hence, while its office is essential to qualify and fit men to enter upon a high state of civilization, the laws of its action, considered in a social aspect, forbid its permanent continuance. Nothing, therefore, in our history has been more fortunate than this withdrawal from scenes, habits, and associations which nourished the sentiments and impulses of the imagination. It put us in a position to be a solid and substantial race; to feel the moral sublimity of our duty; to choose materials of strength instead of beauty for the superstructure of society. Had we been devoted to imaginative pursuit, fond of its pleasures, and eager to seek its gilded shows, where would have been the enterprise, the hardihood, the mighty endurance, which have been so conspicuous in the building up of an American empire! A love of sculpture, painting, music, and other fine arts, would have incapacitated us for a civilization that was destined to rise on the fresh sods of a wilderness, and to secure its triumphs by the severe exactions of skill, patience, and industry. Nor must we overlook the truth, that the experience which we acquired in the service of material nature, was a main element in our education for freedom. It was virtually a return to the normal state of humanity. Labor and life were restored to their original conditions. There was not a single institution between man and the earth. The soil was his property, and the hand of toil was unfettered. Necessity conspired with principle, the physical and the moral law united, to teach him the sacredness of labor. By this means he learned to rely upon himself, and to trust in the wisdom of that divine economy which ruled over him. If his circumstances brought him so near to the universe, the instrument of feeding, clothing, and sustaining him, they also drew him close to the bosom of Providence; and thus industry was in fellowship with reverence to inspire confidence and exalt agency. Our fathers owed almost every thing to this rigorous discipline. Inherited wisdom and borrowed science would never have made men of them. They were, indeed, indebted to the past; but they had nobler teachers than Hampden, and Milton, and Sidney. Cold and heat, sterile lands and scanty crops, swollen rivers and impassable mountains, poverty and suffering, barbarism hanging upon their borders and often descending upon their exposed habitations, tyranny in the mother country, the absence of sympathy and the loneliness of solitude, trained them to feel that they were competent to govern themselves. Never before was there such an illustration of the fact, that the purpose of Providence is to instruct man in the art of self-government, by directing him to subdue and regulate the outer world; and never before was witnessed the spectacle of Agriculture, Commerce, Art, Republicanism, and Christianity starting, side by side, in a career of harmony and splendor.

The circumstances of our position, as we have indicated, strongly tended to individualize our character, and urge us forward in a new pathway. Columbus was not more of a discoverer in the physical geography of the globe, than our fathers were in the practical science of administrative life. Transfer the genius of that extraordinary man from the ship to the soil, from mutinous sailors to discontented citizens, from the perils of the ocean to the dangers of the land; turn his eye from the faithful compass to the great sentiment of human rights, and in place of raising and setting stars, give him those vicissitudes which move through the circle of mortal experience, and nothing is wanted to complete the picture of a representative type of American statemanship. A host of Columbus-like heroes, these sturdy pioneers stood ready in their sphere to do the bidding of a heavenly word, or surrender their lives in its service. Fit successors to his manly faith and serene courage, born of the same spirit and baptized in the same suffering, they were worthy to consummate his wondrous work by finding another world within the one which he had rescued to civilization from the concealing waters of the deep. At the root of all their virtues lay the principle of obedience, and it gave a conscientious uniformity to their actions. Pliant in nothing else, they thought and labored as the creatures of Infinite Wisdom. The law of reconciliation was their law. Better still, it was their love and joy. And hence, they were prepared to appreciate the conditions of restraint under which the hope of their hearts was to realize its slow fulfillment. It was not an enterprise of cheerful promise and prompt reward that they had in hand. It was not an inviting field for the speculations of mammon or the ambition of fame. Every circumstance was calculated to repress the impulsive feelings of our nature. Dangers abounded. Difficulties were numerous and formidable. The climate was a foe—the savage was an enemy—the spirit of the age was hostile to their success. And yet, it is to this law of restraint that we are most signally indebted for the best lessons of American freedom. If it prevented an excess of emigration from abroad, it was still more fortunate in its effects at home. It led to a compact state of society. It colonized the Atlantic shores, and settled the white man in those sections of the continent where the aborigines were least likely to be permanently disturbed. It educated them to the sea, and early pointed out one of the chief sources of wealth and power. Above all else, it originated and matured at once a thorough system of colonization, and put them on the true line of social progress. The agency of Providence in reserving the continent for an age that could send a band of suitable men to occupy it, is apparent. But that was only a precautionary measure. Look at the watchful guardianship that rested not by day or slumbered by night, and that sustained so many means in operation to develop the country in perfect subordination to the just philosophy of moral and political growth. Had prosperity been rapid, it must have been fictitious and fugitive. If the length and breadth of the land had been open to adventure, the delights of novelty, and the excitements of feverish change would have introduced the destructive elements of instability into every movement. De Sotos and De Leona, followed by deluded thousands, would have scattered themselves far and wide. Imagination would have repeated the mockeries of the crusades, and every true interest of social life would have perished in gay revelry or licentious turbulence. Happy for them and us the severe restraints of physical circumstances had so much of Omnipotence infused into them. Idle superstitions could not burst through these iron barriers. Illusory dreams could not mislead them. The fabled waters of Colophon could not tempt them to search the wilderness, nor the visions of alchemists haunt their humble toil. Firm and faithful, they kept to their work as though it were a sacrament—intent on the present, and yet mindful of the future—like Abraham, reading their posterity in the stars of heaven, and content for the sure mercies of time to vindicate their tranquil trust.

If the reader will now recall our argument, he will see that, in respect to the elementary discipline of American mind, we have attached a special importance to the absence of imaginative sentiments from the experience of our forefathers, their separation from long-established institutions and seclusive position on a new continent, their dependence on personal agency in harmony with the laws of nature and the restraints of providential circumstances. Placed in the attitude they were, it was the demand of necessity that they should be prudent in foresight, sagacious in plans, resolute in peril, united in council, and untiring in exertions. The pressure of urgent motives was irresistible. If this had been all, if no higher destiny had been unfolded before them, their heroism would soon have been exhausted; character would have been dwarfed; the glory of the morning would not have ascended to the zenith and spread its meridian fullness around the firmament. Another era in their history was soon introduced. It was the era of independent thought and original action. A certain degree of adjustment to their physical condition having been attained—a groundwork of training laid—they were now ready for one more gigantic step in the process of civilization. They had acquired the arts of trade, the endearments of home, the institutions of learning and religion. They had learned to wait, and by waiting to triumph. They had been taught to suffer, and by suffering to be strong. The inspiration of the new hemisphere came upon them. It was the gift of tongues, for they spake a new language. It was the gift of social regeneration, for they entered on a new existence. It was the Pentecost of freedom. How suddenly the former types and shadows vanished away—how clear and cool was the light that bathed their brows—how quick the descent of a renewing spirit! Plymouth Rock and Jamestown revealed their hidden meaning. Carver and Mather—Roger Williams and William Penn—Calvert and Smith—what tragic personages were they in that strange radiance which poured back upon their forms and features! And as the stream of splendor pierced the gloom of ages past, the mysteries of history were explained—mysteries of Star Chambers and Inquisitions—the secrets of Bunyan's prison and Rogers's martyrdom.

The facts of our Revolution show that the issue was one of pure principle. None of the grievances complained of by the Colonies were intolerable. Worse evils have been patiently endured. The struggle was for political rights, and not a retaliation for personal and social wrongs. Nothing could have been more fortunate than that the controversy assumed this peculiar shape. Had it been a resistance to the grosser forms of tyranny, the most vindictive passions must have been aroused. Goaded to desperation, men would have forgotten their allegiance to truth and virtue. It would have necessarily been a licentious warfare. If successful, what a penalty would have been paid! The moral effect must have proved disastrous to the mind of our country; the fearful extent to which it must have interfered with the subsequent establishment of a wise government can scarcely be imagined. As it was, our fathers came out of it—men. The whole contest was an exception—a marked exception—to the usual course of war. It did not debauch them; and hence, when the time came to organize institutions for the protection of personal and relative rights, they were left with calm judgments and subdued feelings for the great work. In brief, the war of the Revolution continued the same high and heroic discipline that had previously developed the strength and excellence of their character. All through, from the landing of the Pilgrim Fathers to the surrender at Yorktown—from the settlement on James River to the treaty of peace—it was the same struggle; inspired by one motive, directed by one sentiment, supported by one hope, consecrated to one end. Standing then at this point, let us review the ground that has been traversed. The most unlike things are brought together by some strange affinity, and harmonized into a perfect system. Instruments are selected from all departments of nature, and combined into a mighty machinery. The infinite resources of Providence contribute their chosen agencies, and ere men are aware, they are encircled in a miniature Universe, where every element of force and every orb of movement gravitates toward a common centre. The rigors of climate harden their muscles, and the toil of the fields braces their nerves. Summer night-dews and winter frosts impress the lesson of care and prudence, while forest and flood invite to danger and reward courage. Newfoundland fisheries and mountain clearings, the heights of Quebec and the wilds of the Alleghanies, conflicts with Frenchmen and surprises from Indians, train eye and hand for future need. Different social castes—cavaliers, criminals, redemptionists: unlike tastes, such as separated gay courtiers from sober Puritans; precise Quakers and loose worldlings; polished Huguenots and sturdy Germans; Englishmen of the spirit of Charles, and Englishmen of the spirit of Cromwell; men who venerated Lord Baltimore, and men who followed Anne Hutchinson; natives of hostile countries; antagonists in taste and temper, as well as antipodes in religion; are all fused into a common mass, and qualified for the enjoyment of a common citizenship. And, as in chaos, each discordant element was set free from the convulsive strife, and gathered to its domain—as the light leaped to the sky and sphered itself in perpetual beauty—as the waters, chafed no more, laid themselves to rest in the hollows of the continents, and the winds, listening to the strain of the "morning star," soothed themselves into the gentle melody—the earth all fair, and the firmament all fadeless—so here, in humbler measure, but beneath the same disposing arm, another world arose from the deep of ages, and entered on the circuit of its shining.

There is now an American Society, an American Government, an American Life. Institutions to protect person, property, and pursuit, acknowledging the supreme authority of God and the inherent civil sovereignty of man, have been established. The oath of ratification, the first act of an enfranchised people, has been formally, deliberately, solemnly sworn, and henceforth a nation becomes a partner with Providence in the advancement of truth, justice, and benevolence among men. And yet, in this very moment, when the nation assumed the highest of all earthly responsibilities, it is evident that the system is better than the subjects. A forward movement, in reference to Europe, we often call it, but let us not forget that it was also a forward movement with respect to ourselves. In a general point of view, it was adapted to our character and condition. But nevertheless, it was a heavy draft upon the future. Allowing for its stringent checks—for the wise parsimony with which it dealt out power—for the balance of one interest against another in the well-poised scales of justice—for simple duties and defined objects—allowing for all these provisions of ripe intelligence and mature experience, it was still an experiment, not on what man was, but on what he might become. Poetry can not monopolize all the ideals of the world. Science, as well as poetry, has its hours of communion with the Infinite Beauty. So has Truth, whenever it discloses its perfect majesty and challenges the reverence of the heart. Such ideals as these came to Newton in the solitary orchard—to Columbus in the night-watches of the ocean—to Luther in the monastery of Erfurth—to Socrates in his meditative musings on immortality. And among them, though rigidly deduced from consciousness and historical facts, we place the American system. It was not the Republic of Plato nor the Utopia of More, and yet it was a prophetic anticipation of the brighter days of humanity. Instincts, sentiments, hopes—ideas of equality and brotherhood—millennial adumbrations in partial outline—were embodied therein for the first time in the career of the world. The great problem was—Can men live up to such a standard? This question could be answered with an à priori affirmative, if one condition could be determined, and that is, whether the institutions themselves, in connection with the tendencies of public opinion and the circumstances of the people, had a sufficient degree of disciplinary power to raise the nation to their own level. But it is obvious that, reason as we may, the only sure test in such a matter is experience.

There was less contrariety between the theory and the practice of our government than any one would have imagined. Inconsistencies did arise and threaten serious dangers. Some of our greatest men were suspicious of popular rights. One party leaned toward England, another toward France. The trustworthiness of the people continued in debate for years, and on both sides the logical argument was exhausted. Anti-republican and extra-republican measures were advocated. Mind met mind in earnest collision. All this was inevitable. For the remnants of the past still existed among us. Private prejudices and personal predilections had not departed, nor had the mighty bias of early education been altogether set aside. No wonder, then, that this conflict between opposing elements was so warmly maintained. Viewed in a philosophic light, it was essential to the adjustment of our national mind to its institutions, and without it there could have been no real progress in strength and greatness. It was that sort of diversity in sentiment which never fails to produce final unity in action, and consequently a practical policy was developed that brought the heart of the people into a living relation to the American system. Our early timidity, springing from a profound sense of responsibilities, was a natural product of the occasion; and though, in some instances, it generated too much hesitancy, and yielded more of hope than was manly to a morbid apprehension, yet it must be confessed that it performed a most salutary part in cultivating our national sensibilities. Time put all things right. If, at first, our national ideas lacked completeness and force; if, indeed, our independence was but partially realized; the lapse of a quarter of a century from the birth of the Constitution furnished us with an opportunity to test our strength. The second war with England was far more than a conflict between the interests of one hemisphere and the ambition of the other. It was a warfare at home. Men who reasoned from the logic of history, and men who consulted their native impulses, were then in fierce debate. One class of thinkers looked at our youth, weakness, and physical inferiority: the other relied on impulse and prowess. One wanted heroes ready-made for the emergency; the other trusted to the emergency to create heroes. Divested of its circumstantial incidents, it was a struggle between the spirit of the past and the spirit of the future. How that struggle went on, how true-hearted patriots differed, how eloquence pleaded and courage fought, how dangers were braved and disasters endured, how the country came out victorious, are well-known facts. A new era commenced. Party zeal subsided. The best feelings of the nation were awakened, and the bands of brotherhood were more firmly riveted. It was the great trial of confidence. The strength of the government, the strength of public opinion, the strength of the people, were all subjected to no ordinary test, and the result did more to organize a just national sentiment, to correct errors, to conquer prejudices, and to inspire hope in the perpetuity of our institutions, than any thing which we have experienced. And especially is it to be noticed, that commerce and colonization—the former gathering its immense revenue from the sea, and the latter from the ocean-like prairies of the West—were then set free from all artificial restraints, and allowed to act their part as the most important auxiliaries to national prosperity.

Let us now take the last thirty-five years of our existence, and see how we have been educated. Our progress in developing the material resources which the hand of the Creator has put within our reach, has been unexampled. But this fact, taken as a simple illustration of successful industry, would lose much of its moral significance. The main thing for us to study is the effect of this accumulating wealth on our social relations, and its bearings on other sections of the world. And here, every observant man must be struck with the phenomenon of the day, viz., the perfect harmony between the materialism (so called) of our civilization and the political system which governs us. The masses of the people have been the great recipients of these advantages. Sovereigns in the eye of our republican philosophy, what else have they proved themselves to be in demanding the tribute of universal nature! Had they been content with the sceptre of political authority, they might have played a part in a pantomime, and added one more pageant to the delusive shows of the senses. But see! That sceptre has waved over the dreary sand-beds of our coast—over bald, bleak hills—over beds of mineral ore and vast forests of timber; and it has demonstrated a practical sovereignty in every realm of matter that it has claimed. The means of enterprise have multiplied; the sources of wealth have been augmented, as well as the ratio of its distribution; and whole classes of society, which most needed the aid of material comfort and luxury to elevate their position and strengthen their influence, have been most abundantly favored by the physical growth of the country. Popular power, moving along its line of constitutional government and popular wealth, enriching the hands of honest toil and soothing the age of active enterprise, have been, in an extraordinary degree, coincident. Few circumstances in our history have been more conducive to the stability of free institutions. Poverty is always an evil. It drags man down to the dust, crushes the glowing aspirations of his heart, and ordains him to the companionship of sorrow and suffering. But poverty in a country like ours, where the condition of the people must express itself, where bitterness, ignorance, and discontent would find so many channels to flow through, and spread themselves out far and wide over the surface of political life, would be vastly more pernicious to society than we commonly suppose. If our wealth pampered an idle, exclusive class, it would be a terrible curse. If one portion of society grew rich at the expense of another, that would prove the cause of weakness, disorder, misery. But whenever industry reaps its own rewards, it is entitled to enjoy them; and we may be sure that in all such cases wealth will show itself to be a providential instrument for the improvement of mankind. For what, among earthly things, is a stronger argument to make a freeman think, vote, act like an intelligent being, than the consciousness that he has a happy home, a substantial income, a cheerful future, to be affected by the legislative policy of his country? Idealists may laugh at such motives, and certain refinements of morality may deride them, but God governs the world by availing himself of the operations of men's senses and appetites, as well as their conscience and reason. And hence we rejoice that the laborer, the artisan, the mechanic, the farmer, have shared so largely in the progressive wealth of the land. The brightest picture in our history is the advancement of the workingman into the front rank of distinction and influence. Look into our monetary institutions—benevolent movements—churches; look into chambers of commerce and halls of legislation; and there you see the wisdom, the practical sagacity, the conservative prudence to which we are so signally indebted. And on this account, so far, at least, as our native population is concerned, the same classes of the community that elsewhere are most dreaded as fomenters of strife and unbridled revolutionists, are among the best safeguards for our protection.

By what other means have we been educated? First in order are the sectional peculiarities of our industry. It was a master stroke of statesmanship to combine thirteen states into one system. The truth of our principle of union has been verified in the addition of eighteen more; and experience has satisfactorily proven, that if the integrity of our government can be maintained, there is nothing to fear on the score of territory. We find a beautiful analogy to this fact in the diversity of our productive labor. Breadth of space, variety of climate, and multiplicity of interests, are our natural bonds of union. As supplements to our political ties, as instruments to mature and perfect our brotherhood, they can not be too highly estimated. If it were not for our local politics, for the township, the city, the state, and the education that they afford us in managing the immediate concerns of civil life, it is easy to perceive that our national citizenship would be deprived of its most salutary and effective culture. The same truth applies to the relations of our industry. The different arts which we cultivate not only train our hands to individual skill, but they insure completeness to the social fabric by drawing us closely together. It is all a divine lesson of fraternal peace. It is the moral of Israel's chosen tribes, dividing the land of the olive and the vine, and dwelling each in its own possession, beneath the same smiling sky. Speculate as dreamers may, the law of essential and permanent diversity is the reliance of all solid civilization, and the security for all substantial government. But for the necessity for internal commerce and social interchange that it devolves on us, our country could have no title to grandeur. Imagine a United States North or South, East or West. Divide our territory to lines of separation, and insulate each portion by itself, what sort of a picture would this be! What type could represent it! What symbol could the universe give to be stamped upon their shields, and emblazoned on their banners! If one flesh—one blood—one spirit—one life—can not unite us together, it is madness to think that we can exist independently of one another. The wild beast has his solitary lair; the lion, his desert; the tiger, his jungle; but to us, endowed with a heavenly image, and anointed to live in the offices of true and trustful love, God has appointed "the bounds of our habitation." The decree of His providence has gone forth, and it can not be evaded. If we disobey its precepts and defy its warnings, can we find another Protector and Defense? Can we substitute commercial treaties and international agreements in the place of His law and order? Can we form a new Providence out of statesmanship, and put our science on the throne of the world? Savages have their idolatries, and France, smitten with woes, rushed to the shrine of Harlotry. But to us, no such refuge would remain. The slaughtering Demon, that mocks its eternal thirst in the blood of its victims, would seize us as outcasts from virtue and hope.

The laws of industry and trade are usually assigned to a distinct branch of political economy. But the progress of society tends to introduce them into a higher department of science. The moralist, the Christian philosopher, see that their workings evolve interests beyond themselves, and finally penetrate the very heart of national existence. To such meditations the history of our civilization summons us. Year after year, and generation after generation, a disposing hand has been arranging the physical materials of our hemisphere into a compact system, and compelling them to subserve a general end. First of all, invention has come to its aid. A student of the best and quickest near following nature wherever she indicates a method, learning secrets from dynamic, chemical, and magnetic forces, investigating the motions of winds and waves; toiling away from the haunts of men to open the spheres of art, and to repeat on an humble scale the instructive and dazzling wonders of the universe, it has succeeded in improving almost every form of human power, and strengthening the relations of mind to matter. Invention has given the cotton-gin to the South, the steamboat to the sea, the railroad to the remote West, the telegraph to the whole land. It has given his most effective implements to the farmer, the miner, and the manufacturer. A new anatomy of flesh and blood, it has created muscles to lift the rock from deep quarries, to transfer the forest to the ship-yard, to endow the steam-press with intelligence, and make its fingers move with the exactness of calculating consciousness. And yet more wondrous in its skill, it has imitated the nerves of animal life, spread a fine net-work of wires over the country, and taught it to move with every thought of the busy brain or quiver with the passions of the heart. Not with the pride of Mammon do we contemplate these things. No; they utter another meaning. The true moral of one and all is, the beautiful parallel that they have instituted between our political and social circumstances, and the mighty agency which they have in perfecting the bonds of union established by Republicanism and Christianity. And let it be observed in the next place, that this system of industry covers the entire ground of civilization. Either directly or indirectly it meets all human necessities. If it yielded only food and clothing, comfort and luxury, it might be resigned to an humble sphere in the economy of life. But who can limit it within such bounds? The wisdom that labor develops can not be confined to material pursuit, nor can the virtue which it inspires be exhausted in its service. The glad hours of leisure; the charms of literature and social intercourse; the sanctity of the Sabbath and the purity of divine worship; home with its blessings, and heaven with its beatitudes; will all spread their welcoming invitations before the intellect that has thus been trained by the presence of truth and goodness in the works of nature and the institutions of society.

How, then, have we been educated? The wealth of Europe did not give its capital, the mind of Europe did not send forth its genius, the pride of Europe did not contribute its gallant knight-hood, to found an empire on these shores. And yet, its richest treasures were gathered here. The stern monk, who recovered the Ark and its hallowed deposit; the earnest Keplers and Galileos, who toiled among the stars, and opened the paths of science to their radiance; the Napiers, who put figures to new uses, and the Bacons, who restored facts to the service of philosophy; Milton with his song, and Hampden with his sword; Baxter with his prolific pen, and Bunyan with his gorgeous dream; all gave utterance to thoughts that were destined to find a high and illustrious vocation here. Crownless princes they, and martyred, too, to their own wisdom, but reappearing in a race that should realize their fondest aspirations. The seed-thoughts that they scattered—what a genial soil was ready here! And how many clouds, rising from distant seas, and floating on from remotest skies—how many dews, that the night of adversity has shaken from its chill air—have dropped their moisture on the tender shoots! And with what kindliness has the sunshine quickened their growth, and how tenderly has the encircling atmosphere bathed their foliage! But this is not all. Debtors are we to Europe, but debtors, in a still greater sense, to our own hemisphere. Derived power has created original power. The ministry of Nature and Providence, of Government and Society, of Education and Religion, has here shaped itself to the sublime work. Our own agencies have been the most successful in forming our character. None of them have been gigantic—so much the better. None of them have been glittering to the eye or resplendent to the fancy—so much the better. They look like atoms, and yet they are worlds. How small in compass, and insensible in operation, yet, on these same accounts, so much the more potent and divine! Had we had Phidias in Sculpture, Raphaels in Painting, Shakspeares in Poetry, Handels in Music, Bonapartes in Action, our imagination might have grown intenser; our devotion to taste and beauty might have glowed more warmly; and our piety, catching the images of curling vines, crested waves, and curving skies, might have raised a magnificent architecture to the Infinite; but sure are we, that all these splendors would have deluded us from the homely toil to which we were appointed, and cheated us of our high and holy destiny. Not Art nor Literature, not grand conceptions nor startling deeds, have been our work; not these, our clear-spoken calling; but to other and fresher fields, where the watchful angels of duty wear not their faces veiled, and shadows mimic substance no longer, have our footsteps been directed.

How, THEN, HAVE WE BEEN EDUCATED?

By the Land, groaning under the curse of early sin, yet groaning to be delivered. By the Ax, that has felled forest, and then fashioned them into homes. By the Rifle, that has driven out the wild beasts, and made the wilderness habitable. By the Plow, piercing the soil, and laying bare the sod to the sunshine long unknown. By the Machinery, that has converted the flax and cotton of the plantation into serviceable fabrics for mankind. By the Quarry and the Mine; by the chemistry of the seasons; by the grain harvest of the Summer and the ice harvest of the Winter. By the Banks of Newfoundland; by the Gulf Stream, that wandering tropic of the sea; by the waters of the Pacific, where the hardy mariner takes the whale. By Commerce on every ocean; by Trade with every people. By the Common School and the College, dispensing knowledge and virtue to millions of recipients. By the Press, that daily tongue, which speaks all languages, reports all transactions, and carries its swift eloquence into every corner of the land. By the Pulpit, where the gospel of revelation proclaims the message of "Peace on earth; good-will to man." And yet more. Call over the men who have caught the glimpses of the future, and told them in burning words. Call over the splendid roll of those who have been wise in counsel, fearless in trust, rich in hope, bold in command, intrepid in deed—martyr-spirits, with or without the seal of fire. These—a hallowed group—have taught us. But not alone. Hidden from the public eye, and sheltered within calm retreats, the ministry of another priesthood has blessed us with the wisdom of love and purity. Gentle be the tone, even as an audible breathing of the heart, and fervent the gratitude that utters it—THE PRIESTHOOD OF WOMAN.

Editor's Easy Chair.

IN the national wall which has not yet died away, the thoughtful ear seems to hear a Rachel mourning for her children. There are certain great and striking crises when men feel their direct brotherhood most strongly, and emancipate themselves from the conventional separation necessitated by society. Such crises are not only the terrible tragedy, like that of the Arctic, but the universal shock of terror and sympathy among those who may be in no way related to any of the victims. How well we remember when the news of the safety of the Atlantic, three or four years since, arrived in the city. It was at evening, and the Extras, in a moment, sowed the exciting news broadcast over the town. Men stopped each other in the streets, and told the glad tidings as of some great victory which had secured peace and prosperity to the land. Crowds gathered under the lanterns, while some loud voice read out the happy news. People looked in at shops and up at windows, saying, "The Atlantic is safe!" In the theatres the managers rushed upon the stage in the midst of the performance, and announced to the audience what every one was rejoiced to hear. For that evening men stood upon the ground of a common manhood, sure of individual sympathy, in the universal joy.

It was different the other day. The fate of the Arctic will be one of the dark spots in all our memories. It is not alone terrible for the awful suffering and sudden fate of all those human beings so full of life and hope in the moment of their ending; nor for the desolating reach of the blow into thousands of families, whose grief shall never be known nor suspected; nor for the inevitable agonies of such a tragedy alone, is it terrible; but for that deeper and more solemn mystery which it casts upon the ocean voyage. So common has it now become, so regularly thronged a highway is the sea, that its old terrors, the colossal fear which girded it like a horizon, warning the bravest mariners away, had gradually been veiled, or had receded into a remote conviction that science and skill had fully mastered its dangers.

But at high noon a stout, swift steamer, one of the largest and strongest of vessels, is struck with so little shock, that the jar is scarcely perceived in the cabin, and long before sunset a few drifting spars, tossing upon the waves, are all the relics of that stately ship. Who can wonder that the public heart stood still? Who can doubt that secret founts of unsuspected pity gushed in hearts that were surprised by their own tenderness? Who does not know how at morning and in the night the thought of so terrible a thing stole into his mind, and touched his life with humility? Who can not well believe that, as a survivor reported, when the insatiate sea closed forever over the ruins of that bark of precious lives, a hollow sigh, a groan (from the steam and heat, perhaps, in the boilers) rose over the wreck, and mingled with the dying cry of human despair?

One such event restores all the ancient terror to the sea, and compels every man who steps upon a ship to reflect upon the solemnity of his undertaking. It is not that accidents are not as common upon land, nor that the chances of life are at all paralyzed by the water. But there is a sense of solitude, of separation, of necessity, upon the sea, which is never felt upon the land. Beyond the limits of your vessel there is little safety, and that vessel is but a chip in a maelstrom, when danger threatens. It is not strange that when a storm is rising men gather in the cabin, and, as the ship begins to heave and pitch in the billows, tell wild and startling stories of shipwreck. A fearful sympathy holds them to the theme. Like children telling ghost stories in a haunted house, every sound and movement gives only too fearful a reality to their words.

But here was no storm, no long suspense, no fluctuating hope. Without doubt, it was only at the last moment that the passengers really supposed that the last moment had arrived. Suddenly, in the very flush of life, they were confronted with death; and let us believe that they met it calmly, nobly, trustfully, like men. For at such times every man is apt to be a hero. If there is any latent nobility in his character, it is developed and takes the mastery. When some weak and effeminate Louis XVI. mounts the scaffold, his behavior is so beautiful that he will have the sympathy of the world forever. A Charles I. hears so serenely the noisy building of his scaffold, and stands upon it so gravely and patiently, that history is almost ready to wish the revolution unfought. If such illustrious instances of the port of men not really great are so refreshing, even when they had every reason and occasion to seem heroic, whether they really were so or not, think of that solitary and lost multitude, that hecatomb of brave victims, sinking in the sea, without a cause to support, without a party to applaud, with no muse to catch their names, with no future of renown and expiatory praise; yet—for who can doubt it who has seen similar and sudden crises?—calm, and sweet, and gentle, and lying down, with true heroism, in the remorseless and unyielding sea.

We can look at this great misfortune quietly from this distance of time. The daily papers have not failed to suggest scores of means of escape which did not occur to the victims—which were, perhaps, not possible in the actual circumstances of the case. The captain, who was so providentially saved, was received by exulting crowds like a monarch returning triumphant. Ill-judging enthusiasm proposed a hundred things which a sailor's good sense declined. At most he had done his duty. A thoughtful man is saddened to see that heroism and devotion to duty are considered worthy an especial ovation. A general who falls victorious at the head of his advancing army is held in long and sweet remembrance in his country's heart. But his conduct is not considered to be a subject of compliment. Suppose he had fled? What a peal of disgust would have rung through the world!

Every great accident at sea not only reminds us how grave and awful are the chances of the ocean, but it puts those who are absent further away. So easy and pleasant had the Atlantic passage become, that Switzerland seemed quite near enough for a summer ramble, and Rome for a winter visit. But now Switzerland and Italy are thrust into a deeper and more inaccessible distance, and all the friends who are traveling there seem much further away. In view of these colossal calamities one can well understand the timid mariners creeping along the shores of the Mediterranean, and dreading the open sea. That cloudy waste of water—that race-course of the winds—that arena of tempests—why should we tempt it, we who love the solid, green earth, and the limitations of the landscape?

But since it must be—since Death and sad disaster haunt the shore also—it is foolish to indulge any extravagant apprehension, or to suppose the sea less safe because the Arctic is lost. It is wiser to consider that speed is not safety—that it is better to arrive in New York a day later than not to arrive at all, but to perish hopelessly at the very portals of home. It is wiser to remember that there may be guilt where no crime is intended—that there are things too precious to be bought by any kind of outward success—that it is better to keep three hundred passengers three months upon the ocean, rather than that the family of one should suffer unavailingly over his unnecessary loss. There are wiser things to do, when great catastrophes occur, than returning thanks to officials, and exculpating men in authority. Let us bethink ourselves that human life is costly and dear in many senses, and that each man in society is, to a certain degree, responsible for every other. The moral of every event seems to be charity. For those who have escaped the terrible tragedy of the Arctic, there is sympathy and consideration. For those who have perished, the most tender and regretful remembrance of the many, and the life-long sorrow of the few. But how deeply we shall all be guilty if such events occur again! This was not an unavoidable accident. Two ships, upon a part of the ocean where ships are thickest, are sailing at a rapid rate in a fog so dense that they can not be perceived until they strike. The echo of that collision is the wild wail of broken hearts, much more than the death-cry of the sufferers. Shall it have no other echo, no other influence? Shall it be that our wives, and children, and friends are to be exposed to a recklessness which is not excusable because it is the custom? Or are we all so little interested in the true well-being of society, that we will submit to these fearful possibilities without an effort?

We are glad that from our Easy Chair we can prolong the thoughtfulness into which this event has plunged the public mind. And you, good friend, whose eye falls here, what can you do to help or to avert such things? Do not wait until the bitter moment of doubt, struggle, and despair, when you ask yourself the question, "Why did I not feel that it was my business?" Whatever tends to cheapen human life, is the serious business of every man.

SINCE the sudden demise of the Art Union, there has been less attention called to pictures and painters. In truth Art finds America an ungenial soil. There are plenty of earnest and devoted men engaged in painting; but the studios are not necessary places of resort as in Europe. When strangers—as in the autumn—through the city, they do not inquire for the pictures hanging upon the walls of the painters as they do for the theatre and the opera. The Earl of Ellesmere did differently. He did, as all cultivated gentlemen in Europe do, he remembered that the intellectual and aesthetic condition of a civilization is to be seen and studied in its art, and he naturally sought the studios. We have formerly mentioned that he commissioned several pictures here, from Kensett, Church, and others—some of which have arrived, and adorn the Bridgewater Gallery in London.

But although the private studios are not much frequented, there are not wanting public opportunities of seeing and enjoying fine works of art; and, indeed, the course of the empire of Art seems to be tending slowly westward. We have had the most illustrious of contemporary singers, and instrumental virtuosos—Paul Delaroché's Napoleon has found his way here; Landseer is desirous that America should see his dogs and deer; and the finest picture of the chief school of Germany, Leutze's Washington at Monmouth, is a permanent possession here. We can not but consider the presence of such works public advantages. The enjoyment of the great things of Art is a matter of cultivation; and it is pleasant to go to school to such masters as the best contemporary Englishmen, Germans, and Frenchmen.

Washington at Monmouth is in many respects the most important and interesting picture we have ever seen in this country. It is a work of universal interest, because we can not escape the commanding charm of every thing that represents great events in the life of our great hero. That Mr. Leutze should have selected this especial subject, shows not only a fine perception of the historical picturesque, but a bold confidence in his ability to present, and in the public patience to tolerate, a moment in the career of Washington entirely different from any other, and totally at variance with the general estimate of his character.

The placid, wiggled, and knee-breeched gentleman, with a sword at his side and books and papers upon a neighboring table, whom we are accustomed to recognize as the Father of his country—or indeed the grave and beneficent historical image of the hero, the Roman fortitude, the incorruptible integrity, the severe simplicity, the punctilious politeness—all the points and principles which combine to make up an idea of the model man of the century and of history, are not in every respect corroborated by personal tradition. It seems to be well authenticated that he was a man of very hasty temper, although he held it firmly under control. But not so much so, it appears, that it did not sometimes break out and master him. Lately we have heard an anecdote illustrative of this fact. When Stuart was painting Washington's portrait, he was rallied one day by the General for his slow work. The painter protested that the picture could not advance until the canvas was dry, and that there must be yet some delay. Upon arriving the next morning, Stuart turned his canvas and discovered, to his great horror, that the picture was spoiled.

"General," said he, "somebody has held this picture to the fire."

Washington summoned his negro valet, Sam, and demanded of him, in great indignation, who had dared to touch the portrait. The trembling Sam replied, that, chancing to overhear Washington's expression of impatience at the slowness of the work, and the response of the artist that it must be dry before he could go on, he had ventured to put the canvas before the fire. Washington, with great anger, dismissed him, and told him not to show his face again.

But the next day, after Stuart had arrived and was preparing to work, Washington rang the bell, and sent for Sam. He came in abashed and trembling. The President drew a new silver watch from his pocket, and said:

"Come here, Sam. Take this watch, and whenever you look at it, remember that your master, in a moment of passion, said to you what he now regrets, and that he was not ashamed to confess that he had done so."

Many similar anecdotes live in tradition. But the one great instance—which may be called the historical instance—of his expression of violent passion, was that of the battle of Monmouth, when General Lee, leading his troops in full retreat, was met by Washington, who, totally unable to control himself, called Lee fiercely to account, even swore at him, and then repelled, by the energy of his own example, appealing to the shame of the army, the hasty and disorderly retreat.

The artist has shown great discrimination in selecting a subject where Washington, being in full action, was, at the same moment, strictly within universal human sympathy. We can all understand the hearty indignation of a hero at cowardice, and the irrepressible contempt of a brave leader for a subordinate who retires without reason. The picture is so fine, and so well worth seeing by those of our friends who come to the city from a distance, that we will try to give them some idea of it.

Every picture should tell its own story—an axiom which implies certain conditions. A picture of the Crucifixion tells its story only to those who know the Christian history. To any other observer it is only a man in agony. So with a historical picture, the men and the circumstances must be known, or the picture has no meaning. Thus in Horace Vernet's great picture at Versailles, the spectator who recognizes the French soldiers, perceives instantly that it is a modern French battle in Algiers; and if he is familiar with the history, he will easily determine what battle it is. In like manner a student of American history, which we all are, confronted with this picture of Leutze's, and knowing it to be what it is, an incident in the life of Washington, responds, at a glance, Washington at Monmouth. This is its first great success. It is unmistakable. It tells its story.

The battle of Monmouth was fought upon a burning midsummer day. It was supposed that as many died from heat as from the chance of battle. Washington had sent forward an advance-guard with General Lee, his second in command. The command had at first been given to Lafayette, for Lee was so much opposed to the battle that he did not care to take part in it. But finding Washington resolved, he claimed his position. He had gone on to meet the enemy and commence the engagement, while Washington came up with the main army. The attack was made near Monmouth court-house. There was confusion but great bravery upon the American side, until, perplexed and uncertain, General Lee ordered a retreat at the wrong moment. The militia immediately commenced crossing a morass which lay between them and the main body, which was advancing under Washington. Suddenly he perceived the tumultuous approach of the militia, swarming in wild confusion across the swamp. Perceiving in a moment the moral influence upon the main body of such a reckless retreat of the advance-guard—foreseeing the panic and flight, and the consequent incalculable detriment to the Continental cause, he buried his spurs in his horse's flanks, and dashed on the full run across the morass straight toward the hurrying and disorderly mass. The heat was unpeakable; the sand rolled in clouds—the militia were fainting and falling overpowered at every step. General Lee was riding in front of the column, and Washington rode directly at him. He called him to account in the severest manner—flung at him an oath of contempt; but perceiving that the immediate evil to be obviated was the retreat itself, he swept on into the midst of the militia, and with the impetuous energy of rage, and the conviction of an imminent danger to the great cause impending, he succeeded in stemming the retreat. The wilted soldiers revived at the sight of their General, and recoiled before his scornful rebuke. He inspired them with his own consciousness of a disgrace hanging over them, and a vital misfortune threatening the cause. They rallied, took heart, and advanced again. The day was won: Washington was justified, and Lee forever disgraced.

Here are all the elements of a fine historical picture, and the artist who so clearly saw, has known equally well how to use them.

The picture is about as large as the Washington crossing the Delaware. It is crowded with figures and full of action, but there is not the slightest confusion. The eye is at once master of the scene. The centre of the foreground is a pool in the marsh, fringed with long grass and reeds. A dog is plunging in and lapping the water. In the left foreground come in the hurrying militia. One youth, death-stricken, and with glazed eyes, reaches feebly forward toward the pool. He clings to a rough backwoodsman, who supports his dying son, and looks absorbingly at Washington. Behind them is the multitude thronging through the swamp, and streaming across the picture from the left corner of the foreground to the upper right corner of the background. One of the finest figures in the left is a youth, evidently a gentleman, who, abashed by the eagle eye of the chief, and reproved by his own shame, stands leaning back upon the crowd, with both arms outstretched to restrain their flight, and half glancing from under his brows at the indignant face he dare not fully front. Behind him the great mass pushes on.

Washington occupies the centre of the picture. His horse springs at full gallop over the edge of the pool toward the left foreground. His rider's left hand curbs him, and his right is stretched straight up in the air brandishing his sword, in the furious conflict of his feelings, to wave backward the retreat. This action gives a breadth to his movement. It makes his intention more manifest. It multiplies and enlarges his presence. It is simple, instinctive, natural, and not in the least melodramatic. The face of Washington is that of a man violently excited by anger. It is hardly recognizable as the Washington of the usual portraits. But there is a fine scorn in the mouth, and an eagerness of defiance against the retreat, which fill the face with expression. The figure, for some reason, perhaps faulty drawing, and perhaps the long lappels of the waistcoat would necessarily produce such an effect, seems too solid and short for Washington.

His action is not directed to an individual, but to the whole retreating mass. This has been noticed as a fault. It was contended that the proper historic moment was the rebuke to Lee, who caused the retreat. And that therefore the movement of Washington should have been directed to Lee.

But clearly the great point is the retreat itself, not its leader; and Washington's great act is stemming the retreat, not cursing the chief who allowed it. Perfect justice is done to this claim. The scornful wrath at the inconstant General yet lingers upon the lips which curl with a larger and impersonal indignation at the flying army. General Lee sits upon a white horse in the middle distance, just before Washington. His head sinks sullenly. His eyes have the dull sulkiness of a snake. His whole mien indicates a man utterly abashed and ashamed, with a consciousness of guilt. He is withdrawn into the middle distance by design, for he is only in the middle distance of interest. Washington transfixes him with contempt, and instantly waving him aside, sweeps around to his task.

Lafayette and Hamilton press on immediately behind Washington. The bland, courteous, but formal and far from forcible face of Lafayette, is strained toward the retreating columns and General Lee. Hamilton's small, concentrated, and intense face, drawn in so as to throw the brow forward, is as full of thought as Lafayette's of curiosity. These two heads are finely contrasted. In the right foreground is another carefully-considered group. A drummer boy recoils from the heels of Washington's horse. A farmer youth, with his musket resting upon his shoulder, waves his hat enthusiastically, greeting his chief. Another youth, just wounded, falls back in mortal agony, supported by a grave older man, while a comrade stoops over the pool and dips water for his dying friend.

The central background of the picture is a knoll or little hill, upon the top of which a company of flying artillery is just wheeling into play. The brisk action of the horses and soldiers in this group carry on completely the movement of the picture, and impress the spectator with the conviction that the battle is still going on. On the extreme right background stand the main body of the Continental troops. In the extreme left the English regulars or Hessians are showing themselves upon the verge of a wood.

The faults that strike us in this work, and we are by no means sure that longer study would not remove them, are an appearance of flatness in the figures of the middle distance, a want of round flesh-and-blood outline; and too cold an atmosphere. The distance has a bluish, thin look, more autumnal than the fervor of midsummer.

But, for the rest, it is a stirring, spirited work, without any thing too fine or over-wrought, nothing finical, or symbolical in a small way. The scene was simple, the emotions were strong, and simple and strong the painter has made them. If it be asked what great moral or intellectual significance has such a picture, we must remember before we reply, that every work representing a strictly historical event, a mere circumstance, is great by the magnitude of the results that depend upon the single action represented. The pictures of martyrdoms, as for instance that of Huss, can not represent any result; they can only deal with the circumstance of a moment. The grandeur which invests in imagination Rubens's Descent from the Cross, and the same picture of Daniele da Volterra, lies in the solemn remembrance of the mind which regards it of the sublime significance of the words—"It is finished." The picture shows a corpse taken from a cross, by careful hands, while weeping friends are near. But great pictures are painted for "my mind's eye, Horatio."

In the same way this picture represents the moment in which the battle of Monmouth was won. It is Monmouth victory in its last analysis. For when the retreat was stopped, the triumph was made possible. The artist has seized the most pregnant moment of the occasion: there was scarcely one more so in the whole war.

We are glad that we can so heartily admire this work, and we have the more pleasure in expressing our admiration, because we know how prone we sitters in Easy Chairs are to find fault, and show our smartness in following small scents. Peccavi-mus! What sitter in an Easy Chair does not plead guilty to the charge? There is a sad disproportion in our fault-finding. Why can we not maintain some kind of relation between ourselves and our judgments? To see that a thing might be different, is not necessarily to see that it might be better. And in matters where the canons are still so undetermined as those of Art, why so furious to insist upon your taste and your convictions as the final criterion? For ourselves, we are convinced that when men pass the grand climacteric, and sit down in Easy Chairs to survey life and the world, they can not find so soft a cushion as charity. It is pleasanter to love than to hate—pleasanter to praise than to condemn. And if we come to criticism, are there not enough who assert that one leg of the Apollo is longer than the other—that the children of the Laocœon are little old men—that the Venus de Medici is a plump nymph—that the Transfiguration is two pictures—that the Last Judgment is unchristian—that Domenichino is a dauber, and Claude a botcher, and Perugino wooden? Yet who shall conceive the delicate ministry to human happiness of all the lovely pictures and the noble statues? There are imperfect roses whose scent breathes all the summer back, nor would they do more were every petal fresh. He is much to be pitied whose regret at the imperfect leaf prevents his enjoyment of the perfect odor.

At last Lady Franklin's long watchings are over. The secret so long locked up in frozen seas escapes. The dream of an upper ocean, calm and open, supplied with food and flowing around the pole, dissolves. The adventurers among the icy ribs of the earth return; only a few ships remain among the icy wastes. But stranded forever and ever upon a desert more dreadful than that of the tropics, the bones of brave men bleach in the cold gloom of eternal winter.

The Northwest Passage is discovered, and Sir John Franklin is dead. We have all read those early books. We have all hung enchanted upon Captain Franklin's story and Captain Parry's. To our young imagination they were hardly less mythical than Ajax and Achilles. Who of us supposed that, after the fervor of youthful fancy had declined, he should read in the cold columns of newspapers that the heroic voyager had died at what we may well call his post?

It seems a life wasted; a bitter sacrifice to a useless curiosity. At best, what could have come of it? Now that it is known, who is the better for it? The problem is solved. Men and money, brave men, in a world where heroes are rare, have been sacrificed in the solution. But there is another view to which we have once alluded. Human heroism grappled with a problem, the solution of which increased the store of human knowledge. Is it not fine that it did not let go? Is it not noble that man could not be finally conquered by cold, nor ice, nor desolation; but wrested from the lonely pole its secret, and scorned the danger of the effort? In this moment, while none but churls can harshly speak of Franklin, we can point to this as the result of all Arctic adventure, that it is another proof of the untiring persistence of human heroism. It was not merely Quixotic. Nobody supposed we should get tea and sugar sooner. But here was something in geography that we did not know—and every thing is worth discovering. Every body is more a man for Franklin, and McClure, and Kane. For the same reason that "man's inhumanity to man makes countless thousands mourn," does each brave aim of every man teach every other man with pride and pleasure.

Arctic exploration is now, undoubtedly, forever over; but it is not enough, nor does it tell the whole story, to call it foolhardy. Respectable men, in warm coats and comfortable offices, draw their dividends, put on their India-rubbers, and go safely home to bed. They take the evening paper with their tea or their wine, and read of Franklin's fate. In eight of such men out of ten the chief feeling is a kind of contemptuous pity that any man should go on such a fool's errand. And yet—for here is the moral—the spectacle of heroism displayed in one such career as that of Franklin, is worth more to mankind at large—not to his family, who want the dividends—than the life of our friend in the warm coat multiplied by a hundred.

Our American explorer, Dr. Kane, is the only one who now remains among the primeval ice. He is followed by the hopes of two nations, and by the respect of the world. We owe to him, in his Grisel Expedition, the clearest account of the grim realities of the Pole. May he return to us successful and well. He will not, indeed, bring news of Sir John Franklin, as he hoped; but let him bring himself, fresh from his manly endeavor, and we shall all be gainers by the return we hail.

We have had our Chair wheeled up to the new Opera-House, and although all our friends who happen in of a morning have seen it, there will be many with whom we converse, who have not seen it, and who will be glad to hear of it.

It is very large, very heavy, perhaps clumsy, very brilliant, and, in general effect, despite the quarrel with details, very festive and handsome. Compared with any foreign opera-house, it is extremely gay. The sagacious complain that the heavy columns intercept too much view of the stage; and there is some truth in the complaint, for from the boxes at the back of the second tier, the eye falls down a precipice of seats, and dodging about the massive columns, catches glimpses of the singers. The shape of the house is unpardonable. Nothing can excuse an architect for building a house, designed as an auditorium for certain spectacles upon a stage, in such a manner that, from many parts of the house the stage is not visible. It is the same kind of mistake as if he were to build a dwelling-house, and have the ceilings of the rooms so low that he could not stand in them. It is mere stupidity.

The house is very high, and the steep pitch of every tier toward the front displays the audience to the most brilliant advantage. It is much superior to all foreign theatres in this respect. The boxes of the Italian opera-houses are literally boxes. They are entirely separated from the adjoining boxes, so that each is a room by itself. This is a charming social arrangement, because a party can talk and laugh without disturbing others. But it destroys the effect of what is called "the house." On the other hand, it offers a gallery of single pictures, for a beautiful woman, beautifully dressed, and sitting in the front of such a box, relieved by the dark background, tells more to the eye than a mass of fine toilets.

These things are to be considered in the case of every opera-house, for the opera is a social institution as well as a matter of art. One great defect in our new house, and it will undoubtedly prove a bar to its perfect success, is the difficulty of access to the various parts of the house. The seats are so closely packed, and the passages so few, that where you sit you must remain, or put all your neighbors to the greatest inconvenience. Originally there was no passage down the centre of the parquette. There was an unbroken line of fifty seats, and if you chanced to have taken the middle seat, you were compelled to disturb twenty-four persons before you could reach it. Such parsimonious and mean mistakes as this—this desperate American effort to blend elegance and economy, incline the spectator to a harsh judgment of the whole. In a house of the scope, and splendor, and intention which this has, there should have been the utmost facility offered for moving about, and in every way the social convenience should have been considered. We will only distantly allude to the seats that fly at a man's coat skirts like Cerberus.

With all these complaints, and with all allowance for the satire upon "gingerbread," and "papier-mâché," and "gilt," it can not be denied that the whole effect of the new house is spacious, festive, and elegant. And when, as in Semiramide, there are carefully-considered costumes, and well-painted scenery, and a stage covered with a crowd of priests, soldiers, and people, the spectacle is more superb than any thing we have ever seen in the country. We take the first night of Semiramide to have been the most brilliant opera evening in America.

For some reason the audience is not enthusiastic. Grisi is received coldly, and many of her grandest points fall unacknowledged, if not unrecognized. "I expected to find them cold," she is reported to have said, "but I find them icy." Perhaps it is the splendor of the place which restrains the applause, or is it that there is some disappointment with the singers?

It should have been remembered that we had heard the best of the time. Jenny Lind, Alboni, and Sontag, had all sung to us; and the moderate success of the latter should have taught the friends of Grisi that her triumph was not entirely secure. There are comparisons drawn doubtless between her voice and Jenny Lind's and Alboni's. It is remembered that Alboni sang quietly at the Broadway and at Niblo's, without any flourish, and with no imitation of a former excitement. It is not forgotten that we heard the delicious vocalization of Sontag at Niblo's for a long season. To surpass these, and to fill with enthusiasm an immense house at an immense price, demanded something more than Grisi, fine as she yet is, and Mario, although now in his prime. The result shows that this is so. There was a Jenny Lind party, a Sontag party, an Alboni party; but where is the Grisi party? She has created no enthusiasm, she has not crowded her houses, she has not borne us away with furor; and yet she has sung as only Grisi can now sing. She has been the Norma that only Grisi can be. She has been Semiramide, with Assyrian grandeur; and Lucrezia, with Venetian splendor. In her and Mario, and Susini, we have her an opera troupe with which no other ever among us is to be named, and there has been really less demonstration of pleasure than in the days of Benedetti and Truffi. They have sung to us in a house remarkable for its exquisite power of transmitting the airiest sound—a house which for size and effect is among the best in the world, and our hearts have pined for Astor Place and the departed delights of song.

We can not but feel that if these singers go to the South they will find their laurels blooming again, and learn that even on this side of the sea there can be the warmest appreciation of what is best in its kind. The ardor of sympathy which they sought here in vain will there enclose them like a warm atmosphere, and secure them the confidence which conquers success. Even here, as the cold winter settles gloomily around our Chair, we can hear in fancy the warm shouts and prolonged murmur with which our more susceptible and impetuous Southern neighbors express their delight. The theatre is thronged by the lovely, languid Creole beauties. A Spanish splendor lightens the boxes. There are flowers, lights, perfumes; a gay and graceful company, to whom the opera is dear, who love music as a part of life. The curtain rises, and as the house hushes and the warm scented air breathes in upon the Druidess, she moves to the front with a more majestic step; she culls the herbs with a more melancholy grace, and as she raises her voice to Casta Diva, there is a trembling tenderness in its sweetness—for in thought she is across the ocean, in thought she renews her early and unquestioned triumphs; twenty years melt from her mind, from her eye, from her voice, and, touched by the warm magic of the South, the priestess dreams she is in Paris, and forgets forever the boreal climate of Irving Place.

OUR FOREIGN GOSSIP.

WE seize our gossip as we can; sometimes sifting the journals, and coaxing from them enough of dainty paragraphs to furbish into record; and again, availing ourselves of some kindly observer, who tells us, letterwise, what has ruled the European tongue and thought. To such an observer, who has spent the season past in Continental rambles, we are indebted now; and we give up our pages to his careless but good-natured pen, which thus epitomizes the European summer and autumn:

"MY DEAR H—,

"You thought that, in these war times, I should have a dull summer in Europe; that people would wear gloomy faces and keep themselves within doors; that the hotels would be empty, and the roads untraveled. You never were more mistaken in your life. First of all, our own countrymen have been swarming, not only in the cities, but at the springs, and by Lake Geneva, and in the Pyrenees; and even in my way, by crazy diligence from Florence to Mantua, there were two lean men, in black dress-coats, from some court township of Illinois, who chewed tobacco, and wore satin waist-coats!

"I wish I had come to Europe in those old days when the voyage made a man's reputation at home, and he was looked up to always after as a kind of Nestor, who knew all about pictures and architecture, and delivered opinions, ex cathedra, which were quoted, and regarded as authority. I remember meeting with a prim single lady of this stamp when I was a lad, who was the wonder of a large neighborhood, and who at every evening party told a story of having been robbed by brigands, and of going up to the Montanvert under circumstances of danger from precipices and avalanches, which made her a heroine. How I envied that woman!

"There is no hope now of any thing of the sort; or if there were, ten chances to one your next door neighbor, who is a clergyman, and has traveled for the bronchitis, can correct your statements, and draw off half the wonder upon himself. Even the milliner women are beginning to come over to buy their ribbons, and to get a 'fall' style of hats. Paris is not so much as New York or Philadelphia used to be in the old days; and the tailors in the metropolitan city of the French will give you his prices in dollars—American currency.

"In fact the man who can not talk about Baden, and Aix-la-Chapelle, and Hombourg, nowadays, currently, can make no pretensions to mode whatever. I can remember the time (you know the years don't fail me) when a man was pointed out of by-standers, at evening gatherings and other-whereas, as one who had traveled abroad. Who thinks of such niaiserie now? Who can win reputation by a European tour—least of all, if he forgets himself so far as to plume himself upon it; or (still worse) to print the story of it?

"Mrs. Stowe's was, indeed, an exceptional matter; and people had to learn how the maker of the Uncle Tom story was fêted, and how the eyes which had seen such fearful things across the Ohio river, at Cincinnati, would look at the Duke of Sutherland's castaway tenantry.

"And this reminds me—of what you have possibly seen—that some good British democrat stoutly denies all which the authoress says of the good management of the Sutherland estates, and appeals to personal observation as proof against the good report which Mrs. Stowe received from the town-factor of the Duke.

"At all events, it would have been more satisfactory if the good woman in the 'cours' had indulged in a little inquisitive chat with the Scottish cottagers themselves, instead of receiving all her information under the rose-colored lights of the Sutherland Palace in London. There is enough of evil with us to be sure; but, God knows, it's not all the evil in the world.

"For the novelty of the thing, I have myself broken barley bread with stout Lancashire reapers, who told me a deal of hardihoods received, and labors unrequited. And as for the English miners, their woes are crying over the world.

"But I began to talk of travel, and the war. One thought that money would be sparingly spent, and that the tokens of luxury and of extravagance would grow rarer; but the signs are quite otherwise; and railway carriages and Continental inns were never so thronged as during the season whose last leaves are now whistling in the November winds. What think you of a night passed in the diligence, for want of quarters, even in so well-conducted a town as that of Geneva? Yet so it was—not a chamber was to be found far or near; and for a fee, the Swiss conductor left me snuggled in the corner of the coupé which brought me from Berne. At Vevay it was nearly as bad; and the great inn by the lake was turned almost into an American barrack. And let me tell you that the quarters one falls into thereabout have very much to do with the enjoyment of the scenery. You will scarce believe it when I tell you, that only one hotel in the whole town of Vevay has a good look upon the water and the mountains; and that, failing of lodgings here, you are condemned to some dingy quarter, whence you look on courts begrimed with mud, with only women in sabots to entertain your eye, and the chase of myriad fleas to entertain your thought.

"Such was my bitter experience on as bright a Sunday as ever broke upon the lake of Lemman—or rather would have been, if I had not resolutely shaken the dust of the town from my shoes, and coquetted with the morning in the pleasant orchards which lie between Vevay and Montreux. You have seen the spire of Montreux, in any chance view you may have had under your eye of Chillon and the upper end of the Geneva lake. It seems to sentinel the road which borders the water; but in reality it stands two hundred feet or more above it, upon a ledge of the west mountains, all fringed with green walnut trees, and here and there an aspiring poplar. From its inclosing yard you look down on sloping vineyards and gardens, edged by the white ribbon of road which skirts the lake, and winds on by Chillon, and Villeneuve, and Aix, through the sombre upper valley of the Rhine.

"There are sermons out of doors in Switzerland; as, indeed, I think there are every where else where mountains are high, and water glancing in their shadows. Mont Blanc was my preacher that morning; his pulpit was the other side of the lake; his head was white as snow, and stood out boldly against the blue of the church ceiling, which was arched over in the form of a dome, and a few clouds of incense were floating below. A company of church elders, in the shape of Savoyard mountains, very much battered with years, and with faces seamed over, and shaggy eyebrows sprinkled with white, supported the preacher, and filled up the east end of the church. There was a baptismal font between them and myself, which caught a rich blue reflection from the ceiling of the church, and mirrored the hoary head of the preacher. The people of twenty towns thereabout, lying along the sides of the hills above Vevay, attended church with me; and a few steeple bells ringing together made a solemn chorus for the service. It lasted until the incense-bearers closed the doors on the Savoyard elders, and on the stately preacher. But a bright gleam of sunshine in the west announced that the service would be repeated the next day. Indeed, a worshipful man may find perpetual service among those valleys which divide the Alps. That very night which curtailed the Sabbath ceremony I just now told you of, gave me the hearing of a great psalm-gust, the like of which belongs to no cathedral choir, and no organ loft but Nature's.

"I was upon the heights of the Dent de Jaman, which, like a jagged tooth, is rooted in the mountains that hang over the northwest skirt of Lemman. It is not so high but that the turf grows green to within a hundred feet of its summit; then a bold cliff rises, with ledges for trailing wild flowers, that fling out odors only to the birds who live in the tops of the fir-trees.

"I had gone up the path which winds thither late in the day; and the villagers who have their hamlets nearest told me it was too late to cross the mountain, and that darkness would overtake me in the wild pasturage slopes. So I found a home for the night in a little chalet, which was one of perhaps half a score that stood perched on a plateau of green upon a shoulder of the mountain, two thousand feet above the lake, in whose edge the great chateau of Chillon hung floating like a painted toy.

"The good woman of the chalet stewed me a alce from the haunch of smoked mutton that hung to the rafters of her house, while I sat under the walnut trees, listening to the tinkle of the bells upon the necks of browsing goats, and looking across upon the gaunt Savoyard mountains, half hidden by cloud patches, and blotched here and there with reflections of the red sunset.

"They told me as evening darkened, and I had finished my supper of mutton, that a storm was coming, though from what quarter I could not tell. Those mountain people see signs in straws; and they promised me a wet foot-way on the morrow, though it seemed to me that the clouds grouped lazily over the heights as if no frolic was in them.

"A burst of thunder woke me at ten; but I dropped asleep again, and may have remained in my doze for two hours, when there was a rattling of my chamber-door, and my hostess came, in a loose undress, and screaming to me to get up at once, as the chalet was in terrible danger, rushed out of the room as hastily as she had entered.

"There was no light for me but the fearful gleam of the lightning, which lit up the narrow slopes of the hills, and shone by streams on the distant snow-mountains of Savoy. Blaze and thunder came together in dazzling crashes; and the clouds seemed breaking on the very tree-tops.

"I hurried on my clothes, and went out upon a little balcony of the chalet, which was partially protected by the broad-eaved roof. Below, and not ten yards from the house, was a fierce torrent raging every moment nearer and nearer, and bringing down rocks, and broken trees, and débris of harvests from the highlands above. The evening before there had been not even a brook where a river was now foaming over the bed of the mountain pathway. As the blazes of lightning flamed in the sky, I could see the wretched villagers grouped upon the knolls, on either side of the fierce torrent, watching its progress, or making such feeble barricades as they could to divert it from their homes.

"Upon the nearer side there were only my hostess and two brown-faced herdsmen. The poor woman stood wringing her hands, and crying out to the neighbors to save her home. But the bravest of those who were looking on would not have dared to cross the torrent; or could they have come over, little could have been done for the protection of the chalet. A green knoll, which was fast washing away by the force of the water, still diverted the current from the foundation walls of the chalet. The barrier might hold out an hour longer; if it went wholly, there was no hope for the chalet in which I had taken up my night quarters.

"To add to the poor woman's distress, her husband was with his flock upon a higher slope of the mountains, where the storm seemed even fiercer. The neighbors had seen the bodies of sheep and goats go floating down in the wreck of the torrent. The poor herdsman himself might be in danger. From time to time, moreover, there was heard the crash of trees and of timbers from below, telling dreadful stories of wrecked chalets further down.

"I shall never forget the grouping of the peasants, men, women, and children, upon the other side of this storm-torrent, shouting and running here and there, as the gleams of lightning played over the frightened crowd. Beyond, too, and beyond the trees which glittered in the blaze and the wet, I could see the heights of the snow-mountains upon the other side of the Lake of Geneva, shining for a moment, as they shine by day, and then buried in the rain and the night. The lake itself, too, caught pale gleams of lightning, and showed a surface foaming with the storm.

"With my Mackintosh thrown over my shoulders, and my felt hat dripping streams, I passed an hour looking on anxiously as the rest. After this the storm happily abated its force. The torrent grew less angry in its flow; the chalet of my hostess was out of danger. I left the mountain people grappling with the timbers which still came down with the current; and, to the lullaby of thunder echoing still among the mountains, and dying away in hoarse murmurs on the lake below, I fell asleep once more.

"And this was the mountain-psalm I told you of.

"When morning came, the sun was as soft as a valley summer; but the wreck of the fields and the crops was terrific. Whole acres of what was smiling greensward the night before, were now swept away. Uprooted trees lay across the paths; and often the paths themselves were gone; and I was compelled to grope my way through the muddled bottom of a ravine, which the storm of a single night had furrowed in the hills.

"It was what they call a cloud-break in the mountains; and as offering something different from the everyday journalings of a foot-traveler in Switzerland, I have thought it worth my while to jot it down for you.

"After this, shall I say any thing of the peals from the great organ of Friburg, which I listened to, two days after, and which are reckoned the loudest that come from any church instrument of Central Europe? The storm (as the organist played it) would have been grand, had it not come so near the greater one of my night in the chalet. I fear I hardly did justice to the organist of Friburg; I know I paid him his fee as if he had not earned his money.

"The diligence which goes from Vevay to Berne, stops a half hour at Friburg, and the passengers dine there. Like all stage-coach meals, this is a very hurried one; and had I not 'booked' myself in advance, and dined at my leisure, I am sure I should have added to my dyspepsia by the diligence dinner at Friburg. As it was, I amused myself with the hurry of the coach people, when the conductor gave the word to set off, leaving a fat French lady and a cool couple of English travelers in the heat of dessert. As you go out of Friburg, on the way to Berne, there is a swinging bridge of iron cables to be passed over, which hangs some two hundred feet above a ravine, and shakes with the weight of a diligence in a way to scare nervous people exceedingly.

"Now we had but half got over this tremulous roadway, when the cool English couple came shouting after, followed by the fat French lady, who had seized upon a half-emptied bottle of wine, gesticulating and puffing in a way that put all the diligence company in a roar.

"The coachman cracked his whip; the Englishman and wife screamed in terrible French phrase; the fat lady brandished her bottle threateningly; the bridge undulated more and more under the quickened step of the horses; nor did the comedy end until the conductor ordered the coachman to draw up upon the other side of the ravine.

"And here again there was an unexpected trouble; the English woman was 'booked' for a place beside her husband in the banquette upon the top of the diligence; there was no ladder by which she could mount; she tried the wheel and a 'boost' of the conductor; but it was in vain. The husband mounted before her and tried the effect of a lift; but she was too heavy.

"'But, my dear, you must get up,' said the husband.

"'But, my dear, I can't,' said the woman in despair.

"'But, my dear, make an effort.'

"'But, my dear, I have' (crescendo).

"In short, the matter could only be arranged by an amicable compromise with some of the parties inside, by which the unfortunate English lady was separated from her husband until the next stage.

"By virtue of the change, I found myself brought into near neighborhood of the fat lady, who had made good her short dinner by bearing off the bottle of wine. She was eloquent in her denunciations of the thieving propensities of hotel-keepers; it was all an arrangement, she was satisfied, with the conductor, by which people, after paying, should be despoiled of their dinner. For her own part, she was not to be abused in that way; she always made amends for a hurried dinner (as one might have judged from her rotund figure). If she preferred chicken, she took chicken; if wine, she took wine: and here drawing gracefully a little patent-leather cup from her reticule, she poured out a glass, and drank it off as composedly as she could have done at the table of our host.

"I like these little diligence meetings of travel; they open a world of character to the eye; they put an edge on one's habit of observation; they make droll memories for after-dinner laughs at a home table. But it is all passing away, you know. Even in Switzerland they have a project of 'tapping the Alps' with a railway tunnel. The engineers are out. Their crimson bunting is flying on the heights. The subscription-books are open at Basle.

"They talk of a ten-mile tunnel not far away from the Pass of St. Bernard; and the road is to wind along the Upper Rhone, between the sombre, death-like cliffs, and among the wretched cretins and goitres of Sion, and afterward to burrow under the hospice, and to bring its convoy to day again in sight of Aosta and the beautiful and decrepit Italy.

"But, thank Heaven, years must slip before this work is done; and you will have time to beat your mule by moonlight, on the zigzag path that conducts to the hospitable door of the monks, before the monks and the dogs are driven away from their mountain employ.

"Among the on dits of the Swiss summer, is the rumor of the imprisonment of an American traveler, who was arrested and confined on suspicion of being no less a personage than the ubiquitous Mazzini. It would appear that the subject of the mistake was not so far flattered by the error as to rest contented with the dungeon durance; and in addition to our other diplomatic negotiations, we have now afoot the claims for false imprisonment upon the Helvetic Republic. It would be odd indeed if, some fine day, the Cyane, or some such vessel, should be dispatched up the Rhine, for the blockade of Basle and the Alps!

"When I was at Chamouni, people were talking of the new ascent of Mont Blanc by an English lady, the third who ever accomplished this task; and who did it (the guides said) without flurry or fatigue. Albert Smith has, I see, alluded to the matter in a complimentary way, in his closing lecture-room 'ascent' for the season, and interested his auditors by announcing the fact that the intrepid woman had honored him that evening with her presence. Of course all eyes were turned to the box of honor (formed by a Swiss window in the chalet that fronts the scene), when the blushing lady received the applause of the evening.

"The romantic danger that of old belonged to the ascent seems now wholly to have gone by; people speak of it only (at Chamouni) as an expensive and doubtful gratification: expensive, because a dozen guides must be well tempted with fees; and doubtful, because a clear evening in these high neighborhoods may be followed by mist and darkness.

"The lady in question reported a charming view; and so did a young English traveler who repeated the journey a fortnight after. And if one may judge from what meets the eye in looking from the lesser height of the Breven, the view must be grand indeed. I suspect that, by dint of cordage and ladders deposited here and there in safe nooks of the rocks, they will arrive in time at an easy way of carrying people of tender nerves to the top of the monarch; and when that day comes, and supplies of the white Neuchâtel or of Moët are frequent, I may be myself tempted to hazard the visit.

"There are springs, you know, in Switzerland; and they have had, the summer past, their usual flow—salts and of people. But they are generally of the cast of St. Ronan's Well—gone-by places, whose lamentable history is writ, not by Scott, but by stories of gray moss and lichen, on crumbling roofs. Yet they are curious enough places to visit, to see what kind of invalid race still clings to the traditional virtue of the mountain waters. First of all there is St. Gervais, which you reach by going to the right a little way off from the traveled track which leads people from Geneva to Chamouni. It is a wild cleft in the mountains, with a long-sided house dismally shaded by the reeking cliffs, and faint, pale garden grounds lingering around it, under the short play of a mid-day sun. Decrepit old men and women go there to drink in health and strength; gay young Swiss bourgeois people too, in the mirth of new matrimony, wander to St. Gervais for honeymoon quietude, and for undisturbed strolls in the mountain paths which lead high up on the hills that shadow the springs.

"Riotous young fellows with knapsacks, singing German songs over their after-breakfast Altenheimer, clink their glasses at the table of mine host of the St. Gervais, and plot hair-brained scrambles to the glaciers that gleam, cold and grim, atop the St. Gervais mountains.

"It is a place withal, to visit once, but not to linger at, unless you would replace dyspepsia with rheumatic twinges and the blue devils.

"On the Simplon road again (or a little way off from it to the left), is the queer 'spring' place of Leuk. Every body has heard of it, and a great many have passed through the town, on their way across the wild pass of the Gemmi, which rises straight up the rocks within a league of the water-courses which give renown to Leuk. The noticeable thing (medicinally) about the springs is their warmth; and they gush as warm from the earth as an egg-boiling pot, and go steaming and vaporizing through the little village on either side the road, in a way quite curious to behold.

"When I first saw the phenomenon, I thought all the town world had just emptied their kettles; but presently I saw a group of stout-armed women at a village trough—all steaming—washing their foul linen in the kettle-water of nature's furnishing. One would think washing might be cheap; but my bill of the Leuk-Baden says—no.

"The bath-houses are matters worth seeing: people go to them, not to bathe, but to soak. The physicians prescribe variously, as ages or constitutions vary, three and four, and even five hours. And people make a frolic of the healing, and wear coquettish water-gowns, and have floating tables round them, and sit in conclave, buried to their chins, and chatting, and doing needle-work, and reading newspapers, and drinking cherry-ram punches.

"A queer place, very, is Leuk.

"Then there is a Swiss Baden not far away from Zurich, a very pretty place indeed, with a sweet valley and fresh streams of water in it, and high green hills towering about it, from whence, looking off in fine weather, you can see that glorious array of white mountain heights which are before your eyes at Zurich. It is a charming place to linger at, with unobtrusive people in the great spring house, who allow you to 'gang your own gate,' and meet you in the hill paths with a kindly look of recognition. By a charming bit of railway—the only bit Switzerland yet boasts of—you can go from this village to the laughing shores of Zurich, and eat such a dinner at the Hotel Baur as would delight a hungry man in the best city in the world.

"If you come, be sure and take lodgings in the house that sits in a garden on the very edge of the lake. Such a place for saunter as it is—that garden—with the mountains all stretching in crystal chain before you, and the flowers flaming and scattering perfume at your elbow, is not found otherwheres in Europe!

"One more 'spring' place of Switzerland I must not forget. You go there by the way of Constance, and the memory of the Constance martyrs. It lies near to Ragatz, in a German-talking country, far up a brook course, which they call the Tamina, and the baths are the 'Baths of Pfaffen.' You seem going out of the world when you go there, and wholly out when you arrive there. A little, narrow char-à-banc road leads along the banks of the stream, through a dim ravine, all shaded by fir and dank foliage. Nor is there lack of danger to 'sublimo' this one-horse drive, for your wheel frets here and there the edge of a precipice, beneath which, a hundred feet, the Tamina goes raging unceasingly among the fallen rocks; and the hill-side, too, threatens every moment to dislodge black fragments of trap to crush you, or hurry you into the bottom of the defile. Jets of waterfalls race down in clefts, and spatter you with spray, and dive under deep culverts, and fall with a crash into the basin below.

"With such accompaniments, making very dreary music, you reach at last a moss-covered old building, seated under the very shoulder of the rocks, and at the extreme end of the defile. The sun only reaches it two hours of the longest days of summer, and it is damp winter there even in later August.

"A few hopeful and hobbling invalids move about the sunken floors of the hobgoblin house, like relics. They bathe thrice a day in wooden tubs, and the walls all reek with the drip of the cliffs and the year long shadiness.

"If you would see the springs, you must take a lantern and a Mackintosh, and follow a wheezing guide into the heart of the mountain. A wild cleft makes the portal by which you enter. A crazy wooden staging makes your uncertain pathway. The Tamina, raging and foaming, you see forty feet below you; and only a glimpse of sky through the cleft, a thousand feet above you. The sides are bare wall of dripping rock, and the path you walk on is only hung against the side by oaken brackets that quiver with your weight. As you go on, lantern in hand, the cleft narrows, so as scarce to leave room for the crazy bridge. Still the Tamina is roaring forty feet below you; and the skylight is utterly shut off by the foliage on the top of the mountain.

"On you go, feeling your way on the slippery and shaking planks; the air full of the noise of rushing waters, and the darkness growing deeper and deeper. Presently you feel a puff of hot steam on your face that half blinds you. The guide takes your hand, steadies your footing, tells you to be bold, and fumbling at a padlock, unlocks a wooden door in the side of the cleft, and shows you the boiling source which supplies the bath tubs of the Pfeffers Hotel.

"He screams in your ear to tell you of its warmth; the steam blinds you; the bats flap around the lanterns; the Tamina roars fearfully, as you grope back to a sight of sky again, with a hearty feeling of gratitude.

"I took a bath at Pfeffers and a lunch; then I climbed the side of the gorge by a rude foot-path; and by the hour of sunset, was where I could see a mountain horizon thirty miles away. I would not advise hypochondriacs to go to the baths of Pfeffers.

"What a gay, lightsome change from all this, to the charming walks of Baden-Baden! And what a contrast with the hobgoblin people of Pfeffers, did the ladies make who sat at the table d'hôte of the pleasant Hotel de Russie!

"Of all the mid-Europe places to loiter in, through a season of sunny idleness, give me Baden-Baden. People imagined (as I said) that the summer's war would take off the edge of its merri-ment, and the fullness from the houses; but the place was never merrier, and never fuller than through the season which closes with the great victory of Alma, and the fall of the Russian power in the Black Sea.

"There have been concerts (Alboni lending her great voice), and torchlight processions through the woods that clothe the hills, in honor of some princely fête; and there have been brilliant crowds at the tables of roulette and of trente et un (among them figuring the pale head and fine features of the unworthy son of the greatest Englishman of his time); beside all, there has been the usual quantum of piquant gossip. Among the rest, they tell us of a chance marriage, which closed the season in true romantic fashion. The bride a widow; the groom a prince and millionaire (for a German). The last owned a pretty villa outside the town; a few miles of country road, often driven over, led to it. The widow, in company with cousins and other kin, chanced to pass it one day, early after her arrival.

"She did not know its occupant, nor did she know the envious stories of the prince's selfishness and of his misanthropy. Her companions were as ignorant as she. They chatted, as they passed under the shadow of a pretty pavilion which crowned the garden gateway, of the taste which ruled the place, and of the enviable lot of whosoever might possess it.

"The widow (who was pretty) was loudest in her praises, and grew warm in her jealous zeal to know who might be the happy owner of such a suburban paradise. She ventured the suggestion that all of its parterres were wasted upon some lonely-living bachelor, who had no right thus to cut off the fairest part of humanity from a share in the beauties his wealth and taste had created.

"The friends rallied her—the proprietor, concealed behind the curtain of his pavilion, overheard her. He watched her fine figure as the group moved on. He grew curious in his turn. The voice was a charming voice; the motion was graceful; the dress was tasteful; he followed and traced the party unperceived to their lodgings.

"Through the ready valets de place he pressed his inquiries; he sought acquaintance; he showed the pretty widow the interior as well as exterior of his charming lodge without the town; and in a month, the quidnunc world of Baden was startled by the announcement that the Prince — was presently to marry the blooming Madame —, and the bachelor establishment without the town to receive a mistress.

"I give you the matter as it was told to me. I know only that the villa — is a pretty one; and that blooming widows at the tables of Baden are neither rare nor coy.

"You know, perhaps, that our matter of 'excursion trains' has found its way into European habit; and there are companies in Paris which advertise (or did the summer past) to carry travelers to the Rhine, to allow them a week of driving about, upon certain given routes, and then to take them safely back to Paris, either by Brussels or Strasbourg, for a very moderate sum. Thousands have availed themselves of this the season past, and half the French travelers you met with in the railway carriages were under the charge of this guardian company. If the party was crushed, of course nothing was to pay.

"A still wider excursion was projected, and, I believe, carried out, in virtue of which parties to the traveling compact were conducted, under the advices of an accomplished courier, to the Great Exhibition of Munich, were furnished with seats at the Opera two nights in the week, were carried over the Tyrol to Prague—given a sight of Dresden and the Elbe—furnished with meals and lodgings at the best hotels—offered free use of the baths at Hombourg and Wiesbaden, and landed again at their doors in Paris for a certain fixed sum, surprisingly small.

"Will not some enterprising firm in your city take the matter up, and organize, next year, a European excursion, to take nervous people throughout England and France—clear their luggage—pay their bills—talk their French—provide their guides—see to their passports and purchases—for a sum known and measurable at the outset? Could not bachelors be put down, for the belle season, at a thousand dollars apiece, exclusive of wines? And ladies at two thousand, who were limited to five trunks and four bandboxes?

"You know before this, of course, that Rachel, the great tragedienne, is certainly going to America; and what, pray, do you think of her probable success? Will people make her the fashion? If not, I fear there is little hope for her.

"She is great to be sure, and always will be, while her vigor lasts; but it seems essential that auditors should have some reasonable knowledge of what a tragedian is saying. Will those whose ears are apt to catch French be enough to supply her with houses? or will the furor be so great as to draw in those who know nothing of it?

"I saw, the other evening, a stout, sensible man (American), with a stout and (I dare say) sensible wife, leave their seats at the Theâtre Français, in the middle of one of her choicest performances, with a vacant air on their faces—as if their twenty francs had much better have gone for one of Lucy Hocquet's hats. I fear there will be a good many jobbers at New York who will stare vacantly on the plays their daughters may decoy them to.

"It is the fashion here, specially among the English, to decry Rachel's performance of modern tragedy—as if the cold classicism of Racine's rhyme were all she should ever utter. I hope this sort of affectation will not belong to the newspaper writers with you; and that she will be appreciated most warmly where appreciation is most natural—in those plays which express passion in honest prose, and in the hearty language which French people use to-day.

"A spicy writer of the Paris feuilletons deplores and condemns the action of Rachel, in going, for ever so short a time, among that 'dollar-people, who made fools of themselves over Elsaler and Jenny Lind, and who do not speak French.'

"Can the paragraphist be aiming a blow at our diplomatic brotherhood?

"Another matter of mention you may have remarked in the journals; it is the publication, day by day, of the life of 'George Sand,' written by herself. The world was expecting in it a deal of scandal, and has been sharply on the look out for months past; but thus far she does not promise to gratify them. She writes, like all French people, in evident good humor with herself, and applies her subtle analytic power to the fathoming of her own passions and actions. Aside from this, and Lamartine's new History of Turkey, there is nothing to put an ink-line about, in the whole range of Paris letters.

"The returning world (from the summer resorts) is now fairly back in its old place. Here and there signs of mourning for the dead in the Crimea are visible; but oftentimes these signs are confined to humble life and far-away homes in the provinces.

"The beau-monde of Paris does not furnish battle-heroes; and the only army-man of that class who is talked of now, is a young lieutenant, who has just startled all staid mammas by marrying a pretty actress of the Paradis.

"The theatres, all of them, are full in these coming wet nights of later autumn. Even the talk of Chantilly, where the English horses were worsted, is dying away in the mention of balls and of intrigues. Flaming equipages have multiplied, and jockeys in blue and silver delight the maids and their masters.

"Country houses of England are full of gay company, riotous with pheasant shooting and dinners that last till midnight. London is deserted, save of strangers; and there is little promise of returning gayety for a year to come—so heavily hangs the war-list of slain and wounded upon the hearts and the homes of thousands.

"But you, across the water, with your fevers, and cholera, and shipwrecks, and storms, and money crashes, have had your sorrows too; and the European summer, take it all in all, has worn more constant gayety than the home one which has broken on me in letters.—Adieu."

Editor's Drawer.

DECEMBER—ay, ay: WINTER is upon us. Let not "the milk of human kindness" be frozen in our bosoms in this inclement season. As we sit by our cheerful fires, surrounded by all the comforts, if not the luxuries, of a great and rich city, let us not forget those who are suffering for the bare necessities of life. Let us "give of our abundance" to the poor and needy, when even the Elements have made a league with Sickness and Poverty, to try them still further in the furnace of affliction!

But, in the mean time, let us not forget also the blessings, the delights of Winter; for we would not be gloomy, with the holidays so near at hand, and so many happy hearts awaiting them. Then there is sliding down hill, and sleigh-rides in the open country, with "laughing girls and joyous boys" keeping time to the "sweet jargonings" of the prancing, foaming steeds:

"Hark the 'cutters' with their bells:

Silver bells! chiming bells!

What a tale of merriment

Their melody foretells,

As they tinkle, tinkle, tinkle,

In the frosty air of night,

Till the stars, that oversprinkle

All the heavens, seem to twinkle

With a nebulous delight.

Keeping time—time—time,

In a kind of runic rhyme,

To the tintinnabulation

That so musically swells

From the rhyming and the chiming of the bells."

Yet, when the dim-blue hills rise afar in the cold, clear winter air; when He who "sendeth snow like wool, and scattereth the hoar-frost like ashes," reminds us how Life has faded into Death, and we see Nature herself in her winding-sheet; in all our thoughts, let us "REMEMBER THE POOR!"

HERE is a "bit of advice" to young ladies, setting forth how they may know whether a young gallant is really "courting" them, or only paying them "polite attentions." The confounding the one with the other has been the source of much trouble, both before and since the era of Pickwick and Mrs. Bardell:

"A young man admires a pretty girl, and must manifest it. He can't help doing so, for the life of him. The young lady has a tender heart, reaching out like vine-tendrils for something to cling to. She sees the admiration; is flattered; begins soon to love; expects some tender avowal; and perhaps gets so far as to decide that she will choose 'a white satin under thin gauze,' etc., at the very moment the gallant that she half loves is popping the question to another damsel ten miles off!

"Now the difficulty lies in not precisely understanding the difference between 'polite attentions' and the tender manifestations of love. Admiring a beautiful girl, and wishing to make a wife of her, are not always the same thing; and therefore it is necessary that the damsel should be upon the alert to discover to which class the attentions paid her by handsome and fashionable young gentlemen belong.

"First, then, if a young man greets you in a loud, free, and hearty tone; if he knows precisely where to put his hat or his hands; if he stares you straight in the eye, with his own wide open; if he turns his back to you to speak to another; if he tells you who made his coat; if he squeezes your hand; if he eats heartily in your presence; if he fails to talk very kindly to your mother; if, in short, he squeezes when you are singing, criticises your curls, or fails to be foolish in fifty ways every hour, then don't fall in love with him for the world! He only admires you, let him do or say what he will.

"On the other hand, if he be merry with every body else, but quiet with you; if he be anxious to see that your tea is sufficiently sweetened, and your dear person well wrapped up when you go out into the cold; if he talks very low, and never looks you steadily in the eye; if his cheeks are red, and his nose only blushes, it is enough. If he romps with your sister, sighs like a pair of old bellows, looks solemn when you are addressed by another gentleman, and in fact is the most still, awkward, stupid, yet anxious of all your male friends, you may 'go ahead,' and make the poor fellow too happy for his skin to hold him!

"Young ladies! keep your hearts in a case of good leather, or some other tough substance, until the 'right one' is found, beyond doubt; after which you can go on, and love, and 'court,' and be married, and happy, without the least bit of trouble."

We consider this advice so sensible, that although it is somewhat open to the charge of bluntness, we have no hesitation in pressing it upon the attention of our lady-readers.

THERE will be few readers of "The Drawer" but will go back in memory, as they peruse the beautiful lines which ensue, to the "old clock that ticked against the wall" in the home of their boyhood. There are grace, simplicity, and pathos in the poetry. We know not the author:

"Oh! the old, old clock, of the household stock,

Was the brightest thing, and neatest;

Its hands, though old, had a touch of gold,

And its chime rang still the sweetest;

'Twas a monitor too, though its words were few,

Yet they lived, though nations altered;

And its voice, still strong, warned old and young,

When the voice of friendship faltered:

'Tick! tick!' it said—'quick, quick to bed,

For ten I've given warning;

Up! up! and go, or else you know,

You'll never rise soon in the morning!"

"A friendly voice was that old, old clock,

As it stood in the corner smiling,

And blessed the time with a merry chime,

The wintry hours beguiling;

But a cross old voice was that firesome clock,

As it called at day-break boldly;

When the dawn looked gray o'er the misty way,

And the early air blew coldly:

'Tick! tick!' it said—'quick out of bed,

For five I've given warning;

You'll never have health, you'll never have wealth,

Unless you're up soon in the morning!"

"Still hourly the sound goes round and round,

With a tone that ceases never;

While tears are shed for bright days fled,

And the old friends lost forever!

Its heart beats on—though hearts are gone,

Its hands still move—though hands we love

Are clasped on earth no longer!

'Tick! tick!' it said—to the church-yard bed,

The Grave hath given warning:

Up! up! and rise, and look at the skies,

And prepare for a heavenly morning!"

THE following singular circumstance happened twelve years ago at the Astor House, in this city. It transpired at the time, and was published; but it seems to us well worthy of preservation among the annals of adroit crime:

A gentleman suddenly missed his gold watch, which was worth to him more than it could be to any body else, from association, it having been a family relic. He marveled much at its absence, for he knew he had only been in and out of the office and reading-room of the hotel since he noted the hour by it.

In the hope of recovering it, he offered a reward of fifty dollars for it in the daily newspapers of the city. The same day he received a note, saying that he could have his watch by calling at a certain obscure house in the city. After some little hesitation, he resolved to go. The watch was too valuable to him to be given up without at least this attempt to recover it. So he went.

His call at the door was promptly answered by a gentlemanly-looking person, who, in reply to his inquiries, said that he had in his possession the advertised watch, and that on payment of the offered reward he would deliver it up. The loser promised to pay the fifty dollars provided he was convinced the watch was his. It was exhibited, and the gentleman recognized it at once, paid the reward, and gladly placed the recovered treasure in its place in his vest pocket. As he was turning to go away, he remarked,

"I am glad, as you may suppose, to get my watch back again, but I should really be pleased to know how you took it from me."

"That I will inform you," readily replied the pick-pocket. "Do you remember holding an animated conversation with two other gentlemen in the reading-room of the Astor House on the morning you lost your watch?"

"I do," replied the loser.

"Well, do you also remember that a gentleman who stood close by, left his newspaper, drew near, and finally engaged in the discussion?"

"Very distinctly," replied the other; "and also that he engaged in it with much warmth."

"Precisely," continued the narrator; "and do you not remember that he at one time, in his earnestness, tapped you two or three times on the left breast, thus?" (suiting the action to the word.)

"Yes," replied the gentleman.

"Then I took your watch," said the other; and turning, shut the door and disappeared.

The gentleman returned to the Astor, musing on this strange occurrence; and while relating it to some of his wondering friends, was astonished to find that his watch was again missing!

When the adroit knight of the nimble fingers described how he had once filched from him his watch, he took it again! So the gentleman finally lost his watch, after having paid the thief the reward for its recovery.

HERE follows a retort, although it can hardly be called a "retort courteous:"

A mathematician being asked by a stout fellow.

"If two pigs weigh twenty pounds, how much will a large hog weigh?"

"Jump into the scales," was the reply, "and I'll tell you in a minute!"

The mathematician "had him there!"

"I'll lay you a small wager," said one American gentleman to another, as they were about entering a London eating-house together, "that whatever we may ask for, no matter what it may be, the waiter will say that he has got it!"

So they entered; and taking a box in one corner, one of the Americans called out:

"Waiter!"

And the waiter came.

"Waiter, have you any Meet-me-in-the-Willow-Glen?"

"'Willow-Glen?'—yes, Sir," and off he goes. Presently he returns with:

"That dish is haut, Sir, at present: many think else you'll 'ave, Sir?"

We mention this to show, that when the English satirize the Irish "as below," it would not be amiss for them to "look at 'ome."

Nothing goes so much against the grain of an Irish waiter, as to confess ignorance upon any point under the sun. "I don't know," is a phrase he can by no means digest.

"You have a table-d'hôte in this hotel, have you not?" said a gentleman at an Irish hotel to a waiter, who presented himself bowing, napkin in hand, in answer to the summoning bell.

"Why, y-e-s, Sir—that is—yes, we have, Sir," added the man boldly, determined to put a good face on the matter, but evidently making a desperate plunge in the dark.

"Is there one now?"

"Oh, I dare say, Sir—I'll inquire. I'm sure an-my thing you want you can have, Sir—always well supplied here, Sir."

"But the table-d'hôte, I suppose, is only in the summer?"

"Can't exactly say what's the season—but we often have it—very often, Sir. I'll speak to the landlord, or to the cook: perhaps it's to-day you wish—"

The guest started a little at the idea of the power attributed to him of forming a table-d'hôte by his sole will and pleasure.

"What I wish to know," he said, "is whether there is one now in the hotel, and at what hour, in case any of our party should like to join it."

This was too much for the poor waiter. He shuffled and evaded, but in vain. There seemed nothing for him to do but to admit the humiliating fact, that the word table-d'hôte was Greek to him. After very many hard twistings of the napkin in his hand, and sundry hemmings and coughings, he said, with much reluctance:

"Why, Sir, I really beg pardon. I—I—I of course know what you mean; but I don't exactly" (with an extraordinary emphasis on the "exactly"), "I don't quite exactly—that is to say—understand. I—"

The gentleman extricated the poor waiter from embarrassment in a moment by explaining; but he couldn't get over his mortification at having been forced to confess his ignorance of any thing; and departed from the room with considerable less importance than that with which he had flourished into it a few minutes before.

If any one doubts that this is an entirely authentic anecdote, let him ask the next Irish servant who is in a position to feel his importance as connected with a restaurant or hotel, the reputation of which he supposes to rest upon his shoulders, and test its credibility.

BETTING, it has always seemed to us, is but a poor business at the best, if it is not somewhat too closely allied to gambling to be altogether a moral or defensible transaction. So that when we find a "biter bitten" at this sort of game, we confess that we look upon the victim as not a subject for much commiseration. Here is a very laughable case in point; called, if you please, "Charley Macauley's Bet." It is an East India story, and old enough to be new to ninety-nine out of every hundred of our readers:

"At seven o'clock the dinner was served up, and a better one was never given in Calcutta; but as every pleasure must come to an end, so this excellent dinner was at last finished. The dessert was served up, and the hookahs began to emit their guttural notes. Many were the subjects broached and got rid of; many the toasts which enlivened the fashionable feast.

"At length, by the most skillful manoeuvring, and with infinite tact, Macauley brought the beauty of the new tables on the tapis. Every one admired them, and felt grateful to them for having so lately supported the rich dinner of their host.

"They are of the finest mahogany I ever saw," said Major Briscoe.

"They are perfect," said another. "I never saw any so well proportioned in my life. I must have some made like them."

"They are too high," chimed in Charley Macauley, with affected indifference—"just a little too high. Don't you think so, Gordon?"

"On the contrary," replied the host, "if any thing, I consider them a shade too low."

"You are mistaken, my dear fellow; I have an excellent eye, and I am sure I am right. No table should exceed two-feet-six, and these are at least one inch higher."

"You are in error; they are not more than two feet and a half."

"Don't bet, James, don't bet; for I am sure of the fact. I tell you I can not be deceived; my eye is always correct."

"Not bet! If the tables were not my own, and consequently I should bet on a certainty, I'd lay you a lac of rupees that they are not more than thirty inches in height."

"Oh, if you are willing, I will make the bet; but remember, gentlemen, I tell you beforehand that I am certain of the fact. I say these tables are at least thirty-one inches from the ground."

"Done! for a lac of rupees!" cried Gordon.

"Done!" re-echoed Charley.

"The wager was duly registered. A servant was ordered to bring in a yard-measure, when Macauley turned round with an air of triumph, and said:

"You may save yourselves the trouble of measuring!—ha! ha!" and he chuckled with delight. "I warned you fairly that I bet on a certainty, so the bet must be binding, James."

"I stand to my bet," said Gordon.

"Well, then pay me the money! I measured the tables this very morning while you were shaving, and here is their memorandum of height—thirty-one inches exactly!"

"And the Colonel burst into a roar of laughter, as he produced his pocket-book with the memorandum in it.

"I know you did," said James; "I saw you do so, in my looking-glass."

"The Colonel started.

"Yes, I saw you do it; and as soon as you had gone away, knowing well your object, I had an inch saved off every leg; so, for once, my very knowing friend, the tables are turned!"

"The roar that shook the table would have drowned Niagara. Charley Macauley left Calcutta the next day ten thousand pounds sterling poorer than he was the day he arrived; and, what was still worse, the very youngest ensigns in the army quizzed him about it forever afterward. Perhaps he was richer in the end, however, for it was his last bet.

THE sketch of stealing peaches, in a late "Drawer," has induced a correspondent to send us for preservation in the same "capacious receptacle," a somewhat kindred story of "Stealing Water-melons," which he cut from a newspaper many years ago. It was of a man who took great pleasure in having a neat garden. He had all kinds of vegetables and fruits earlier than his neighbors. But thieving boys in the neighborhood annoyed him; damaged his trees, trampled down his flowers, and "hooked" his choicest fruit. He tried various ways to protect his grounds; but his watch-dogs were poisoned, and his set-traps caught nothing but his fattest fowls or his most favorite cat.

One afternoon, however, just at nightfall, he overhears a couple of mischievous boys talking together, when one of them says:

"What do you say, Joe?—shall we come the grab over them melons to-night? Old Swipes will be snoring like ten men before twelve o'clock."

The other objected, as there was a high wall to get over.

"Oh, pahaw!" was the reply; "I know a place where you can get over just as easy—know it like a book. Come, Joe, let's go it!"

The owner of the melon-patch didn't like the idea of being an eaves-dropper; but the conversation so intimately concerned his melons, which he had taken so much pains to raise, that he kept quiet, and listened to the whole plan of the young scapegraces, so that he might make it somewhat bothersome for them.

Ned proposed to get over the wall on the south side, by the great pear-tree, and cut directly across to the summer-house, just north of which were the melons.

Joe was a clever fellow, who loved good fruit exceedingly, and was as obstinate as an ass. Get him once started to do a thing, and he would stick to it, like a mud-turtle to a negro's toe. The other didn't care so much for the melons as for the fun of getting them.

Now hear the owner's story:

"I made all needful preparations for the visit: put in brads pretty thick in the scantling along the wall where they intended to get over; uncovered a large water-vat that had been filled for some time, from which, in dry weather, I was accustomed to water my garden; dug a trench a foot deep or so, and placed slender boards over it, which were slightly covered with dirt, and just beyond them some little cords, fastened tightly, some eight inches from the ground. I picked all the melons I cared to preserve, leaving pumpkins and squashes, about the size and shape of melons, in their places."

The boys were quite right in supposing it would be dark, but they missed it a little in inferring that "old Swipes," as they called him, would be in bed. The old man liked a little fun as well as they; and when the time came, from his hiding-place he listened:

"Whist, Joe! don't you hear something?"

"I think that, very probably, they did; for hardly were the words uttered than there came a sound as of forcibly-tearing fustian.

"Get off my coat-tail!" whispered Joe. "There goes one flap, as sure as a gun! Why, get off, Ned!"

And Ned was off, and one leg of his breeches beside; and then he was "ah"-ing and "oh"-ing, and telling Joe that he "believed there were nails in the side of the wall, for something had scratched him tremendously, and torn his breeches all to pieces!"

Joe sympathized with him, for he said "half his coat was hanging up there somewhere!"

They now started on, hand-in-hand, for Ned believed that he "knew the way." They had arrived a little beyond the trees when something went "swash! swash!" into the water-vat.

A sneeze ensues; then the exclamation:

"Thunder! that water smells rather old!"

Ned wanted to go home at once, but Joe was too much excited to listen for a moment to such a proposition.

"Never heard any thing about that cistern before: the old fellow must have fixed it on purpose to drown people in. Curious, though, that we should both fall in it!"

They now pushed on again for the melons. Presently they were caught by the cords, and headlong they went into a heap of briars and thistles, and the like, which had been placed there for their express accommodation.

"Such a-gittin' up-stairs!" muttered one.

"Nettles and thistles! how they prick!" exclaimed the other.

They now determined to go on more cautiously. At length they arrived at "the patch."

"How thick they are, Joe! Come here! There's more than a dozen fat ones right here!"

And down they sat in the midst of them, and seemed to conclude that they were amply rewarded for all their mishaps.

"Here, Jo," said Ned, "take this musk-melon; isn't it a rouser? Slash into it!"

"It cuts tremendous hard, Jim—Jim, it's a squash!"

"No, it isn't, I tell you; it's a new kind. Old Swipes sent to Rhode Island for the seed last spring."

"Well, then, all I've got to say is, that the old fellow got sucked in—that's all!"

"I'm going to gouge into this water-melon: hallo! there goes a half a dollar! I've broke my knife! If I didn't know it was a water-melon, I should say it was a pumpkin. Fact is, I believe it is a pumpkin!"

What "the boys" did besides, while the owner went to his stable and unmuzzled the dog and led him into the garden, he "couldn't say;" that they took long steps, the onion and flower-beds fully revealed in the morning.

They had paid pretty dearly for the whistle. They had not tasted of a single melon; they had got scratched, had torn their clothes, were as wet as drowned rats, and half-scared out of their wits at the ravenous dog, and the apprehension of being discovered.

The next night the owner of the melon-patch invited all the boys of the village, including "Ned" and "Joe," to a feast of melons, on the principle of "returning good for evil." This circumstance changed the "boys' opinion of "old Swipes," and his melons were never disturbed again.

THERE are many persons now living among us, who will remember the celebrated, or rather "no-terious" imposter, "Baron Von Huffman, who was a barber in his own country, but who had the address to impose himself upon the community of New York as a nobleman of distinction, and who, to the no small mortification of many of our "first families" afterward, was courted and fêted accordingly.

This sham nobleman once challenged one of our then citizens to mortal combat "on the field of honor;" and the story of the transaction is well worth relating, for it carries with it, we think, an important moral.

The "Baron" had lost his trunk in the North River, with all his letters of introduction; and consequently, until more came, his standing was not well ascertained. Some persons received him, while others denounced him; but this latter class the Baron, if he could get at them, was always ready to fight. He knew very well that the "logic of kings" was also the best logic for impostors; and if any body thought his credentials were "short weight," he was ready to throw his pistols into the scale.

In the case in question, Mr. J. R., whom "the Baron" met in a certain set where he had access, was famous for his good dinners, from which "the Baron" was always invariably left out. Weary of this, he called one day on Mr. R., and spread his "credentials," such as they were, before him, by way of removing suspicions which he said he had heard expressed, and against which he made a labored argument. He left his papers, and desired that they might be returned, with a note expressive of the impression which they had produced.

Mr. R. returned the papers in a blank envelope. "The Baron" thereupon sent a challenge, which was left at the door, as if it had been an invitation to dinner. Mrs. R. opened the note, and immediately replied to it as follows:

"SIR—Your note is received. My husband will not have any thing to do with you, under any circumstances; but whenever you produce official proof that you have been aid-de-camp to Marshal Blucher, I will fight a duel with you myself!"

MARY R.—

"The Baron's" business was very soon finished after this. It was not long before it transpired that he was the merest pretender, having picked up the show and varnish of a gentleman in the society of those whom he served in the capacity of a menial!

WE have heretofore given in "The Drawer" one or two amusing experiments of the "Spiritual Rappers," but nothing quite so laughable as the following experiment in Animal Magnetism, once on a time, in the "Old Dominion." Listen to the dialogue between the "operator" and his audience:

Mesmerizer. "You have been, gentlemen, that this here boy was taken promiscuously from the crowd. His arm is there against that wall, and he can't take it down, or get it down, except I will it to come down."

Crowd. "Take your arm down, boy."

Boy. "I can't do it, no way."

Crowd. "Down with it, and I'll give you a ninepence."

Mesmerizer. "He can't take it down, gentlemen, no more than he could lift a millstone. You may throw as much money as you please on the floor, and all that he lifts up I will pay for."

Here several of the crowd laid down quarters and half-dollars, to the amount of some five or six dollars.

"Now, my boy," said they, "that is all your; take it, and be off!"

The boy's arm dropped instantaneously! His hand (the most wonderful thing of all!) fell directly on the pile, which his nimble fingers clutched, and with his unmesmerized heels he made his joyful and final exit for the evening, leaving the learned and profound professor standing amazed at the unprofundness of his own art; the villainy of mankind; the "want of faith" and truth among "parties;" and, amidst the dreadful roar of the house, came demands for the restitution of the money which had been mesmerized by the boy!

THE annexed account of "Burying Alive" is undeniably authentic. It was first published in 1833, in a volume printed at Boston, entitled "Records of Travel." The subject was a lady of Lyons, in France, who, under the influence of a violent nervous disorder, fell into a state of seeming death, from which she fortunately aroused herself, just as she was about to be nailed up in her coffin! Her sensations, as related by her to the author, are thus described:

"It seemed to me that I was really dead, yet I was perfectly conscious of all that happened around me in this dreadful state. I distinctly heard my friends speaking, and lamenting my death at the side of my coffin! I felt them pull on my dead-clothes, and lay me in it. This feeling produced a mental anxiety, a horror that is indescribable. I tried to cry aloud, but my soul was without power, and could not act upon my body. I had the contradictory feeling, as if I were in my own body, and yet not in it, at one and the same time.

"It was equally impossible for me to stretch out my arm, or to open my eyes, as to cry, although I continually endeavored to do so. The internal anguish of my mind, however, was at its height, its utmost height, when the funeral-hymn began to be sung, and when the lid of the coffin was about to be nailed on! The thought that I was to be buried alive, was the first one which gave activity to my soul, and caused it to operate on my corporeal frame!"

Most readers will doubtless remember the case of the Rev. Mr. Tennent, of New Jersey, which occurred some long years ago, who lay in a trance for three days, and all the while was supposed to be dead, and was only saved from being buried alive by the pertinacity of a relative, who insisted that there was animal warmth in portions of his body, and that he should not be committed to the earth. Mr. Tennent recovered, and lived for many years afterward, in entire health.

SOME years ago, in a Southern journal, appeared the following sketch, under the title of "The Georgia Major in the Field." We have forgotten precisely who the "Georgia Major" was, but we believe he was an intimate acquaintance of the quaint, humorous, and accomplished Judge Longstreet, of that region of country:

His Honor the Mayor was in the discharge of his official functions on last Saturday evening—the business before him consisting of two several charges of assault and battery; to both of which the ubiquitous "Georgia Major" was the respondent.

"Do you plead guilty to the charge of assaulting the Rev. Mr. Williams?" asked the Mayor of the defendant.

"I do: that is to say—"

"Then I fine you ten dollars," said his Honor.

"That is to say," continued the Major, "I plead guilty, but if there is any way to get off from the fine, I should like very much to do it."

"Doubtless," drily observed the Mayor.

"I will make a statement—or, as you may say, a defense—~~om~~—a few remarks."

The Court nodded permission.

"You see, Williams came up to me, and spoke something to me; and said I, 'You beggarly rascal, pull off your hat when you speak to me!' " said the Major, throwing himself into a military attitude.

"That's enough," said the Mayor; "ten dollars and costs."

The Major bowed gracefully.

Proceeding now to the second charge, his Honor asked the defendant if he would plead guilty again.

"Not I!" exclaimed the Major; "I will make a statement, though, in relation, or in respect to, or regarding, the manner of the second fight."

"I was in the person's store who fought me, searching for one of the silver eyes which had dropped out of my walking-cane in the previous fight, when that person ordered me out. 'Sir,' said I, 'you must talk softly, ~~very~~ softly, when you address me, Sir.' Upon this, that person struck me with a skillet, Sir—an iron skillet, Sir—in the face!"

Here the Major pointed to his face, the nasal feature of which bore some purple streaks, that beautifully varied its usual rich ruby.

"And then, Sir," continued the Major, "I fell—staggered and fell—as I returned the blow with my cane; immediately a crowd jumped upon me, and beat me until they were pulled off. They didn't whip me, though; that ~~can't be done!~~"

Here the Major paused, and looked round triumphantly.

A witness being called and examined, corroborated the Major's "statement" except as to "the crowd's" having jumped upon him. No one interfered with the combatants. The witness stated, in addition, that the Major had contrived to hide his head under a hogshead, so as to protect it very effectually.

The Major cross-examined:

"You say nobody touched me but that man?" pointing to his antagonist.

"Nobody."

"Wasn't the crowd all against me?"

"The crowd thought you deserved a whipping for striking an inoffensive man—a Minister of the Gospel," replied the witness, very quietly.

"Didn't they all tell that man to 'whip me well,' or words to that effect?"

"Yes."

"And didn't he—that is—"

"Didn't he do it, you mean to ask; yes, he did, nicely!"

The Major now "pulled up;" he had been deceived: his imagination had led him into error; had transformed an individual of not over one hundred and fifty pounds' weight into a large "crowd."

"Well, well," said the Mayor, "as I have already fined you ten dollars, and as it seems in this case you received a pretty good whipping, I have concluded to discharge you as to this."

"Whipping!" ejaculated the Major, becoming positively tragic in his air, "WHIPPING!—is that a part of your sentence?—that I got WHIPPED! Sir, I'd rather be fined five hundred dollars than have that entered on the record. It wasn't done, Sir. I, Sir, have never been whipped!" And the Major "loomed" majestically about the room.

"If it ain't been done, it kin be done!" said somebody in the crowd; whereupon the Major collapsed into his original dimensions, in the folding of a peacock's tail; and wiping the perspiration from his brow, quietly retired.

"It was the last hair," says the proverb, "that broke the camel's back." Something like the "last hair" must have been felt by the principal in the annexed anecdote of Colonel Samuel L. Knapp, related many years ago:

A dapper little man, for want of something better to do, had started a magazine, which he was puffing at a great rate, and in the most "high faluting" style possible, in all the journals in the country. To this periodical Colonel Knapp was invited to contribute. He consequently sent in an article, which overran, by a half page or more, a "form" of eight pages. Unwilling to extend the number of pages, because of the cost, the proprietor changed a comma into a period at the end of the closing line of the page, leaving the gist of the article, the very dénouement of the story, undeveloped!

The author, as may readily be supposed, was "a little riled."

"Print the article as it was written, Sir, or leave it out altogether!"

"My dear Sir," responded the dapper little proprietor, "what's the use? It 'stops' very handsomely as it is: just let it go in! It makes another half form if it runs over, and that I can't afford!"

Reasonable as this request was considered, the author of the article peremptorily declined. The discomfited proprietor now took another tack, interposing what he thought would prove "a clincher," and remove all objections:

"Let it stand, Colonel Knapp—let it stand. It is very good as it is: I like it just as well as if that last part was tacked onto it; and if it ain't quite so nice, it don't make no difference—nobody will read it!—so what's the use?"

If this is not the "last hair that broke the camel's back," we have mistaken the meaning of the proverb.

SEVERAL years ago, in a Western city, on the occasion of a fire at a large hotel, at the moment when the destruction of the building seemed inevitable, the inmates became alarmed, and sought to escape, regardless of saving any thing but their lives. The interior of the house was filled with dense smoke, which rendered objects scarcely discernible. Amidst the confusion and alarm several firemen rushed into the burning building, to render assistance to the bewildered inmates. A member of a popular company, being in the second story, burst open the door of one of the sleeping apartments, and groping about, stumbled upon a cradle, in which lay a little one, totally unconscious of the danger which threatened it.

Quick as thought, the eager young member seized the cradle, the clothes, the baby and all, and rushed through the passage, down stairs into the street, his imagination fired by the idea of having saved a human being, and restoring to the arms of an agonized mother her darling infant. As he leaped through the flames into the open air, he called lustily for the parents of the child. The admiring crowd, who cheered lustily as he passed, gathered around to congratulate him upon his gallant and successful effort.

Torches were now produced; the clothes were removed; when lo! out tumbled the biggest kind of a—rag baby!

The young fireman agreed to "treat the crowd to an oyster-supper," if they would say nothing about the circumstance; but it "leaked out," as you see.

To our conception, the act was every way as meritorious as if there had been a live infant in the cradle. He thought there was, and his exertions were to save it; and such as it was he did, and if it had been otherwise, the result would have been the same.

We find a good anecdote in the Drawer of a man named Bentley, a most confirmed drinker, who yet would never drink with a friend or in public, and always denied, when he was a little too "steep," that he ever tasted liquor!

One day, some hard witnesses had concealed themselves in his room, and while he was in the very act of pouring the liquor down his throat, they seized him with his arm crooked and his mouth open, and holding him fast, asked him with an air of triumph:

"Ah, ha! Bentley! we've caught you at last, have we? You never drink, eh?"

Now one would have supposed that Bentley would have "owned up;" but not he! With the most grave and inexpressible face, he calmly and in a dignified manner, said:

"Gentlemen, you are mistaken: my name is not Bentley!"

Sheridan, when found "boozy," and giving his name as "Wilberforce," was not more vinously cool and collected.

We once heard a young man from the country—afterward and now a successful and most esteemed merchant of our city—describe the effect which the ringing of the first gong he ever heard (it was at the Astor House, then recently opened) had upon his ears and upon his mind. It was a most amusing story, if we could recall it, in all its graphic detail; but in the mean time, we shall permit the following to do duty in its place. The scene is Richmond, in the "Old Dominion," and the hero, a resident of one of the tobacco-growing counties of Virginia, has come up to the state capital on his first visit, to sell off his crop, see the sights, and rub off some of the rust which his back-woods "fetching-up" has thrown about his manners.

He reached Richmond (for so runs the story) about the middle of the afternoon, and was fortunate in selling his crop at an advantageous rate, and almost immediately. Meeting with an old school-fellow—one who had lived in the city long enough to know its ways—he was advised to take up his lodgings at the "crack house" of the place, and thither he at once went, "bag and baggage."

Just before dinner, his friend called upon him, and found him comfortably situated in a room just at the head of the first flight of stairs. It was close upon dinner time.

"Supposing we take something to start an appetite?" said the bibulous man, who had "just come down."

"Agreed," rejoined his city friend; "a glass of wine and bitters for me."

"Let us go down to the bar and get it; dinner's 'most ready," continued the tobacco-grower.

"We might as well have it up here," said the other.

"Good lick; but how are we to call for it?"

"Ring that bell there."

"What bell?"

"Why, pull that cord that you see hanging there."

The young fellow laid hold of the rope and gave it a jerk—and just at that moment the gong sounded for dinner. Never had he heard such a sound before; and the rattling, rumbling, swelling roar and crash came upon his ear with a report that stunned him! He staggered back from the rope, raised both hands in horror, and exclaimed—

"Je-rew-salem! what a smash! I've broke every piece of crockery in the house! There ain't a whole dish left! You must stick by me, old fellow," he added to his friend; "don't leave me in this scrape, for my whole crop won't pay half the breakage. What did you tell me to touch that blasted rope for?"

But before his friend, who was bursting with laughter, could answer, a servant entered the room, with—

"Did you ring that bell, Sir?"

"Bell? no; I never touched a bell in my life; what bell? I never saw your bell."

"Somebody rang the bell of this room—that's certain," continued the servant.

"No they didn't. There's nobody here that ever saw a bell," and then turning to his friend, he added aside: "Let's lie him out of it; I shan't have a cent left to get home if I pay the entire damage! What do they set such rascally traps for, to take in folks from the country?"

After a violent fit of laughter, the friend was enabled to explain that it was only the gong sounding for dinner; a simple summons to "walk down to soup," got up on the Chinese plan. They made their way to the dining-room; but it was some time before the young tobacco-grower could get over the stunning and awful effects of that dreadful gong.

"It is a god-send," said he, "that it didn't turn my hair gray on the spot!"

Some years ago, a young lawyer, whom we shall call Sharp, opened "an office" in a little hole about as large as a dry goods' box, in the vicinity of Wall and Nassau Streets. He had a very small table, a smaller library, and no business whatever. He got his sign painted on tick, and his floor sanded by the grace of an old negro who worked about the building and cleaned out the other rooms. Sharp had sat in his office for ten whole days, watching for a client, with that peculiar avidity that marks the actions of a black spider waiting for a fly. He had agreed to pay his rent semi-monthly, and in five days more he calculated he would be weighed in the landlord's balance and found wanting. In this mood of perplexity, a gentleman presented himself before Sharp, and stated that he had a bill he wanted collected, and asked the eminent "young practitioner" if he could do it. Sharp replied in the immortal language of Miller at Sandusky, "I'll try, Sir!" and added, that as he had a reputation to gain, no labor would be spared on his part to make the culpable defendant "fork over." In due course of law, Mr. Trader was sued; judgment was obtained against him by Sharp for the twelve hundred and fifty dollars due; the case was carried up to the then existing Chancery Court, and, as might have been expected, the plaintiff got no money, and paid the costs.

It is no more than justice to Sharp to say that he had been indefatigable. There appeared upon his slate, day after day, the significant paragraph, "out on business," and he never gave the unfortunate Mr. Trader a moment's peace until the "final ending of the important suit."

After the judgment was rendered, much to Sharp's astonishment, Trader came up to him and said, "My dear fellow, you are a trump! so persevering were you, that I thought several times you would get that money out of me, although I haven't a cent in the world. If I ever have any law business, you shall attend to it"—and the two gentlemen, arm in arm, in high spirits, sauntered down the street. Suddenly Sharp stopped in front of a vacant lot, where a number of Irishmen were digging out a cellar preparatory to the erection of a large building. "Look there," said Sharp, musing, and pointing into the hole below—"look there, Mr. Trader. Some evening a gentleman will come along, and fall down that cellar, Sir, and he will cry out for the watchman, and be taken to the City Hospital, recover from his bruises, and receive a handsome sum of money for damages at the same time."

"Do you think so?" said Sharp, brightening up, and eying with no very great dread the soft sand below. "Damages, ha!—why this lot," he continued, "belongs to the very man who has just put me through Chancery."

A few evenings afterward, deep and piteous groans were heard issuing from "that cellar." The watchmen got lights, and upon examination found Mr. Trader, with his arm broken, his shoulder dislocated, and his under jaw displaced, and in this miserable plight he was, sure enough, conveyed to the City Hospital.

Sharp heard of the thing with intense delight; he rubbed his hands, and would have danced round his office floor, but it was too small to admit of any such luxury. In the course of a week he called on Trader, and found him enveloped in bandages of lint, like a mummy, an ornament and honor to the "bad-fracture department" of the hospital. After some preliminary conversation, Trader informed Sharp that, most unfortunately, the Irishmen had without his knowledge continued their operations, and made a sub-cellar; and instead of falling on the soft sand, as he expected, he struck upon solid timbers, and bounced off into the chasm below, to land on a pile of "blasted rocks."

"It will be all right in a few days—the damages will be immense;" and Sharp left, and at once instituted a suit against his former and first client. Weeks wore on, and Trader was finally able, with the assistance of crutches, friendly arms, and a good back, to reach Sharp's office. He was in a terrible condition. His face still exhibited a scientific display of the prismatic colors. His shoulder was awry, and his broken arm ended off in swollen and stiffened fingers, that seemed as if they would never regain their cunning. "I have suffered immensely," said Trader, heaving a sigh. "I have lain weeks beside the victims of all the broken limbs and heads of this great city. Night after night I have been awakened by the screams and groans of the patients, and all day listened to the sawing of bones in the amputation of limbs. Besides, I have had soup to eat.—Oh! Heaven! how rapidly these Irish dig in the earth! That sub-cellar—no amount of damages could give me reparation!"

Sharp listened patiently to all that Trader had to say; and then announced, in an oracular manner, that the owner of the cellar had offered to compromise by paying fifteen hundred dollars, and thus avoid a suit. Trader thought it was a small sum, but pains passed are soon forgotten, and, on the whole, he concluded to take the money, remarking, "that fifteen hundred would pay pretty well, after all, for six weeks' labor, if it were performed in a hospital."

A week following this conversation Trader was discharged from the hospital, and at the same time received the joyful intelligence from Sharp that the fifteen hundred had been paid off, and no grumbling. With joyful heart Trader left his abode of misery, and, all things considered, got into a hack with some alacrity. "Fifteen hundred," he soliloquized,

"will go a great way this summer in frolicking. I need a little respite—wonder which is best for knitting bones, Nahant or Saratoga? The Catskill Mountain House would prove too bracing." And thus giving vent to his imagination, he reached Sharp's office, shook his lawyer by the hand, moved the heretofore stiffened fingers, and, in his joy, tried to bring his left arm up to his head, but couldn't.

"Now," said Trader, after some general remarks, "fork over the money—I've earned it, God knows."

Sharp's eye assumed a glazed look; he repeated the words, "fork over the money," with a hollow echo; and then, as if recollecting something, said, "The money—ah, yes—I understand. You see, my dear fellow, in settling for the damages I took the judgment of twelve hundred and fifty against you, as cash, and the two hundred and fifty I'll keep for my fee—though really you should pay me something more besides."

A pallor came over Trader as the truth flashed upon him; the broken bone of his left arm lost its "setting," and he was carried back to the hospital in "a relapse." It is hardly necessary to say that he finally came out a wiser if not a better man.

STEWART HOLLAND, of the ill-fated Arctic, sent a thrill of admiration through the civilized world, because, unawed by the disasters about him, he continued to fire the signal-gun of distress until engulfed in the unsatisfied grave of the sea. Who still remembers the noble Richard Mann, who, upon the burning steamer Griffith, was asked if he would remain at the wheel, and his stern answer was heard above the increasing tumult—"I will." And nobly did he redeem his promise; amidst sheeted fire he directed the burning boat to the shore, and as she struck, and thus announced to hundreds of shrieking women and children and appalled men that they were saved, the form of Richard Mann was seen for the last time as he sank into the fiery vortex below him—he perished nobly at his post! Yet Holland and Mann, as hundreds of kindred spirits, come up out of the class known as intelligent hard-working men. Noble spirits, who, without the advantages which should result from refinement and wealth, are still nature's noblest works. They are the kind of men who, in all ages, have performed the valorous, self-sacrificing deeds of history, but yet are rarely remembered.

LORENZO DOW is still remembered by some of the "old fogies" as one of the most eccentric men that ever lived. On one occasion he took the liberty, while preaching, to denounce a rich man in the community, recently deceased. The result was an arrest, a trial for slander, and an imprisonment in the county jail. After Lorenzo got out of "limbo," he announced that, in spite of his (in his opinion) unjust punishment, he should preach, at a given time, a sermon about "another rich man." The populace was greatly excited, and a crowded house greeted his appearance. With great solemnity he opened the Bible, and read, "And there was a rich man who died and went to —;" then stopping short, and seeming to be suddenly impressed, he continued: "Brethren, I shall not mention the place this rich man went to, for fear he has some relatives in this congregation who will sue me for defamation of character." The effect on the assembled multitude was irresistible, and he made the impression permanent by taking another text, and never alluding to the subject again.

Literary Notices.

History of the Origin, Formation, and Adoption of the Constitution of the United States, by GEORGE TICKNOR CURTIS. (Published by Harper and Brothers.) In these carefully prepared volumes we find a new and gratifying proof of the sagacity which, within a few years past, has led some of our most accomplished scholars to select the subject of their literary labors from the treasures of American history. The period which furnishes Mr. Curtis with a pregnant and copious theme—extending from the commencement of the Revolution to the close of the Convention of 1787, and the beginning of Washington's administration—although one of the most important in the annals of the United States, has not been adequately treated by any previous writer. The circumstances in which the Federal Constitution had its origin are familiar, in their broad outlines, to every intelligent citizen; but the more minute and intimate details, in regard to its formation and adoption, are far less generally known to the American people than the political antecedents and military history of the Revolution. This want the author of the present work has undertaken to supply. It has been his purpose to analyze and exhibit the causes which at once rendered the Constitution inevitable, and directed its course and decisions, together with the mode in which it became the organic law of the Union, and with sketches of the eminent statesmen who shared in the deliberations concerning its establishment. The importance and value of such a work, if executed with the rare ability demanded by the subject, are evident at a glance. It must fill an unoccupied place in the history of the United States, and form an indispensable study for the enlightened politician. The manner in which Mr. Curtis has performed his task challenges severe critical examination, which we have no doubt it will prove fully competent to sustain. Some exceptions may certainly be taken to his style as a model of historical composition. While it will be deemed by many too uniformly stately in its movement, it is not without instances of harshness and inelegance, which impede the easy and agreeable flow of the narrative. At the same time it is recommended by its chasteness, precision, and vigor, and its general freedom from ambitious flights of rhetoric. In regard to the more substantial qualities of the work, it can justly claim the merit of accurate and thorough research, a comprehensive insight into the philosophy of the Constitution, and a genuine historical tact in tracing the causes which rendered its adoption a necessity. The collateral views which it presents of the progress of the Revolution, and the development of national character, are judicious and informing. As an accompaniment to the detail of the military operations which secured the independence of our country, its value can scarcely be over-estimated. It forms an essential complement to the excellent works which treat of the military achievements of our Revolutionary ancestors. A portion of the first volume is devoted to a series of sketches of the founders of the Constitution. These are drawn with consummate address; they are of pregnant brevity; of sagacious discrimination; and singularly felicitous in expression. The author's powers of composition are here displayed in a brilliant light; and although he often rises to an impressive eloquence, he never transcends the grave simplicity appropriate to the character of his theme. His exposition of the debates in the Convention is a master-piece of clearness and condensation. Following the clew presented in Mr. Madison's Papers, he has arranged the topics and results of the complicated discussions in that most significant assembly of American statesmen, in a lucid order and in symmetrical proportions, which enable the reader to comprehend them in all their far-reaching relations.

Poems of the Orient, by BAYARD TAYLOR. (Published by Ticknor and Field.) The author of this volume is favorably known to the public as a traveler, a public speaker, and a poet. In each of these departments he has won golden opinions and warm sympathies. The present volume will enhance his pure and genuine fame as a successful writer of poetry. He has garnered in it the most precious portion of the harvest afforded by his Eastern travels—the memories of new life and new hopes inspired by the glories of the Orient—the influence of gorgeous natural scenes, and romantic displays of character—and the glow and exhilaration derived from the free, spontaneous impulses of a wanderer in the desert. The subjects of these poems, for the most part, are suggested by Oriental experience. Their tone of thought and feeling, as well as their imagery, bears the stamp of Arabia Felix and the Nile. With a temperament singularly susceptible to external impressions, the poet has surrendered himself to the illusions of an Eastern clime, and vividly reproduced them in his luxurious verse. His descriptions are radiant with the purple light of dawn, while a vein of delicate and refined sentiment pervades his most sensuous representations. The best poems in the volume are those which betray the least artifice in elaboration. "The Poet in the East," "An Oriental Idyl," "Bedouin Song," "The Arab to the Palm," are instinct with the ruddy life of the Orient, and show a more genial origin than the ambitious efforts like "Kilimandjaro" and "The Desert Hymn to the Sun." "Hassan's Temptation" contains several passages of exquisite description, and presents some of the most pleasing specimens of the warmth and richness of the author's imagination. The volume closes with a collection of miscellaneous poems, most of which are of a highly reflective character, and, as expressions of personal feeling, present a striking contrast to the bold and jubilant strains of the Orient. The tenderness of emotion from which they proceed is embodied in stanzas of great sweetness of versification. A more truly pathetic piece than "The Phantom" can scarcely be found in recent poetry.

A Treatise on the Camp and March, by HENRY D. GRAFTON, presents, in a popular manual, the general principles at the foundation of the duties of the camp and the conduct of a march. It contains much useful military information, and will be found a valuable aid in the organization and discipline of volunteer companies. (Published by Fetridge and Co.)

The Works of Beaumont and Fletcher are issued by Phillips, Sampson, and Co., in two elegant quartos, after the excellent complete edition of Mr. DYCK. The text has been formed by a minute collation of all the early copies, and is accompanied with a variety of select and appropriate notes. A copious memoir of Beaumont and Fletcher is prefixed to the work. In point of typographical execution, the edition is every thing that could be desired for the choicest libraries.

Poems, by WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT, collected and arranged by the author. The lovers of genuine poetry will give a heart-warm welcome to this substantial and convenient edition of the illustrious American bard. It is issued in two plain duodecimos, without embellishment, and in a style of neat, unostentatious typography, in excellent keeping with the character of the work. Beside the familiar poems, on which the fame of Bryant is founded, the edition contains several pieces of a later date, which it is high praise to say are worthy of the companionship in which they are found. A new generation has come upon the stage since the original issue of most of these poems, but no recent competitor has eclipsed their brilliant popularity; and in the love and admiration with which they are cherished by the whole American public, the author may enjoy a foretaste of posthumous honors. (Published by D. Appleton and Co.)

The World as It Is, by FRANCIS C. WOODWORTH, is the title of a series of small volumes, giving a miniature sketch of the most important sections of the globe, each section forming the subject of a separate volume. The well-known happy talent of the author as a purveyor for youthful instruction, is displayed in the volume already issued, devoted to the British Islands, and gives encouraging promise of the success of the series. (Published by Lippincott, Grambo, and Co.)

The Life of Martin Luther, with an Introduction by the Rev. THEOPHILUS STORK, D.D. (published by Lindsay and Blakiston), is the reproduction of a popular German work, presenting the biography of the great German Reformer in pictorial illustrations and historical sketches. In the execution of the volume, the life of Luther is combined with the progress of the Reformation, giving a historical and moral unity between the man and his work. The edition is brought out in an attractive style, and can not fail to awaken a fresh interest in the great-hearted founder of Protestantism.

The Christian's Daily Delight (published by Lindsay and Blakiston), is a collection of religious poetry from eminent English and American writers, including a variety of the choicest gems, and arranged in a tasteful and pleasing form as a Christmas gift-book. It is illustrated by several well-executed mezzotints by Sartain, from the designs of different eminent artists.

William Radde has published A Treatise on Nervous Derangements, by JOHN C. PETERS, M.D., comprising a great variety of details in regard to every form of mental disorders, with a statement of the most approved treatment, according to the Homeopathic system. The volume is less devoted to the support of any medical theories than to the exhibition of facts, and may be consulted to advantage by practitioners of every school, as a copious repository of interesting cases.

A Pictorial History of the United States, by BENJON J. LOSSING. (Published by F. J. Huntington and Mason Brothers.) This volume, by a distinguished writer on American history, is constructed on a novel plan, and has some peculiar features which recommend it as a valuable manual for schools and families. The contents are divided into six chapters, each presenting the record of an important period. The first gives a general view of the aborigines who occupied the continent at the time of the arrival of the Europeans. The second describes the discoveries and preparations for settlement made by individuals and governments. The third records the progress of the settlements before the formation of the Colonial governments. The fourth narrates the history of the Colonies, showing the development of democratic ideas, which resulted in the establishment of a political confederation. The fifth is devoted to the War for Independence; and the sixth gives a brief history of the Republic, from its commencement to the present time. In executing this comprehensive plan, Mr. Lossing has not been content with a dry and meagre chronicle of facts. He has aimed to trace events to their causes, giving a philosophical view of the progress of the history. A system of constant and easy reference to prior events, in relation to any given topic, is kept up throughout the volume, and affords an invaluable aid to the thorough comprehension of the subject. The volume is filled with a profusion of illustrative engravings, which are introduced less for the sake of ornament than of practical utility. We are not acquainted with any work in which the outlines of American history are more succinctly rendered, or more graphically illustrated. A greater degree of simplicity might sometimes be an improvement to the style; but, on the whole, both the plan and the execution of the volume may be spoken of in terms of high commendation.

The Youth of Madame de Longueville, from the French of VICTOR COUSIN, by F. W. RICORD. (Published by D. Appleton and Co.) In the preparation of this work, M. Cousin has gratified a cherished wish of many years, by presenting a full-length portraiture of one of the most remarkable women that illustrated the brilliant society of France during the seventeenth century. This was an epoch of singular interest in French history. Philosophy, poetry, and the fine arts had attained a high degree of development. The nation was equally penetrated by the spirit of religion and of military glory. The influence of Descartes had given an impulse to reflection, and the profoundest studies were pursued in the gayest saloons. Conspicuous in the most imposing circles was the subject of this memoir. She was the daughter of Henry de Bourbon, Prince of Condé, during whose imprisonment in the castle of Vincennes she was born, in the year 1619. M. Cousin divides her biography into three principal epochs—the first extending from her marriage, in 1642, to her liason with the Duke de la Rochefoucauld, in 1648; the second, comprising her life of romance and gaiety, to 1654; and the third, her retirement among the Carmelites to her death, in 1679. "Thus"—as M. Cousin, in truly French fashion, observes—"first a spotless reputation, then faults, then explanation, divide the career of Madame de Longueville." The former of these periods alone is treated of in the present volume. The subject presents M. Cousin in a new light. We here find him discussing the characteristics of female beauty with as much unctious as once animated his subtle analysis of the beau-ideal. He leaves the transition from the subjective to the objective, from psychology to ontology, for the delineation of the blue-stockings at the Hotel de Rambouillet, and for learned disquisitions on the poetry and gallantry of the age of the great Louis. The work forms a curious commentary on French society, as well as on the versatile tastes of the author.

Afraga is the title of a new romance translated from the German of THEODORE MUGGE, by EDWARD JOY MORRIS. The author of this work is regarded in Germany as one of the most distinguished writers of fiction of which the prolific literature of that country can boast. In this domestic novel he introduces the reader to an almost untrodden field: the scene being laid in Norway, and amidst those desert, icy steppes, where the Laplander pursues his perilous vocation in the remote neighborhood of the North Pole. The peculiar manners and customs of Norwegian society are portrayed with life-like fidelity; while the characters of the plot, in their animated development, present a forcible illustration of the identity of human nature under the most opposite circumstances. The progress of the reader in the narrative is somewhat impeded by the unpronounceable names of the jaw-cracking Scandinavian; but he is amply compensated for the discouragement by the vivid delineations of passion, and the admirable picturesque descriptions with which the volume is crowded. (Published by Lindsay and Blakiston.)

The Elements of Intellectual Philosophy, by FRANCIS WAYLAND. (Published by Phillips, Sampson, and Co.) Although this volume was primarily intended as a text-book for college instruction, it has by no means the character of a compilation, but contains the fruits of profound and original thought. Without attempting to present an exhaustive system of mental science, it gives a lucid analysis of the main topics of discussion, including the perceptive faculties, the intuitions of the intellect, memory, reasoning, and imagination. Dr. Wayland does not affect to be a discoverer in this department of inquiry; nor, on the other hand, is he the blind devotee of any metaphysical school. His reading on the subject, we should judge, has not been extensive, although he betrays a familiar acquaintance with the usual standard authorities in our own language. He is more indebted to reflection than to erudition for the materials of his volume. His method is that of a common-sense eclecticism—not the scientific eclecticism of M. Cousin—but the judicious adoption of those views which commend themselves to his intelligence, without reference to their historical origin. He is, evidently, no theorist—we presume he has little confidence in any theory transcending the limits of immediate observation. Hence he usually aims at nothing beyond a lucid description of the mental faculties, with popular and practical illustrations of their characteristics and mode of operation. But on such topics his remarks are always fertile in instruction. He never fails to suggest valuable ideas, and often throws new light on the subject of discussion by presenting it in a new aspect. His counsels with regard to the cultivation of the different faculties are always of moment, often reminding us of the sagacity and insight of Locke in his "Conduct of the Understanding." The style of President Wayland, in this volume, is an admirable specimen of didactic composition. It is transparent as amber. He seldom uses a superfluous or an inappropriate word. Nor does he quit his grasp of a thought until he has made it as clear to the reader as it lies in his own mind. He makes no parade whatever of learned or technical terms. He never loses himself in a maze of abstractions. His diction is marked alike by precision and brevity. At the same time it has nothing of the dry, hard character, which often stiffens the style when logic is made of more account than rhetoric. He is preserved from this vice by the beauty and aptness of his illustrations. They are always in point, and sometimes extremely felicitous. His work, accordingly, claims the rank of a valuable manual, founded on the basis of cultivated good sense, and, without adding any positive accessions to mental philosophy, accomplishing whatever it undertakes with masterly success.

A System of Intellectual Philosophy, by REV. ASA MAHAN. (Published by A. S. Barnes and Co.) The fundamental ideas of intellectual science are more fully discussed in this treatise by the President of Cleveland University, than in the work of Dr. Wayland noticed above. The author avows his predilection for the teachings of Kant, Cousin, and Coleridge, and has freely availed himself of the investigations of the two first-named eminent authorities, in his treatment of several important questions. No other text-book in our language, as far as we know, so fully embodies the most valuable results of the Critical and the Eclectic systems as the present volume. They are, however, presented with little judgment, or power of mental assimilation. The method of the author is loose, desultory, and inconsequent; his style is disfigured by frequent inaccuracies; and his illustrations are often puerile, and sometimes coarse. He has brought out a variety of admirable scientific ideas, for which he is indebted to his masters; but the negligent and slovenly manner in which he has performed his task shows a taste and degree of culture inadequate to the occasion.

The Positive Philosophy of Auguste Comte, freely translated and condensed by HARRIET MARTINEAU. (Published by Calvin Blanchard.) The term Positive Philosophy has an imposing sound, and has been proclaimed, with a sonorous flourish of trumpets, by those who recognize in its author the Bacon of the nineteenth century. The system has excited some attention among thinking men in this country; it has called forth several elaborate critiques; in certain quarters, it has been regarded with a feeling almost like panic; but few have announced their adhesion to its principles; and none, that we are aware, have discovered in it the grand panacea for the evils of the world. We can not regard Comte as entitled to the high place which is claimed for him by Miss Martineau and a little knot of his admirers in England. Professing to be an earnest stickler for facts, he is the most audacious theorizer of the age. He attempts to explain the history of opinions by an assumption which has no historical support. Affirming that the natural progress of thought is in a threefold order, advancing from theology to metaphysics, and thence to positive science, he applies the standard thus obtained, to measuring the achievements of the intellect in the field of scientific investigation. He maintains that the race are destined to outgrow all theological and metaphysical conceptions, until enlightened and emancipated humanity shall plant its foot on the platform of facts addressed to the senses. But this is little more than a reproduction, under another aspect, of the lifeless materialism of the last century. Comte has, indeed, embroidered the sombre velvet pall which concealed the ghastliness of death with a favorite historical hypothesis; but, in spite of the important part which this hypothesis plays in his system, it disappears upon an accurate scrutiny of its pretensions, and leaves us nothing but the old, effete materialism, which numbers few intelligent advocates at the present day. We do not deny that Comte exhibits a familiar knowledge of the position of physical science. He has made a careful study of its development; noted its conquests and its shortcomings; detected its errors of method; held it down to a rigid induction of facts; submitted its accomplishments to an excruciating analysis; and suffered none of its pretended discoveries to pass muster without a grim challenge. This is all very well. He has thus done a good service to the cause of physical research. No one who has the courage and persistence to wade through his labyrinthine details on this subject, can fail to bring away many fruitful and salutary suggestions. But his repudiation of all truth, except that which is founded on the observation of the senses, shows the narrow and exclusive character of his intellect. His attacks on the whole domain of spiritual conceptions, only betray his ignorance of the noblest principles of human nature. His mind is essentially mathematical in its tendencies. It is neither intuitive nor creative. His reasonings on mathematical evidence are admirable. They present many instructive and satisfactory considerations. No intelligent reader can help being struck with their appositeness and force. He applies the methods of mathematics to the estimate of physical discoveries with eminent success. He knows better than most men how to count, and weigh, and measure. But when he comes into the sphere of rational intuitions, and discusses the higher philosophy of thought, his meagreness and superficiality become apparent. On this account we do not think that he will compel either theology or metaphysics to shut up shop quite yet. They will enjoy a breathing-time at least, until some more formidable opponent defies them to mortal combat. Comte's assaults only remind one of Mrs. Partington's enterprise of sweeping out the Atlantic ocean with a broom.

A work of considerable interest to students of American history has just been published at Rome. It is a life of Columbus, written by the last descendant of the Great Admiral, now a Catholic priest. With him, therefore, the line of Columbus comes to an end. The Italian title of the book is as follows: "Patria e Biografia del Grande Ammiraglio D. Cristoforo Colombo de' Conti e Signori di Cuccaro." It throws much light upon the disputed question of the birth-place of the discoverer of America, and contains a new portrait, which is affirmed to be authentic, differing very materially from any heretofore known. We understand that the volume is to be translated by a gentleman of this city.

MR. KINGLAKE, the author of Eothen, rode on the staff of Lord Raglan at Alma, and shared all the perils and honors of that glorious field. Shall we have a history of the campaign in the Crimea from that pen, so chary of its success? Eothen was a literary event at home: the history of the war by such a hand would be monumental. It would be the Iliad of two continents.

Among the new English works advertised as forthcoming, the following are announced: An Inquiry into the Principles of Church Authority; or Reasons for recalling my Subscription to the Royal Supremacy, by the Rev. R. J. WILBERFORCE; and Lord CAMBLESLE's Diary in Turkish and Greek Waters. Among works "just ready," or "to be published shortly," are the much anticipated Literary Life and Correspondence of Lady Blessington (which is to be republished by Harper and Brothers); the equally desired Thirty Years of Foreign Policy; or, a History of the Secretaryships of the Earl of Aberdeen and Viscount Palmerston, by Mr. Disraeli's truculent biographer, whoever he is; a book on the Military Forces and Institutions of Great Britain, by Mr. H. B. THOMSON, Barrister-at-Law; a Manual of Mercantile Law, by Mr. LEONE LEVI; and Four Years at the Court of Henry VIII., in the form of selections from the dispatches of Sebastian Guistinian, Venetian Ambassador at that monarch's court, translated by Mr. RAWDON BROWN. Another "to be published shortly," is A new Christmas Book, by Mr. THACKERAY, who, by-the-by, it is said, meditates a second lecturing-tour in America as soon as his Newcomes is finished.

In the somewhat vague category of "nearly ready," we observe, The Fibrous Plants of India, fitted for Cordage, Clothing, and Paper, by Dr. FORBES ROYLE; the Literary Remains of Henry Fynes Clinton; the Geography of Herodotus illustrated by Modern Researches, by Mr. J. TALBOYS WHEELER; the Traditions and Superstitions of the New Zealanders, by Mr. EDWARD SHORTLAND; a novel called Ethel, or the Double Error, by MARIAN JAMES. Still farther in the distance, apparently, but announced as "preparing for publication," or under some such head, are, Sir DAVID BREWSTER's new Life, Writings, and Discoveries of Sir Isaac Newton; a collection of the Letters of John Calvin, edited by Dr. JULES BONNET; a new work by the erratic, semi-mythical Mr. GEORGE BORROW, entitled Romany Rye (something, we suppose, in the romantic Gipsy vein); two volumes of translations by the same anomalous personage—one called the Songs of Europe, and consisting of translations from all European languages, the other Kampe Viser, and consisting of legends from the Danish; a work on Polynesian Mythology, by Sir GEORGE GREY; a Note-book of Adventure in the Wilds of Australia, by Mr. W. HOWITT; a volume entitled Domestic Life during the Civil War, by Mr. HEPPWORTH DIXON; a work with the similar title of Town Life of the Restoration, by Mr. BELL; a Hand-book for Young Painters, by Mr. LESLIE; Mr. JAMESON's Common-place Book; the concluding volume of Colonel SABINE's translation of HUMBOLDT's Cosmos; a book called Habits and Men, by Dr. DORAN; and one entitled Philosophy at the Foot of the Cross, by Mr. J. A. SZ. JOHN.

The public, anticipating advertisements, is expecting Mr. MACAULAY's new volumes of his History of England, the concluding volume of Mr. GROTE's great History of Greece, and the third volume of Lord JOHN RUSSELL's most slovenly issue of the Memorials and Correspondence of Charles James Fox; and Mr. KAYE, fresh from the Life of Lord Metcalfe, takes up a great subject in the Governors-General of India.

Finally, new tales are understood to be in the loom from Mr. CHARLES LEVER, Miss JEWELL, Mrs. MARSH, Mrs. HUBBARD, and Mrs. MOODIE; new biographies to be in preparation by Mr. JOHN FORSTER and Mr. DENNISTOUN; and new poems, by Mr. ALEXANDER SMITH and Mr. SYDNEY YENDTS.

FIGURES 1 AND 2.—EVENING AND PROMENADE COSTUMES.

THE approaching season of winter festivities demands especial attention on our part to the illustration of costumes for evening assemblies.—We have selected a dress for soirées which is extremely elegant, premising, however, that great latitude exists, as to the modes adopted, in the fashionable world.

FIGURE 1.—The dress which we present is of damask silk, with an elaborate design wrought upon a white ground. The corsage is closed. It is trimmed with a rûche of the material, which heads a fall of point lace. Smaller rûches, increasing in frequency and width, border the flounces. The dress is ornamented with groups of camellias and other flowers. The sleeves are formed in lappets, each of which terminates with a drop button. The under-sleeves are of lace, en suite with that upon the corsage; they are very full. The flounces, like the sleeves, are looped up with ribbon.

FIGURE 2.—This is a promenade costume, the dress composed of taffeta of a dark chocolate color, with a black velvet stripe woven in the flounces. The sleeves have narrow bouillons running longitudinally half the depth, the lower portion simply confined at the wrist. The corsage is half closed to the neck. The cloak is of black cloth, having a very deep cape. The whole garment is very ample. It is trimmed with a novel style of silk plush, which bears a very close resemblance to chinchilla fur. Varieties of this plush are in high esteem for trimmings of garments of this description.

The Illustrations of BONNETS require little verbal explanation. Both recommend themselves by their great simplicity and elegance.—Figure 3, intended for a young lady, is of white silk or satin, trimmed with a marabout feather bordering the brim. The crown is ornamented with drop buttons. The top is flat. Soft crowns are less frequently met with than heretofore.—Figure 4, which is intended for a lady of more mature years, has a broad lace turned over the front. The inside trimmings are of ivy leaves. It has also a marabout feather upon each side. The crown, which is checkered, is bordered by a quilling.

The COIFFURE, intended for a soirée, is composed of a Grecian braid passing over the top of the head. Against this lies a basket plait, which is crossed by a Circassian braid, that likewise confines the ends of the Grecian braid below it. Frizzled puffs are worn in front, with drooping sprays of jasmine. The yellow jasmine is especially admired for this purpose.

THE HERMITAGE.

ANDREW JACKSON.

DURING the heat of the conflict for Independence, the popular mind of America, always plastic, became like melted wax beneath the recorder's seal. It was made susceptible to the most delicate and the deepest impressions. Every noble word, and patriotic maxim, and curse and blessing—every bugle note, and trumpet blast, and clash of steel—every musket rattle, and savage yell, and dying groan—every plea for mercy, and fierce denial, and shout of victory, made deep and ineffaceable marks upon that yielding surface; and these were made deeper and more ineffaceable by the weight of years. The hearts and memories of the young became broad phylacteries, filled with sentences from the sacred Scriptures of purest patriotism. These were the lares and penates of their daily life; and when the privileges of manhood's prime allowed them to take position in the senate and the camp, by the side of the bending forms of those who had fought for freedom, they had no new creed to learn, nor rituals to study. They became heroes and sages as naturally as the child speaks the language of its mother; and those children of the heroic age of our Republic are the honored dead of this generation. The mould is yet fresh upon their graves, and the flowers planted there are not yet faded. Even the music of their requiem is yet echoing from hill to hill, and the tear yet glistens in the eye of the nation.

Among those whose cradle was rocked by the tempest of the Revolution, and whose bier was borne to the grave by the young men of to-day, was ANDREW JACKSON.

A republican and thoroughly independent spirit, born of persecution, and tempered like a Damascus blade, by oppression, was the inheritance of ANDREW JACKSON. When that royal libertine, the Eighth Henry of England, assumed to be the head of the Protestant Church in his realm, only because a Roman Pontiff, more just than he, refused to sanction the sacrifice of one of his queens to his lust, he sought to coerce the Irish people into the use of the Liturgy of the Reformed Church. His daughter, Elizabeth, continued the unwise efforts of her father, and reaped an abundant harvest of trouble. James the First increased the rigor of Protestant domination, and the hardy people of the north of Ireland, burning with zeal for their ancient faith, openly rebelled. Imperial troops soon crushed their efforts; and six counties, comprising half a million of acres, became the property of the King, by confiscation. Hoping to reform Ireland by the more peaceful method of Protestant infusion, James sent colonies of English and Scotch husbandmen to occupy those counties. The Scotch greatly predominated, and soon made the permanent impress of their nationality there. They retained their national characteristics, and for more than a century battled manfully against the Church of England which sought to control their religious organization, and the persecutions of their Roman Catholic neighbors. They persisted in calling themselves Scotch, even when, in the course of three or four generations, their blood mingled freely with that of the Irish. To distinguish them from natives of Scotland, they were called SCOTCH-IRISH. They were always republicans in religious matters; and, like their brethren, the Covenanters, they maintained their independence through many a fiery trial.

About the middle of the last century, many of those Scotch-Irish families, tired of the petty annoyances inflicted by power and bigotry, sold their lands and emigrated to America. Some of them settled in Pennsylvania and the Great Valley of Virginia, but more penetrated the bosom of the Carolinas, and built their cabins along the picturesque and fertile borders of the Catawba and Yadkin rivers. They brought with them clear heads, warm hearts, and willing hands. Thoroughly imbued with republican principles, they found in the free air and forest life of the wilderness genial promoters of lofty independence of thought and action. Accustomed from infancy to hate oppression and love freedom, they were among the earliest of the polyglot population of the American colonies to perceive the red hand of oppression beneath the fair glove of British protection. And when that hand was made bare, and held a sceptre of iron, they were among the earliest and most determined opposers of its rule.

Andrew Jackson, the father of the warrior and statesman whose brilliant career we purpose now briefly to consider, was one of a number of Scotch-Irish families who emigrated to the Carolinas, in 1765. He was a descendant of one of the original emigrants from Scotland. With three others, he purchased lands and settled in the vicinity of the Waxhaw Creek, near the dividing-line of North and South Carolina, where others of his countrymen, who had first located in Pennsylvania and Virginia, had formed a settlement and built a meeting-house.

The rudely-constructed but comfortable dwelling of Jackson was within half a mile of the

JACKSON'S BIRTH-PLACE.

Creek, in Mecklenburg County, North Carolina, on lands now owned by W. J. Cureton, Esq. There, on the 15th of March, 1767, his son Andrew was born; and, five days afterward, the infant and two brothers were made half-orphans by the death of their father. A month later, the widow, with her little family, crossed into South Carolina, and made their home at another point on the Waxhaw, twenty miles north of the present Lancaster Court-house. There the future hero passed the years of his infancy and early youth; and there his mind and heart received those stern lessons of life, whose impressions were seen in every phase of his eventful career.

The widow was left with slender means and a helpless family. As soon as the hands of her two older sons were able to labor, they were employed; while their education was derived from the occasional teachings of a district schoolmaster, and of their mother. Yearning to see one of her children a minister of the Gospel she loved so much, Andrew was devoted to that purpose. He was placed in the Waxhaw Academy, and was successfully pursuing the essential preparatory studies for ministerial labors, when the storm of the Revolution began to lower. He heard the low murmurings of the distant thunder at Lexington, and Bunker Hill, and Dorchester, with lively interest; and when louder peals shook the pine forests of the Southern seaboard and awakened the echoes of the inland hills, his young heart was stirred with an intense desire to go forth and mingle in the conflicts of the tempest. When royal troops, tired of unsuccessful warfare with the patriots of the populous North, came to crush the valiant rebels of the thinly-inhabited South, and his eldest brother joined the ranks of Captain Davie* and marched for Charleston, Andrew, although only twelve years of age, was as restive as a hound in the leash, with a desire to follow. And when the intelligence came that his brother had fallen under the heat of a burning sun at Stono (June, 1779), and he saw his mother's head bowed in grief, his little heart grew big with resolutions of vengeance, and his boyish tongue made valiant promises of trenchant retribution.

At length the dark clouds of war came rolling up from the seaboard, and threatened the beautiful hill-country with desolation. Georgia was subdued; Charleston lay helpless at the feet of British power; and the Southern army of patriots were prisoners or exiles. Marion had not yet formed his invincible brigade; Sumter was yet an invalid exile far up on the Catawba, and Pickens had not yet called forth his brave followers from the region of the Savannah and Saluda rivers. The victorious Britons at Charleston proceeded in three divisions to place South Carolina under martial rule. One division went up the Savannah to Augusta; another marched along the Congaree and Saluda to Ninety-Six; and the third, under Cornwallis and the fiery Tarleton, swept over the country, between the Santee and Pedee, toward Camden. There were a few American detachments yet abroad; but they were compelled to flee from post to post as the flood of British power advanced, and leave the State to utter subjugation. Among these were about four hundred men under Colonel Buford, who were marching for Charleston when intelligence of its fall reached them at Camden. Buford halted, and soon scouts hurried to his camp and reported the triumphant and rapid approach of Cornwallis.

Buford immediately changed front, and hastened toward North Carolina, but was overtaken in the Waxhaw settlement by Tarleton, who fell upon and massacred a large proportion of his command, even while they cried for quarter. It was ruthless and cold-blooded murder; and a British historian,* who was in the war, said, "On this occasion the virtue of humanity was totally forgot." Tarleton's quarter became a synonym for cruelty.

The wounded and dying were left in the angel-hands of the women of the Waxhaw settlement. They were conveyed to the log meeting-house; and there the mother of Andrew Jackson was among the most active, with words and deeds, in ministrations of consolation and relief for the sufferers. Under that consecrated roof—consecrated to the service of the Prince of Peace—young Jackson first saw the hideous image of war, and realized the accursed character of that tyranny he had been so early taught to hate. Then and there was planted in his bosom that detestation of wrong and oppression—that reverence for truth, justice, and freedom—and that deep patriotic devotion to his country, which formed the ruling elements of his character, and fitted him for leadership among a free people.

Almost at the same moment, those brave partisan leaders, Marion, Sumter, and Pickens, appeared at different points in South Carolina, and raised the standard of liberty. The crushed republicans lifted their heads in hope, and many equally brave but less eminent leaders collected the Whigs into bands, and prepared to check the advance of British power toward the mountains and the North State. All over the lower Catawba region the black footprints of the invader were seen upon every plantation. The strong men were in the camp and field; and feeble women, and more feeble old men, and tender youths were compelled to be defenders of the sanctities of home. Every where the fires of civil war burned fiercely; for under the banners of Whig and Tory, neighbors were arrayed against neighbors, and even kinsmen against kinsmen, in cruel and unrelenting conflict. At length Sumter crossed the Catawba, and, with Davie, proceeded to attack a British post at Hanging Rock. Among Davie's volunteers were Robert and Andrew Jackson. Like the Spartan mother, their widowed parent had placed the shield upon their arms with a heartfelt hope that they might bring them back unharmed, or be brought back upon them. In the decisive battle that ensued (August 6, 1780), the corps of Davie was greatly distinguished. The sons of the widow were unharmed, and returned to receive her blessing. This was Andrew Jackson's first battle. He was then only five months more than thirteen years of age.

For several months afterward, the whole region between the Great Pedee and Saluda rivers was the theatre of cruel warfare. The Waxhaw settlers, eminent for their unyielding republicanism, became the special objects of British hatred. A party, under Major Coffin, a Loyalist from the North, was sent to capture or destroy them. The settlers resisted, but were dispersed, and at the house of a relative, Robert and Andrew Jackson were made prisoners. Coffin displayed neither the magnanimity of a true soldier, nor the feelings of a gentleman. He allowed his brutal followers to insult the females, destroy the furniture, and plunder the drawers of the family where his young prisoners were taken; and he insulted and abused the lads without measure. He swore he would crush their rebel spirits by making them supple servants of his will, and began the degrading discipline by ordering Andrew to clean his muddy boots. The young hero, not yet fourteen years of age, proudly refused, and demanded treat-even a dog's privilege of lapping water from the brooks by the way. At Camden they were confined in a redoubt, with about two hundred and fifty others, where they were compelled to sleep on the ground, to eat bad bread without meat, to be taunted with the name of rebel, and to suffer robbery of their clothing by the ruffianly Tories who filled the royal camp. To add to their sufferings, they were separated; and when, soon afterward, the small-pox broke out among the prisoners, they were tortured with apprehensions of each other's fate, without hope of relief by information. Without physicians, nurses, or friends, the prisoners suffered dreadfully, and perished by dozens; and when, in April, 1781, the army of General Greene appeared upon the summit of Hobkirk's Hill, a mile distant, and invited Lord Rawdon forth to battle, less than fifty patriots remained in their loathsome prison at Camden.

The prisoners heard of the presence of Greene; and Andrew Jackson, by persevering labor with an old razor, made a hole in the board side of the inclosure, and saw with gladness the glittering arms of his countrymen. But his joy gave place to trembling when he heard the heavy tread of the British troops, marching stealthily from Camden to fall upon Greene, while it was evident that the latter had no suspicions of the movement. Oh, how eagerly he watched the Americans carelessly cleaning their arms, washing their clothing, or reclining at ease, while he knew the foe, secret and fierce as a tiger, would soon spring upon them! Then he saw the conflict of the pickets on the eastern ment proper for prisoners of war. The cowardly ruffian could not appreciate the manly spirit of the boy, but in fierce anger he drew his sword, and aimed a murderous blow at the lad's head. It was parried by Andrew's left arm, but he received a wound in the hand, whose scar he bore to his coffin sixty-four years afterward. Robert was then ordered to perform the menial service. He as promptly refused, when Coffin gave him a severe sword-cut upon his head, from the effect of which he never recovered.

With twenty other prisoners, Andrew and his brother were placed on captured horses, and compelled to travel to Lord Rawdon's camp at Camden, forty miles distant, without food or drink. Their brutal guard would not allow them slope, the hurried preparation for action, and the confusion of the patriot troops. With fluttering heart and broken accents he reported every movement to the eager-listening prisoners; and when, at length, he shouted, "Colonel Washington has swept the field, and Rawdon is retreating!" his half-famished companions cried, "Victory and deliverance!" Alas! victory did not remain with the Americans, and deliverance was deferred for a season. Greene was defeated, and the unhappy prisoners saw no star of hope amidst the clouds of the future.

But an angel of deliverance soon appeared. The mother of the Jacksons, impelled by a parent's love, hastened to Camden to plead for the release of her sons. By an exchange of prisoners they were delivered to her; but they were mere shadows of those blooming boys who had left her embrace a few weeks before. The wound on Robert's head, untouched by nurse or surgeon, was a fearful sight for a mother's eye; and both of them were emaciated by privations and the ravages of disease. With five released neighbors, the widow and her sons started for their distant home. There were but two horses for the whole company. Mrs. Jackson rode one, without saddle or bridle, and the sick and wounded Robert was placed on the other. Too weak to sit upright, he was held by his stronger companions; while Andrew, with the small-pox covering his skin, barefooted and half-naked, walked pervade their systems. Robert lived only two days; and for almost a fortnight Andrew was delirious with a raging fever. The mother expected to be childless. But God decreed otherwise; and the germ of the future hero and statesman was mercifully preserved in that hour of peril.

Before Andrew had fully recovered, a voice of wail came up to the Waxhaw settlers from their kindred and friends, who were suffering a thousand horrors in the prison-ships at Charleston. Food, clothing, medicine—all were denied them; and day by day scores were cast into the waters, or were buried in shallow graves on the sandy shore. The sympathies of Mrs. Jackson were aroused; and, with four or five other women, she hastened, on horseback, to Charleston, with such comforts as could be conveniently carried. Unawed by the conquerors of the city, they made their way to the harbor, and deep down in the loathsome kennels of the ships, where disease was rioting and death held high court, these ministering angels breathed words of comfort for the sufferers, and relieved the pressing needs of their friends. Then they departed, sorrowing, for their homes. The deadly fever of the ships seized Mrs. Jackson, and just beyond the lines of defense which the Americans had piled across Charleston Neck, she returned to the bosom of her mother earth, a glorious martyr in the cause of freedom and humanity. Her burial-place is unknown. But she has a monument in the fame of her son more enduring than brass or marble; and while the memory the whole distance—a journey of forty miles, through pine forests and a desolate country. Two hours before they reached home, they were drenched by a heavy rain, which caused the disease to disappear from the skin of the boys and of his deeds remain unfading, the name of ELIZABETH, the mother of Jackson, like that of MARY, the mother of Washington, will be remembered and revered.

Andrew Jackson was now an orphan; and at the close of the Revolution, every member of his family who came from Ireland had perished in the storm. He stood alone, like a stricken but not blasted sapling, over which the tempest had swept only to give more tenacity to its roots, vigor to its branches, and beauty to its foliage. The lightning of British oppression had smitten his young heart fiercely; but it served to awaken therein those latent energies of character which needed only an electric touch to make them leap forth full-armed, living principles, to achieve great things on the battle-field of life.

Mrs. Jackson had left Andrew in the family of Major Thomas Crawford, when she departed for Charleston, and there he remained for several months after her death. His position was one of great danger in respect to his future career, and he came very near being shipwrecked at the commencement of the voyage of active life. Left master of his own actions, and in the absolute control of some property, at an age when Virtue and Vice, standing at the open door of Manhood, utter their most persuasive strains in willing ears, he had no mentor to direct him, and for twenty months or more he spent his time in idle dissipation with the gay young men of the Carolinas, until his patrimony was nearly all gone except a beautiful mare. Meeting some friends one night at a tavern, he engaged with them in a game with dice called Rattle and Snap. He staked his mare against a considerable sum of money, and won. At that moment his guardian angel inspired him with a sudden resolution to change his course of life. He instantly paid his bill, put the winnings in his pocket, went to the Waxhaw settlement, disposed of the small remainder of his father's estate, and departed for Salisbury, in North Carolina, to study law under Spruce M'Kay, Esq., then one of the most eminent practitioners in that section of the country. The change in his habits was as complete as it was sudden; and during that winter of 1784, when he was between seventeen and eighteen years of age, the foundation of his future eminence was laid.

Jackson completed his law studies under Colonel Stokes, who lost a hand in the cruel massacre of Buford's command on the Waxhaw, and in 1786 received a license to practice law. His energy, talent, and sterling honor and integrity, were fully developed during this brief period, and, without solicitation on his part, and on the voluntary recommendation of several of the most eminent men of North Carolina, Governor Johnston appointed him Solicitor of the Western district of that State, then embracing the present territory of Tennessee. It was "the dark and bloody ground" beyond the mountains, whither civilization was cautiously creeping into the wild domains of the savage. Amidst its excitements and perils the future hero, then only twenty-one years of age, found ample stimulus for his courage and daring. Population was sparse, rude, and independent, and war-parties of Indians yet hung ominously around the stations of the remote settlers.

Jackson crossed the mountains in the spring of 1788, in company with John M'Nairy, who had been appointed Judge of the district. Jonesborough was then the principal seat of justice in that region, and there Jackson remained until autumn, when he and Judge M'Nairy crossed the vast wilderness to the site of the present Nashville, then only one of those Stations* on the Cumberland river, into which the settlers gathered for mutual defense against the bloody Shawnees of the north, and the fiery Choctaws and Cherokees of the south. Between these two principal settlements, separated by a dark wilderness of two hundred miles, Jackson made twenty-two journeys in the performance of his public duties. Sometimes he was entirely alone; at others, two or three companions accompanied him, and on all occasions he was hourly exposed to the arrow and hatchet of the skulking Indian. His portmanteau was at once his wardrobe and his larder on his journey, and his pillow among the forest leaves at night. He was not only his own defender, but he was often found with others, in the character of an escort for parties of emigrants making their fearful way through the wilderness. He was also engaged in several expeditions against the Indians, previous to 1794, and his skill and bravery so excited the awe and admiration of the savages, that they gave him the significant names of Sharp Knife and Pointed Arrow. The pages of romance, painted in highest colors, have few pictures of more thrilling interest than the forest life of Jackson presented during the first years of his residence in Tennessee. They were years of severest discipline for those achievements in after-life, when, at the head of his country's soldiers, he met whole bands of these wily foes in their own rocky fastnesses or tangled morasses.

Early in 1790 Jackson made Nashville his residence; and in the family of Mrs. Donelson, widow of Colonel Donelson, an emigrant from Virginia, he found an agreeable home. He also found immediate and ample employment in his profession. Nashville was then the chief trading station in the territory, and in that vicinity a great number of young adventurers, having nothing to lose and every thing to gain, had congregated. Relieved from the restraints of law and moral teachings, they lived prodigally, became heavily involved in debt to the merchants, and having secured the exclusive services of the only lawyer in that region before Jackson's arrival, they laughed at the futile efforts of their creditors to enforce payment. A sudden reverse awaited them. The merchants placed their claims in the hands of Jackson for prosecution, and on the morning after his arrival in Nashville he issued seventy writs against the delinquents. Alarmed and irritated, they resolved to drive him from the country, either by violence or the force of personal annoyances, by embroiling him with strong bullies, who were ever eager for fight. They misjudged the character of the man. He did not waver a line in the path of moral and professional duty; and his fidelity to truth and justice were rewarded by a lucrative practice, and the office of Attorney General of the district.

While Jackson seemed proof against the arrows of savages, and faltered not in the presence of desperate men, love and beauty made him a victim and a captive. Mrs. Donelson's lovely daughter, then in the bloom of young womanhood, and the wife of a man utterly unworthy of the affection and esteem of a true woman, was sheltered from the cruel treatment of her husband under her mother's roof when Jackson became an inmate in the family. Her beauty and accomplishments excited the admiration of all. Aware of his own inferiority, and consequently made jealous and irritable by the homage paid to his wife, the husband embittered her daily life by those petty persecutions which only a small mind, controlled by jealousy, can conceive, and she left him. Dreading his threatened presence at Nashville, she left there in the spring of 1791, and, with the family of a friend, went down the river to be a dweller at Natchez, on the Mississippi, many leagues deeper in the wilderness. Jackson was invited to accompany them as a protector against the Indians, and he gladly complied. On his return he was informed that the jealous husband had successfully applied to the Virginia Legislature for a divorce. Regarding the lady as legally free to form a new matrimonial connection, he allowed the buds of involuntary admiration, heretofore repressed by honorable prudence, to expand into the full blossom of affection. About midsummer he went to Natchez with the jubilee message to the widowed wife, declared his own love for her, and became an accepted suitor. They were married in autumn, and throughout the Cumberland region their union was joyfully greeted as that of Worth and Virtue.

But a cloud overshadowed the clear sky of their connubial happiness. The intelligence respecting a divorce was only partially true. Separated by a dark wilderness filled with hostile bands, communication between Virginia and the settlements beyond the mountains were infrequent. There were no newspapers to proclaim the acts of public bodies; and, except officially, much of the information brought from the east was vague and unreliable. The husband had only applied to the Virginia Legislature for leave to prosecute a suit for divorce in a court in Kentucky, his place of residence when his wife left him. The sequel was propitious—the divorce was obtained. Jackson procured another license, and in 1794, they were again married. Because of this transaction, calumny attempted to sully his honor with its slime, but signally failed. Truth, uttered by the lips even of his enemies, pronounced its verdict in favor of his integrity and virtue. Pity and gallantry had first opened the way for love to the young hero's heart, and mutual affection, purity of purpose, and legal consent, sanctioned the marriage.

Jackson's legal warfare upon the prodigal debtors of the Nashville region, and his fearless exposure of enormous land-frauds, perpetrated upon the settlers by influential men in North Carolina, created a host of bitter enemies; and he was frequently compelled, while in attendance at court, to defend himself against the personal attacks of desperate men. In these affrays he was always victorious. He was strong in muscle, and expert in limb; and it is said that his eye, when he was excited, possessed a fascination seldom known. Before its glance the stoutest bullies would quail and flee. These physical qualities endeared him to the rough backwoodsmen of Tennessee, and his fearless performance of duty as Attorney General won for him the unbounded confidence and esteem of all but the vicious few. And when, in 1795, the people of the Territory called a Convention to frame a constitution, preparatory to the admission of Tennessee into the Union, as a State, Jackson was spontaneously elected to a seat therein. The instrument then formed bears the impress of his vigorous democratic principles, which always laid at the root of his sturdy patriotism; and the people expressed their verdict of satisfaction the following year, when, without offering himself as a candidate, he was elected the first representative of the new State, in the Federal Congress. He took his seat in the National Council on the 5th of December, 1796; and within eight weeks afterward, the Legislature of Tennessee elected him its representative in the United States Senate. He had just passed the age of thirty years, when, in November, 1797, he took his seat in that august body, then presided over by Thomas Jefferson.

Jackson appears to have been unambitious of political distinction. He was eminently a man of action, and not merely of words. He uttered no speeches in the Senate, but was always active in public duties. Thoroughly imbued with a reverence for popular sovereignty, he bent his energies, at home and in the Senate, to the accomplishment of that political revolution in favor of the people which Jefferson commenced during Washington's administration. He resigned his senatorial seat at the close of the first session after his election, and went back to Tennessee an acknowledged democratic leader. There new honors awaited him at the hands of the Legislature. Though young in years, he was regarded as a patriarch in the infant State; and he was elevated to the bench of the Supreme Court. His opinions were law for a great majority of the people, for they recognized him as a sound and prudent leader in public affairs. Under his guidance the State of Tennessee gave its first presidential vote for Jefferson, in 1796, and emphatically repeated it in 1800, when the democratic party triumphed.

Many instances of his personal courage and daring are related. We will mention only two events, as illustrations, which occurred while he was Judge. At Jonesborough, a desperate man of giant frame had been indicted for the crime of cutting off the ear of his infant, while in a state of drunkenness. The sheriff informed Judge Jackson that the brute was in the courthouse yard, armed with a dirk and two pistols, and that he refused to be arrested. "He must be taken," said the Judge; "summon the people to your aid." The sheriff cunningly waited until the Court adjourned for dinner, when he summoned the judges as a part of the posse comitatus. "I will attend," promptly responded Jackson, "and see that you do your duty." Then taking a loaded pistol, he said to the sheriff, "Advance and secure the miscreant." The criminal's eyes flashed with anger and desperate resolution. Seeing the sheriff hesitate, Judge Jackson advanced, and fixing his keen gaze upon the felon, he bade him surrender instantly. The lip of the strong man quivered: the weapons fell from his hand, and he stammered out, "I will surrender to you, Sir, but to no one else." The people were astonished at the triumph; and from that time no one pretended to dispute the authority of Judge Jackson.

On another occasion, his personal courage almost instantly dispersed a mob collected for the purpose of abusing him. By more exposures of stupendous land-frauds he had exasperated many people in the vicinity of Jonesborough, and a regiment, under a militia colonel, collected there on the morning of the first day of Court, to punish the Judge. Jackson had been so sick on his journey that he was compelled to retire to his bed, on his arrival. A few moments afterward, a gentleman came in great haste to inform him that a mob was in front of the house, prepared to tar and feather him. He begged Jackson to bar his door immediately and avoid the indignity. The Judge immediately arose, threw his door wide open, and said, "Give my compliments to Colonel H., and tell him my door is open to receive him and his regiment whenever they choose to call upon me; and that I hope the Colonel will have the chivalry to lead his men, not to follow them." Abashed at this bold message, and filled with admiration of the manly courage of an unarmed invalid, the mob instantly dispersed, and the leader, making an humble apology, remained the unwavering friend of Jackson ever afterward. These, and similar events, made a deep impression on the people of the whole country west of the mountains; and Andrew Jackson became the most popular man in the Mississippi Valley.

In 1802 Jackson was commissioned a Major-General of the Tennessee militia, and the following year the Federal government called him to exercise the functions of his office. Louisiana, lately a province of Spain, ceded to France, had been purchased of the latter by the United States. There was a general apprehension that the Spanish inhabitants of the territory would not quietly submit to the authority of the new government, and it was thought prudent to concentrate troops on the southwestern territory, prepared to march against New Orleans, if necessary. General Jackson was required to furnish boats, for the purpose of transporting the troops and supplies by water; and so thoroughly and promptly was his commission executed, that it called forth the applause of government. His military genius, as an executive officer, then developed, was not forgotten when events of more gravity demanded his services. The threatening cloud passed away, and the people of Louisiana quietly passed from under the dominion of old Spain and France to that of the United States.

Never was party spirit more rancorous and vengeful, than during the first administration of President Jefferson. It produced discord and promoted hatred in neighborhoods and families; and in the newly-settled States of the West, where society was then in its transition condition from rudeness to refinement, it led to personal combats as the climax of arguments. Public men were frequently embroiled in scenes of violence and bloodshed, without losing (but rather enhancing) their dignity in the estimation of popular opinion. General Jackson was not exempted from the penalties of this social condition; and in the summer of 1803, he was engaged in an affair that would be shocking now to the more refined people of Tennessee. His manly expression of opinion on all occasions, and his fearless exposition and punishment of fraud in high places, gave him many political and personal enemies. His early friend, Judge McNairy, became alienated; and Jackson quarreled with Governor Sevier, in the presence of a multitude. Goaded by the governor's insults and defiant taunts of cowardice, Jackson challenged him to single combat. After some delays they met near Knoxville. Sevier was accompanied by several gentlemen; Jackson by a single friend. All were mounted. The beligerents had each a brace of pistols. Sevier carried a sword; Jackson a heavy hickory cane. As they slowly approached each other on the road, Jackson suddenly poised his cane as a knight of the tournament would his lance, and rising in his stirrups, he spurred his horse, rushed furiously forward, and charged his antagonist. Sevier, astounded at the movement, leaped from his horse to avoid the shock, trod upon his own sword-scabard, and fell to the ground. The gentlemen present prevented further mischief, and the matter afterward assumed the form of a paper war between the friends of the parties. The fact that Jackson's popularity was greatly increased by this event, fully illustrates the character of public feeling in the West at that time.

Increasing ill-health, and a weariness of the turmoils and exposures of his public life, induced Judge Jackson to resign his office, in the summer of 1804. He purchased a plantation in the vicinity of the Cumberland, near Nashville, and not far from where the famous Hermitage of his old age now stands, and there, with an affectionate wife and a competent fortune, he sought long-coveted repose. His military duties required but little service, and his time was spent in the varied cares and pleasures of his farm, or in the company of kindred spirits who came from all parts of the great valley to enjoy his society and his hospitality. Breeding fine horses was his special delight, and to exhibit their qualities he often appeared both as a competitor and better upon the race-courses of Tennessee and Kentucky. Out of these sports grew an affair, the remembrance of which always gave him sorrow. A dispute arose between him and Charles Dickenson, a slave-trader and horse-jockey, concerning a bet. Blows ensued, and Dickenson published Jackson as a coward. The latter, governed by that false notion of honor which, happily, is now almost obsolete, challenged Dickenson to single combat. They met, and at the moment when Dickenson's ball shattered two of Jackson's ribs, the latter, not in the least unnerved, fired a deadly bullet, and his antagonist fell, a dying man. When the strength of his nerves was alluded to afterward, Jackson said, "I should have killed him, had he shot me through the brain." Dickenson lived but a few hours, and Jackson rode twenty miles toward home before his attendants perceived, by the saturation of his clothes with blood, that he was wounded. This is one of the dark clouds which gather over the memory of the hero, fringed though it be with the sunlight of conventional law which imposed the seeming necessity of thus vindicating assaulted honor. From the stand-point of observation in the light of to-day, the cloud appears black, without a gleam of palliation.

On a beautiful morning in June, 1805, General Jackson mounted one of his finest geldings, and, accompanied by a servant leading a milk-white mare, rode to Nashville. The little town was all agog. Flags were flying, drums beating, cannon thundering, and the people of all classes crowded to the port. Presently, a small man, pleasant in features, with sharp, intelligent black eyes, remarkable for the neatness of his apparel, and fluent in speech, was received by the populace with loud huzzas. Then he harangued the people, and was answered with shouts. A sumptuous dinner was spread in his honor; and toward evening he mounted the milk-white mare which Jackson's servant had led, and the two distinguished men rode quietly to the plain mansion of a planter, a few miles from the scene of public homage. The stranger was the accomplished AARON BURR, then engaged in the initial preparations for the execution of a magnificent scheme of conquest. Jackson received him cordially into the bosom of his family and of his own confidence; and Burr wrote in his journal, concerning his host: "Once a lawyer, afterward a judge, now a planter; a man of intelligence; and one of those prompt, frank, ardent souls, whom I love to meet." The generous Miranda was then bearing the standard of revolt and liberation in South America, and possessed the sympathies of the people and government of the United States. Spain had not cheerfully acquiesced in the transfer of Louisiana, and the Spanish population of that territory were averse to the rule of the American government. War with Spain appeared inevitable, and Burr made the crisis an opportunity for executing a long cherished scheme—the invasion of Mexico, its disenthralment from the Spanish yoke, and the establishment of an independent republic in that beautiful region of the New World. Wilkinson, then commander-in-chief of the Western division of the army of the United States, and many distinguished men in the West, were associated with Burr in the scheme; and now, as with eloquent and persuasive tongue, that wily politician described the benevolence of his design—its importance to the growth of republicanism, and to the stability of the United States—the honest, patriot heart of Jackson beat with quicker pulsations, and he proffered the services of his influence and sword to Colonel Burr.

In the autumn of 1806 Burr was again in Kentucky and Tennessee; and still regarding his scheme as feasible and proper, Jackson renewed his promises of co-operation. But the whole gorgeous vision vanished as suddenly as frost-work in the sunbeam. Political animosity sent whispers of suspicion over the mountains. Burr was accused of a design to detach the Western States, and form a separate republic, with himself as President. Wilkinson, who had sold his honor to the Spaniards, partially deserted his compeer, and other associates were frightened by the bugbear. The mind of Jackson was filled with suspicions, and he laid the whole matter before Governor Claiborne, at New Orleans. He also wrote to Burr, informed him of current rumors, and frankly assured him that if his intentions were in the least degree hostile to the United States, he wished no further correspondence with him. He as frankly assured him that if the conquest of Mexico was still the great object of his plans, he was as ready as ever to accompany him with his military division. A few weeks rolled away, and Burr was arrested on a charge of treason. He was tried and acquitted, but the whole fabric of his ambitious scheme was scattered to the winds. His murder of Hamilton, in a duel, and the name of traitor, which adhered to him notwithstanding his acquittal, pressed upon him with crushing weight during the remainder of his life. Yet he always loved and admired Jackson, even with the knowledge that the General was active in procuring his arrest, for he knew him to be honest and patriotic. When, in 1812, war was declared against Great Britain, Burr spoke of Jackson as the greatest military man in America, and best fitted to be the commander-in-chief of the armies of the Republic; and as early as 1815, he recommended his nomination for the Presidency.

For five years after Burr's trial Jackson enjoyed the pleasures of private life. Yet they were not years of idleness, nor void of excitement. His personal courage was often tested; and on one occasion his perfect manhood was remarkably developed. On his way to Natchez, to bring some negroes to his plantation, he found some emigrants detained by the Indian agent for the Choctaw tribe, under the plea that a passport must be had before they could proceed. One of their number had been sent back to procure it, and the others were working for the agent at low wages, and buying corn of him at extravagant prices. Jackson indignantly rebuked the extortioner, who, in turn, demanded a passport from the General. "I am a free-born American citizen," he said, "and that is passport sufficient on any highway where my business calls me." He then told the emigrants to follow him, and if any man molested them, to shoot him down as a highway robber. They departed without hinderance. The enraged agent resolved to stop Jackson on his return, and for that purpose had collected about one hundred and fifty white men and Indians, when the General with his troop of slaves approached the station. Jackson had armed himself with three pistols and a rifle, and his negroes with clubs and axes; and they were instructed to cut down any man who should molest them. When the agent stepped forward to demand his passport, Jackson grasped his rifle, and fixing his keen eyes on him, said, "Whoever attempts to prevent my passing shall lay low." The abashed agent withdrew, and the Indians, many of whom knew and admired the General, would sooner have scalped the avaricious official than touched a hair of the head of The Sharp Knife. The agent was soon afterward dismissed from office.

The period had now arrived when the military genius of Jackson was to be fully developed, and his country to become greatly indebted to his skill and valor for its own honor and glory. For several years France and England had been playing a desperate game of chess with the world's commerce, while dealing falcion-blows upon each other's political power, unmindful of the rights and interests of other nations. Their legalized pirates were upon every sea; and with sublime impudence the British government assumed the right—and its servants practiced the felony—of boarding American vessels, under pretense of seizing its own deserters, but to impress our seamen into the English naval service. Such indignities were endured under protests, menaces, and embargoes, until more than seven thousand American citizens had become victims to British might and injustice. And it was not until British emissaries had excited the Indian tribes to hostilities against the settlers on our northwestern frontiers, and British newspapers had declared that the Americans could not be "kicked into a war," that the pride and martial spirit of the nation became fairly aroused, and trampled peace maxims in the dust.

In June, 1812, the American Congress declared war against Great Britain. When the President's manifesto announced the fact in the Mississippi Valley, it touched a chord responsive to the call in every heart. The greatest enthusiasm every where prevailed; and when General Jackson sent forth an appeal, twenty-five hundred men of his division volunteered to follow him to whatever field of duty their country might call them. The Secretary of War asked for only fifteen hundred infantry and riflemen. After organizing a body of cavalry under Colonel Coffee, Jackson ordered that number to assemble at Nashville, early in December. An excess of more than five hundred appeared. Unwilling to restrain the ardor of any, Jackson accepted the whole; and on the 4th of January, 1813, he wrote to the Secretary of War, "I have the pleasure to inform you that I am now at the head of two thousand and seventy volunteers, the choicest of our citizens, who go at the call of their country to execute the will of the government, who have no constitutional scruples, and, if the government orders, will rejoice at the opportunity of placing the American eagle on the ramparts of Mobile, Pensacola, and Fort Augustine, effectually banishing from the southern coast all British influence." Jackson was then forty-five years of age—two years older than Washington when he took command of the Continental Army.

Jackson's manhood and patriotism now endured a severe trial. Through storms and tempests, in mid-winter, his little army went down the Cumberland, Ohio, and Mississippi rivers, to Natchez—a perilous voyage of a thousand miles—to join General Wilkinson at New Orleans. That weak officer, jealous of Jackson's popularity, ordered the latter to halt at Natchez. In that vicinity he formed a camp, but was soon impatient of inaction. Early in February a courier arrived with a dispatch from the Secretary of War. The General received it with joy, for he believed it to be an order to march to Canada, to wipe out the stain of Hull's surrender, or to some other field of usefulness. He read—"The causes for embodying and marching to New Orleans the corps under your command having ceased to exist, you will, on the receipt of this letter, consider it as dismissed from the public service, and take measures to have delivered over to Major-General Wilkinson all articles of public property which may have been put into its possession. You will accept, for yourself and your corps, the thanks of the President of the United States." This was the whole of it—the beginning and the end of Armstrong's cold, unfeeling dispatch. It fell upon the hopes of Jackson and his ardent corps like ice upon the opening bud. The shock was momentary. His indignation was fiercely kindled, and it warmed all the energies of his generous nature into full action. Around him stood two thousand noble sons of Tennessee—the flower of its population—eager to be useful. Many of them were tender youths, committed to his care by loving parents. He had publicly pledged himself to be a father to them all, and the word of Andrew Jackson was always equivalent to his written bond. Could he disband them five hundred miles from their homes, to be exposed to fearful moral and physical perils? Could he listen for a moment to the selfish suggestions of Wilkinson, to "recruit them into the regular service," and thus ruin them for life? No! governed by a higher law than the martial, he instantly resolved to disobey orders, and, instead of disbanding his troops, to march them back to Tennessee. Before the evening of the day of his disappointment he commenced his preparation, and then wrote a denunciatory letter to the Secretary of War, and another to the President, complaining of the inhumanity of Armstrong's order.

Jackson's quarter-master refused to furnish other supplies for the return march than such as might be allowed to discharged soldiers. The benevolent General was not to be foiled. He borrowed five thousand dollars, on his own responsibility, from a merchant at Natchez; and when, on the 25th of March, he commenced his journey toward the Tennessee river, and found his conveyances for his sick inadequate, he placed an invalid soldier on his own horse, and traveled almost four hundred miles of the journey on foot. His staff and many of his mounted men followed his example, and one hundred and fifty suffering soldiers were made comparatively comfortable on the way. Not one lacked the sympathy nor wanted the care of the General. Not one was left behind—not even a young man whom the surgeon reported to be dying. "Not a man shall be left who has life in him," said Jackson, when it was proposed to leave him. The insensible youth was lifted into a wagon, and the General watched him with a father's solicitude. At length the young man opened his eyes, and said, "Where am I?" "On your way home, my dear fellow," cheerfully answered his commander. The words quickened the current of life, he rapidly improved, and Jackson had the pleasure of returning him to the arms of his mother. Before the close of May all the volunteers were at their homes, and their General's course was fully sustained by public sentiment. The Secretary of War made a weak attempt at explanation, and the government promptly sanctioned the conduct of Jackson, and assumed the pecuniary responsibilities which he had incurred in the public service. He achieved a victory greater than any where blood flows.

We need not stop to record the general events of the war then begun; they are familiar to our countrymen. Nor will space allow us to detail the brilliant military career of him whose life we are now considering. We can only glance at the salient points with almost the brevity of a chronological record.

General Jackson watched with palpitating heart the ill success of his country's troops on the Canada frontier, and yearned for an opportunity to lead his brave Tennesseans to the field. It was not long delayed, and the arena of action was near his own door. Early in 1812, Tecumseh, the fierce Shawnee, who had confederated the northwestern tribes the year before, went among the Creeks in Alabama, and planted there the fruitful seeds of hostility to the white people. It germinated in the course of a few months, and bore fruit toward the close of the summer of 1813. A party of Creeks, seven hundred strong, well supplied with arms and ammunition by the British at Pensacola, attacked Fort Mimms, on the Alabama river, on the 31st of August. Almost the entire garrison were massacred, and the fort was burnt. The women and children of twenty families perished in the flames; and of three hundred white people, only seventeen escaped. This blow, unexpected, though predicted, spread terror through all the Gulf region; and the entire population of the settlements on the Alabama river abandoned their homes and fled to Mobile. The militia of the neighboring States and Territories were called out, and in addition to fifteen hundred men already required by the Federal government, the Legislature of Tennessee authorized the raising of three thousand five hundred troops. As with one voice, the people and the authorities called General Jackson to the chief command. He immediately accepted the proffered honor, notwithstanding his left arm, shattered by a pistol ball, received in an affray with Colonel Benton, at Nashville, was yet in a very bad condition.

Jackson was in the field early in October, and in chief command of about five thousand troops, including half a thousand cavalry, under the orders of Colonel Coffee. Battalions were already marching from Georgia and Mississippi toward the Creek country, and soon the main body of the nation, not more than four thousand strong, were hemmed in upon the waters of the Coosa, by a cordon of Americans, who were determined to crush out their hostility or their nationality. They accomplished both, yet not without first enduring great sufferings themselves.

Without a week's provision on hand, Jackson led his own division of two thousand men into the heart of the enemy's country. His detachments spread death and desolation in their track. Villages were destroyed, cattle were seized, and the Indian families were scattered like frightened deer. At length the bloody battle of Tallushatchee was fought, and there the tenderest emotions of Jackson's heart were brought into full play. Among the slain was an Indian mother, and upon her bosom lay her infant boy, vainly endeavoring to draw sustenance from the cold breast. The orphan was carried into camp, and fed by the General with sugar and water until a nurse could be procured. Jackson was a childless man, and he adopted the forest orphan as his son. Mrs. Jackson watched over him with a mother's care, and he grew to be a beautiful youth, full of promise. But consumption laid him in the grave among the shades at the Hermitage, before he reached his manhood, and his foster-parents mourned over him with a grief as sincere as that of consanguinity.

BATTLE OF TALLADEGA.

Talladega and its little garrison was now menaced by the Creeks. At the moment when they were about to fall upon the weak post, Jackson's army appeared. The savages were driven from their bush-retreats, and scattered in great confusion. Yet the victory was not very fruitful, for it could not be followed up. Famine, a foe more insatiate than the Indian, was in the camp. When Jackson's troops marched through the forests from Talladega, they had only a day's provision in their knapsacks. Officers and common soldiers suffered alike, and this suffering drew forth another exhibition of Jackson's nobility of character. A private soldier saw his General taking a repast under an oak tree, and immediately advanced and demanded food. "I never turn away the hungry," said Jackson, in a cheerful tone; "I will divide with you such food as I have," and drew from his pocket a handful of acorns. The soldier turned tearfully away, reported the circumstance to his companions, and all resolved to suffer patiently with their General. But hunger contended with their patriotism, and prevailed. Promised reinforcements and supplies were withheld, and mutiny appeared. The militia turned to go back, but the yet faithful volunteers stood in their path. Then the volunteers attempted to leave the camp and go home, but the militia in turn stood across their path. These checks, however, were only temporary, and Jackson perceived that the tenure by which his soldiers were bound to duty was as attenuated as that of the spider's thread. At length almost his entire army, despairing of relief, determined to abandon the expedition, and go home; and some were actually on their retrograde march. He found his whole brigade of volunteers ready to follow. There was no sufficient force to restrain them, so the General relied upon himself alone. With one arm in a sling, he seized a musket, rested it upon his horse's neck, rode to the front of the column, and declared that he would shoot the first man who should take a step in advance. Amazed at his boldness, they gazed at him in silence. At that moment Coffee and two companies of faithful men came up, and the mutineers, after consultation, agreed to return to duty. Discontent was not allayed, however, and Jackson finally allowed all volunteers so disposed to return to their homes, and he organized a force out of other materials. Had he received sufficient supplies after the battle of Talladega, and been met with concert of action by the East Tennessee commanders, he could have ended the war within ten days: it was protracted five months.

Jackson, with his new levies, marched on victoriously to the Hickory Ground—the sacred domain of the Creeks, and the heart of their territory. Before reaching it, several bloody battles were fought. The death-blow to the Creek nation was given at Tahopeka, at the great Horse-shoe Bend of the Tallapoosa river, where a thousand warriors, with their women and children, had congregated in a fortified camp, to give final and decisive battle to the invaders. Jackson attacked them toward the close of March, 1814. Almost six hundred warriors were slain, for they disdained to surrender. They saw no future for their nation in the event of defeat, and they fought with desperation. It was their last effort; their power and spirit were crushed; and upon the Hickory Ground, at the fork of the Coosa and Tallapoosa rivers, their remaining chiefs bowed in submission to the conqueror. Among these was Weatherford, their greatest leader, and principal actor in the butchery at Fort Mimms.

Jackson had ordered his followers to secure Weatherford, and bring him bound to his camp. While sitting alone in his tent, just at sunset, a noble-looking Indian entered, and drawing himself up to his full height, and folding his arms, said, "I am Weatherford, the chief who commanded at Fort Mimms. I have come to ask peace for myself and my people." Jackson expressed astonishment that one so guilty should dare to appear in his presence and ask for peace and protection. "I am in your power," haughtily replied the chief. "Do with me as you please. I am a soldier. I have done the white people all the harm I could. I have fought them, and fought them bravely; if I had an army, I would yet fight and contend to the last; but I have none. My people are all gone. I can now do no more than weep over the misfortunes of my nation." Here was a man after Jackson's own heart. He loved his people, had fought to protect his father-land from the invader, and now fearlessly expressed his patriotism. Jackson immediately informed him that submission and the acceptance of a home beyond the Mississippi for his nation, was the only wise policy for him to pursue; and then remarked, "If, however, you desire to continue the war, and feel prepared to meet the consequences, you may depart in peace, and unite yourself with the war-party if you choose." Weatherford proudly answered, "I may well be addressed in such language now. There was a time when I had a choice, and could have answered you; I have none now—even hope is ended. Once I could animate my warriors to battle; but I can not animate the dead. My warriors can no longer hear my voice. Their bones are at Talladega, Talluschattee, Emuckfaw, and Tahop-eka. I have not surrendered myself thoughtlessly. While there was a chance for success, I never left my post nor supplicated peace. But my people are gone, and I now ask it for my nation and for myself. On the miseries and misfortunes brought upon my country I look back with deepest sorrow, and wish to avert still greater calamities. If I had been left to contend with the Georgia army, I would have raised my corn on one bank of the river and fought them on the other. But your people have destroyed my nation. You are a brave man; I rely upon your generosity. You will exact no terms of a conquered people but such as they should agree to. Whatever they may be, it would now be madness and folly to oppose. If they are opposed, you will find me among the sternest enforcers of obedience. Those who would still hold out can be influenced only by a mean spirit of revenge; and to this they must not, and shall not, sacrifice the last remnant of their country. You have told our nation where we might go and be safe. This is good talk, and they ought to listen to it. They shall listen to it." Thus spoke the noble Weatherford for his nation. Words of honor responded to words of honor; and Weatherford was allowed to go freely to the forest and search for his scattered followers and counsel peace. He did so; the war ended; and a treaty of peace was concluded with the remnant of the Creek chiefs on the 10th of July, 1814.

Jackson had received the commission of Major-General in the regular army in May, and the military of the whole South regarded him as their leader. His vigilance was as sleepless as the war authorities at Washington were stupid. While a handful of British soldiers were burning the Federal Capitol, he was planning a scheme for ending the war at the South by a single effective blow. Florida was then a Spanish province, and, with usual Spanish duplicity, the Governor was allowing British fleets to occupy the harbor of Pensacola, and British officers to distribute arms and ammunition among the Indians on the Florida frontiers, to be used against the United States, while professing friendship for that government. When Jackson was informed of it, he accused Manriquez of bad faith. A spicy correspondence ensued; and Jackson ended it by saying, "In future, I beg you to withhold your insulting charges against my government, for one more inclined to listen to slander than I am; nor consider me any more a diplomatic character unless so proclaimed to you from the mouth of my cannon." The hero was anxious to execute the threat couched in the last clause of his letter; but his government gave him no encouragement. There was no time to lose in parleying, for the safety of the whole South was in jeopardy. Already the decree had gone forth for the invasion of Louisiana by way of New Orleans, although yet unknown to the authorities at Washington. Jackson's sagacity suspected the movement, and he resolved to "take the responsibility" of marching to Pensacola. He made his head-quarters at Mobile, sent his adjutant-general into Tennessee to invite volunteers to his standard, and two thousand cheerfully responded to his call. Before their arrival the Spanish governor had committed another grievous offense. He had permitted the British to fit out an expedition against Fort Bowyer, near Mobile, and on their being repulsed by the Americans, he had given them shelter in the harbor of Pensacola. This act strengthened Jackson's resolution; and, on the 2d of November, he took up his march for Florida at the head of three thousand men, some of them friendly Indians. He appeared before Pensacola on the 6th, and demanded an instant surrender of the town and forts. It was refused; and the next day the Americans fought their way into the town, frightened the Spaniards into submission, drove the British fleet from the harbor, and were preparing to take possession of Fort Baranca, when that fortification blew up with a tremendous explosion. A Briton's hand applied the torch. Two days afterward Jackson abandoned Pensacola, and wrote to the Governor, "The enemy has retreated; the hostile Creeks have fled to the forest; and I now retire from your town, leaving you to occupy your forts and protect the rights of your citizens."

When Jackson returned to Mobile, he found urgent messages awaiting him, with invitations to a new and more glorious field of action. When, in the spring of 1814, the great allied armies of Europe approached Paris in triumph, the Emperors of Russia and Prussia entered that city, and Napoleon retired to Elba, the peace of the Continent seemed secure, and many British troops were withdrawn. Almost twelve thousand of them, chiefly veterans who had served under Wellington in the Peninsula, were borne by a British fleet to the Gulf of Mexico; and toward the close of the year approached the waters near New Orleans. They were commanded by the experienced Sir Edward Pakenham, who felt certain of an easy conquest of that city and of the entire southwest portion of our Republic. It was this imminent danger that caused messengers to speed to Mobile and urge Jackson to hasten to the defense of the apparently doomed city. It was a theatre of duty precisely suited to his desires and his genius, and he promptly obeyed the summons of Governor Claiborne and others. He found the people in a state of great alarm, without an adequate military force to avert the blow. His presence inspired courage, yet the co-operation of the civil authorities was too weak for the emergency. Without hesitation, he took all power into his own hands, declared the city and vicinity under martial law, and then bent all his energies to the task of gathering an army and the preparation of defenses. Before the close of December, he had completed a line of intrenchments a mile in length, from the bank of the Mississippi, four miles below the city, to a dense cypress swamp, and had organized an army of full five thousand men. He had over two thousand Kentuckians, twenty-five hundred Tennesseans, Louisiana militia, Mississippi dragoons, and a brigade of mounted men under General Coffee.

The British fleet entered Lake Borgne, and captured a flotilla of American gun-boats; and on the 22d of December twenty-five hundred British troops landed and took post on the Mississippi, nine miles below New Orleans. On the following evening a strong party of Americans, led by Jackson in person, attacked the invaders, and killed and wounded about four hundred of them, but were repulsed with a loss of more than one hundred of their own number. Jackson then fell back to his intrenchments, which, on two occasions afterward, suffered severe cannonading by the enemy.

GOLD MEDAL PRESENTED TO JACKSON BY CONGRESS.

On the morning of the memorable 8th of January, 1815, General Pakenham advanced toward the American lines, at the head of nine thousand men, leaving a reserve of three thousand at his camp. Jackson had now about six thousand expert marksmen behind his intrenchments, or stationed at the several batteries on his extended line; but not more than three thousand of them were well supplied with arms. All was silence along those breastworks until the British had approached within heavy gunshot of the batteries, when a signal was given, and a terrible cannonade was opened upon them. Undaunted by the havoc made, the veterans steadily advanced until within range of the American rifles, when volley after volley poured a deadly storm of lead upon the invaders. The British line soon began to waver. Then Pakenham fell, mortally wounded, and the entire army fled in dismay. They left seven hundred dead, and more than a thousand wounded, upon the field; while the Americans had only seven killed and six wounded! The enemy retreated to their camp, and then to their shipping, and escaped. Had promised supplies of arms reached Jackson in time, the whole British force might have been captured.

The victory at New Orleans was thorough and complete. It was the crowning act of the second war for Independence; for already Commissioners of the two governments had signed a treaty of peace. The Key City of the southwest was saved in its hour of peril—Pakenham's significant watchword, "Booby and Beauty," became the point for ridicule—and when, twelve days afterward, Jackson entered the town with his victorious army, he was hailed as a LIB-ERATOR. A day was appointed for public thanksgiving; and, as the hero walked to the Cathedral, children in white robes strewed his way with flowers, and sweet voices chanted an ode. Within the sacred fane the Te Deum laudamus was sung, and Bishop Dubourg placed a chaplet of laurel upon the victor's brow. It was an ovation and a crowning equal in significance and dignity to that of a Titus or a Trajan. As soon as horses' hoofs could carry the news, the victory became known throughout the Union, and the name of Jackson was every where mingled with the hosannas of the people. He was the idol of deepest enthusiasm, and public sentiment was ready to apotheosise him. State Legislatures thanked him; and the Federal Congress signified its approval by presenting him with a gold medal. Yet at that very time, when the voice of a powerful nation was lauding his greatness, his home—the dwelling of a wife greatly beloved—was a log-house in the bosom of the forest.

FOREST RESIDENCE.

It stood there in its rude loneliness, an eloquent proclaimer of Andrew Jackson's greatness as a moral hero. His generous hand had aided a young relative of his wife in a mercantile adventure, which proved disastrous. To meet the obligations of the insolvent, Jackson sold the improved part of his estate, with the best buildings in the country upon it, and took up his abode in a rude cabin in the woods, there to begin a new farm, and plant a new home. It was from that humble retreat that he was called to the field, and to it, like Cincinnatus, he returned, when the enemies of his country were driven away.

There were a few in official station who could not appreciate the sturdy patriotism and pure motives of General Jackson. A member of the Louisiana Legislature, whose official dignity had been wounded by the proclamation and maintenance of martial law, attempted to injure him by a newspaper publication. Jackson ordered his arrest, when another tender official, occupying the seat of justice, granted a writ of habeas corpus. Jackson not only refused obedience to its mandates, but arrested the Judge and sent him out of the city. Three days afterward, official intelligence of peace arrived, and the civil authorities resumed their suspended functions. Jackson was immediately arrested for contempt of court. He was defended by able counsel; but as his conviction had been determined on before the trial, their efforts were vain, and the hero was cited to appear for sentence. He entered the crowded court-room in citizen's dress, and was not recognized until he had almost reached the bar, when he was greeted with huzzas from a thousand tongues. The Judge was alarmed, and would not proceed.

JACKSON'S TRIUMPH AT NEW ORLEANS.

Jackson stepped upon a bench, procured silence, and turning to the trembling Judge, said, "There is no danger here—there shall be none. The same hand that protected this city from outrage against the invaders of the country, will shield and protect this court, or perish in the effort. Proceed with your sentence." With quivering lips the Judge pronounced him guilty of contempt, and fined him a thousand dollars. These words were scarcely uttered when the courtroom resounded with huzzas and hisses. The people bore Jackson upon their shoulders to the street, and the immense crowd without sent up a shout such as went over the land thirteen years later—"Hurrah for Jackson!" Just then a carriage was passing in which a lady was riding. She was politely taken from it, and, in spite of his remonstrances, the General was put in her place, the horses were removed, and the people dragged the vehicle to the Coffee-House, into which the hero was borne. In the mean while a thousand dollars had been collected by voluntary subscriptions, and placed to his credit in a bank, with which to pay the fine. Jackson delicately refused it, begged the friends who had raised it to apply it to the aid of those whose relatives had fallen in the battle, and then drew his own check for the amount. In all these transactions we see the manifestations of a comprehensive mind and noble nature, and perceive a solution of the problem of his great popularity.

Jackson was appointed commander-in-chief of the Southern division of the United States, in April, 1815. Very little active military service was required of him until 1818, when he was called to suppress Indian hostilities, a host upon the same theatre of operations which he occupied four years before. The yet powerful Seminoles of Florida, joined by Creeks discontented with the treaty at the Hickory Ground, and a large number of runaway negroes, commenced depredations on the frontiers of Georgia and Alabama, toward the close of 1817. General Gaines was sent to suppress these outrages, and to remove every Indian from the territory which the Creeks had ceded to the United States. His presence aroused the fiercest ire of the savages, who, it was ascertained, were incited to hostilities by British subjects, protected by the Spanish authorities of Florida. Gaines was placed in a perilous position, and early in December Jackson hastened to his relief, with a thousand mounted Tennessee volunteers. He again assumed the responsibility of invading Spanish territory to punish Spanish officials for harboring the enemies of his country. He entered Florida early, the following March. In April he took possession of St. Marks, and sent the Spanish officials to Pensacola. He also secured there the persons of Alexander Arbuthnot (a Scotch trader) and Robert C. Ambrister (a young Englishman, and lieutenant of marines), who, on being tried by a court-martial, were found guilty of being the chief emissaries among the Southern Indians, exciting their hostility to the United States. Jackson hung them both, marched forward and captured Pensacola and Fort Barancas, and sent the Spanish authorities and troops to Havana. These energetic proceedings, and the prestige of Jackson's name, terminated the war, and much bloodshed was prevented. He was greatly censured, however, by some for this unauthorized invasion of the territory of a friendly power, and his summary proceedings there. But public opinion nobly sustained him; and, after a searching investigation by a Committee, in 1819, the Federal Congress justified his conduct. He was at Washington during that investigation; and when it had terminated, he visited Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and other portions of the Middle and Eastern States, and was every where received with the greatest enthusiasm. Deputations from public bodies waited upon him; and, among other marks of respect offered by the authorities of New York, was the employment of the late John Vanderlyn to paint a full-length portrait of him, to adorn the Governor's Room in the then new City Hall. There the picture still hangs, a faithful representation of the hero at the age of fifty-two years.

Florida was ceded to the United States in 1821, and Jackson was appointed the first governor of the territory which he had twice conquered, and was vested with almost dictatorial powers. He then resigned his military commission, and his martial life ended. A brilliant political career now opened before him, and he entered upon it with zeal. Decision and energy marked every step in this new field. When the Spanish governor of Florida refused to surrender certain important public documents, Jackson ordered his arrest and imprisonment; and in all things he as promptly obeyed the dictates of his conscience and judgment. But that field of duty did not please him. He resigned the office in the course of a few months, and retired to his then beautiful home in Tennessee. Fortune had smiled upon his domestic affairs, and the rude forest cabin had been exchanged for the delightful mansion, in the midst of fertile acres, which he called the Hermitage. His tender attachment to his wife was intensified as years rolled on, and he coveted domestic retirement with all the deep feelings of his impulsive nature. Yet when his country called him to public duty he could not refuse; and when, in 1823, the Tennessee Legislature elected him to a seat in the Senate of the United States, he accepted the office, and entered upon its duties with alacrity. The same Legislature had already nominated him for the office of President of the United States; and President Monroe had unsuccessfully solicited him to become a resident minister of the United States, in the new republic of Mexico.

The Tennessee nomination was heartily responded to throughout the Union. When the time for electing a President arrived, in the autumn of 1824, there were three other candidates in the field besides General Jackson. John Quincy Adams represented the Eastern section of the Union, William H. Crawford the Southern, and Jackson and Clay the Western. All professed democratic tendencies. The old Federal party was buried with the past, and the election in question presented a singular political aspect. It was a test of personal popularity, and that of Jackson greatly preponderated. He received more votes than Clay and Crawford together, but not a majority over all three, consequently the choice of President devolved on the House of Representatives. Adams was chosen, and Jackson's elevation to the chief magistracy was deferred.

Jackson again sought the pleasures of private life in 1825, and during the exciting canvass which resulted in his election to the highest office in the gift of his countrymen he remained in retirement at the Hermitage. There he received, as a guest, the venerable Lafayette, who visited the United States in 1824, and during portions of that and the following year made an extensive tour through the various States of the Union. Levasseur, Lafayette's secretary, has left a pleasant record of the visit at the Hermitage, and thus relates a touching incident which occurred in the mansion after the whole party had visited the garden and other grounds: "On returning to the house, some friends of General Jackson, who probably had not seen him for some time, begged him to show them the arms presented to him in honor of his achievements during the last war with Great Britain. He acceded to their request with great politeness, and placed on a table, a sword, a sabre, and a pair of pistols. The sword was presented to him by Congress; the sabre, I believe, by the army which fought under his command at New Orleans. These two weapons, of American manufacture, were remarkable for their finish, and still more so for the honorable inscriptions with which they were covered. But it was to the pistols that General Jackson wished more particularly to draw our attention. He handed them to General Lafayette, and asked him if he recognized them. The latter, after examining them attentively for a few moments, replied that he fully recollected them as a pair he had presented, in 1778, to his paternal friend, Washington, and that he experienced a real satisfaction in finding them in the hands of one so worthy of possessing them. At these words the face of the General was covered with a modest blush, and his eye sparkled as in a day of victory. 'Yes, I believe myself worthy of them,' he exclaimed, in pressing the pistols and Lafayette's hands to his breast; 'if not from what I have done, at least for what I have wished to do, for my country.' All the by-standers applauded this noble confidence in the patriot hero, and were convinced that the weapons of Washington could not be in better hands than those of Jackson."

In the autumn of 1828 General Jackson was chosen President of the United States. Never, since the election of Mr. Jefferson, had party-spirit assumed a form so malignant as during that memorable campaign. Nothing that falsehood could invent was left unsaid, and even the virtues of the two candidates were ridiculed as foibles, or sneered at as hypocrisy. And when calumny had coiled all its loathsome folds around the hero, to crush out his manhood and destroy his political life, it spread its vile slime over the purity of his exemplary companion, who, as a

LAFAYETTE AT THE HERMITAGE.

Christian and a wife, was as chaste and unsullied as falling snow. Yet the patriot stood erect in the midst of all assaults; and his conscious rectitude felt nobly sustained and strengthened, when the voices of an overwhelming majority of his countrymen proclaimed him the man of their choice to fill the seat of Washington.

At the moment of the Patriot's triumph, and while cannon were thundering, bonfires were blazing, orators were declaiming, and multitudes were shouting all over the land in his honor, a crushing calamity was poised over his head. It fell within a week after he was certified of his election. Death came to the Hermitage and snatched his wife from his bosom. No greater blow could have smitten that noble nature, for his affection for his wife partook of the holiness of devotion. It crushed his spirit at the moment when its greatest energies were needed, and he ascended to the seat of highest national honor, amidst the joyous acclamations of the people, a sad—a very sad man. The bereavement chastened the purest feelings of his nature. The memory of his wife became a hallowed sentiment; and during the stormy period of his eight years' administration, the spirit of her he so tenderly loved was daily, and almost hourly, before the vision of his mind. He wore her miniature next to his heart, day and night, until the hour of his death; and, like the image of a saint in the closet of a recluse, that picture was always before him in the secret moments of his communion with his God. And these were nightly; for Andrew Jackson was a prayerful Christian long before his lips uttered the confession before men. One of his private secretaries while President, relates that, on one occasion, while Jackson was recreating at Old Point Comfort, he went to his bedroom, after the veteran had retired, to inquire about some letters that were to be sent off early in the morning. The President was undressed, but not in bed. Upon a small table was the miniature of his wife, propped against some books, and before it laid her open Prayer Book, from which the stern man, with the meekness of a little child, had been drawing consolation, like water from a pure well. Through such a medium, at the silent hour of night, her dear spirit beckoned that man of iron onward toward herself and heaven.

Every thing that belonged to his wife was dear to Jackson. The same secretary heard him say to his black coachman one day: "Charles, you know why I value that carriage. This is the second time it has happened, and if ever it occurs again, I will send you back to Tennessee." The coachman had carelessly allowed the horses to run away and break the President's old carriage. It had been brought all the way from Tennessee for his use, and he would ride in no other. Why he valued it was, because it had belonged to his wife! And it was while he was at the head of the government—perhaps when issuing proclamations against French dishonesty, or Nullification folly; or making vigorous war upon the United States Bank, and sturdily refusing to yield a jot to "merchant princes," or a tittle to threatening politicians, if yielding would compromise his duty; while he seemed to be a "roaring lion," or a very unus major in official state, he penned that beautiful epitaph inscribed upon the tomb of his beloved, at the Hermitage:

"Here lie the remains of Mrs. Rachel Jackson, wife of President Jackson, who died on the 23d of December, 1828, aged sixty-one years. Her face was fair, her person pleasing, her temper amiable, and her heart kind. She delighted in relieving the wants of her fellow-creatures, and cultivated that divine pleasure by the most liberal and unpretending methods. To the poor she was a benefactress; to the rich she was an example; to the wretched a comforter; to the prosperous an ornament. Her piety went hand in hand with her benevolence; and she thanked her Creator for being permitted to do good. A being so gentle, and yet so virtuous, slander might wound, but could not dishonor. Even death, when it tore her from the arms of her husband, could but transplant her to the bosom of her God."

When we look back to the administration of President Jackson, and view dispassionately the public events of those eight years, we can not fail to accord to him patriotism of the loftiest stamp, and genius of the highest order. He sat upon the throne of popular sovereignty with the dignity and power of the Czar of the Russias, yet there was not the fibre of a tyrant in him. He controlled vast masses of his countrymen as with a magician's wand, or an autocrat's will, yet the power of his fascination was never exerted in intentional wrong-doing. Self-reliance was the great lesson of his youth, and it became a chief characteristic of his nature. With him, conviction was the signal and warrant for action, and his own judgment was his chief director. In private life he was eminently just, and he would never silently submit to wrong. His public career was but an amplified manifestation of his character as a colossus of moral strength among men. He made the impress of his genius upon every thing which came within the sphere of his influence, and he soon fashioned the political ideas of the nation after the model of his own. "He founded," says an appreciating writer, "a party more perfect in its organization, more lasting in its duration, than any before established, giving its own line of statesmen, and its own course of policy, to the country; a party from which was to rise a stronger influence upon the world, and the indefinite increase of the wealth, territory, and population of the republic, than any yet exerted. He consolidated the strength and energies of the government, made it formidable to, and feared and respected by foreign powers, insomuch that he addressed the head of the second power of Europe with the imperious tone of a rich creditor pursuing a bilking bankrupt, and forced him to the settlement of a claim upon an open threat of chastisement. He found a confederacy, and left an empire."

We have space only to note, historically, the most prominent footprints of Jackson's career as a statesman. His first care was to survey the whole field of subordinate stations under his control, and ascertain where the sickle and the pruning-knife was needed. With the questions, "Is he honest? is he capable?" ever upon his lips, and his eye single to the public good, he commenced the Herculean task of clearing the Augean stable left by his predecessors. Incompetent and dishonest men, whatever might be their party professions, and those whose party bias would make them seek to frustrate his efforts in the direction of reform, to which himself and his political friends were pledged by solemn promise, were removed from office, and their places were filled by those whom he believed to be worthy of the trust. The cry of "Proscription! proscription!" was immediately raised, and yet, of several thousand persons holding office, only six hundred and ninety were removed during his long administration, and these for all causes.

Jackson was a firm supporter of the doctrine of State Rights, in its legitimate operations, but when it assumed an attitude not sanctioned by the Federal Constitution, and destructive to the best interests of the Union, he stood up manfully against its assumption, unmindful of his personal popularity among a large portion of his political friends at the South. The tariff law of 1828 produced great discontent among the people of the cotton-growing States; and when, in the spring of 1832, Congress imposed additional duties upon foreign manufactured cotton goods, these discontents assumed the form of positive rebellion, in South Carolina. A State Convention was held at Charleston in the autumn, and it declared the tariff laws unconstitutional, and therefore null and void. It also resolved that duties should not be paid; and proclaimed that any attempt to enforce the collection of duties in the port of Charleston by the General Government, would be resisted by arms, and would produce the withdrawal of South Carolina from the Union. To support this determination military preparations were made, and civil war appeared inevitable. All eyes were now turned toward the President, who had just been re-elected to the chief magistracy of the nation by an increased majority. Upon him depended the issue of peace or war. He did not hesitate for a moment, and within twelve days after the close of that "nullification" Convention, he issued a proclamation which denied the right of a State to nullify any act of the Federal Government, and warned those who were engaged in fomenting rebellion, that the laws of the United States would be strictly enforced by military power, if necessary. This proclamation met the hearty response of every friend of the Union, of whatever party, and the nullifiers, though led by such men as Calhoun and Hayne, were obliged to yield for the moment. Then Henry Clay, the eminent peace-maker, came forward with his compromise measure, and the cloud of trouble soon disappeared.

The United States Bank, first chartered in 1791, and rechartered in 1816, for twenty years was the custodian of the public funds of the United States, and the centre of the constantly expanding circulation of paper currency, which Jackson always regarded as an unsound stimulus to trade, promoter of speculation and extravagant habits, and dangerous to the well-being of society. He regarded the Bank as a huge moneyed monopoly, capable of producing a vast amount of mischief, and the depository of a latent power for corruption of tremendous force, which, if awakened, might endanger the State. True to his convictions, like a faithful sentinel he raised the cry of warning in his first annual message to Congress, and the stock of the Bank depreciated six per cent. He took strong ground against the renewal of its charter, which would expire in 1836, and contended that the creation of such an institution by Congress was unconstitutional. Notwithstanding there was a majority of his political friends in both houses of Congress, the views of the President were not sustained; and when, at the close of 1831, the proper officers of the Bank applied for a renewal of the charter, Congress, after long debates, granted the prayer of the petitioners. The bill was handed to Jackson for his signature in July following, when he immediately vetoed it. It failed to receive the constitutional support in the national legislature, and the Bank charter expired, by limitation, in 1836. The commercial community, regarding a national bank as essential to their prosperity, were alarmed; and prophecies of panics and business revolutions, every where uttered, helped to accomplish their own speedy fulfillment.

He had been informed that it was using large sums of money for political purposes, and conceiving the public funds unsafe in its keeping, Jackson recommended their removal, or rather he recommended the cessation of deposits of Government funds in that institution. Congress, by a decided vote, refused to authorize the measure. Jackson, believing himself to be right, was determined not to be foiled, and with the courage of an honest, self-reliant man, he resolved to take the whole responsibility of the measure upon his own shoulders, if necessary. He called a Cabinet Council on the 10th of September, 1833. Only a fraction were heartily concurrent in his views. He resolved to act alone, and ordered Mr. Duane, his Secretary of the Treasury, to remove the public funds from the Bank, and deposit them in certain State Banks. The Secretary refused either to obey or resign his office. The President immediately removed him, and appointed Mr. Taney (now Chief Justice of the United States), a friend of the measure, to fill his place. The work of removal was accomplished within a month afterward. An intense panic ensued, and the result was sudden and wide-spread commercial distress. The business of the country was plunged from the height of prosperity to the depths of adversity, because its intimate connection with the National Bank rendered any paralysis of the operations of that institution fatal to commercial activity. This fact confirmed the President in his opinion of the danger to be apprehended from such an enormous moneyed institution; and the sixty millions of dollars then on loan by "the monster," were so many arguments in the President's mind in favor of his position.

Intense excitement prevailed throughout the land. The President was held responsible by the opposition for all the business derangements, and was unsparingly denounced as a tyrant and usurper. Strong in the integrity of his purpose, and supported by the House of Representatives, he stood unmoved amidst the fierce tempest. Deputations of merchants, mechanics, traders, and others, from the principal cities, waited upon him with petitions, and implored him to restore the Government funds to the great Bank, or suggest some other mode of relief. The patriot was inflexible. He received all courteously; but instead of yielding, he recommended prudence, industry, economy, and cash transactions in business. He charged their troubles upon banks, and told them plainly, that "those who trade on borrowed capital ought to break." The State deposit banks soon loaned freely, confidence was gradually restored, and apparent prosperity returned. Twenty years have since elapsed; and to-day very few persons will honestly deny the great wisdom and forecast of President Jackson, evinced by the measure we have just considered, or assert the necessity of such an institution in the sound business operations of the country.

It was during the business depression of the winter of 1834 that an attempt was made to assassinate President Jackson, by a young house-painter, who was out of employment, and had others dependent upon his earnings for support. His mind, morbidly inclined to melancholy, was influenced by the belief that Jackson was the sole cause of all the trouble, and that he alone stood in the way of general prosperity. The young man furnished himself with two well-loaded pistols, and as the President and others came out upon the eastern portico of the Capitol, in a funeral procession, he leveled one of them at the breast of Jackson. The percussion-cap exploded, but did not ignite the powder. The assassin dropped the unfaithful weapon, and instantly presented the other, with the same result. Unawed by the danger, the President rushed upon the culprit with his uplifted cane, and he was soon secured. The failure of the pistols was remarked as a special interposition of a kind Providence. They were fired without difficulty at the next trial, and each sent its bullet through an inch board at the distance of thirty feet.

A few months before this occurrence, the President was attacked by a cowardly ruffian, while he was on his way to Fredericksburg to lay the corner-stone of a monument to be erected in memory of the mother of Washington. While the boat, which bore the President and a large company of distinguished persons down the Potomac, was lying at the wharf at Alexandria, the President retired to the cabin and sat behind the table, next to the berths, quietly smoking and reading, while many friends were standing around in conversation. A lieutenant, recently dismissed from the navy for improper conduct, approached the President, as if to give him a friendly salutation, but instantly struck the venerable man in the face. Before he could repeat the blow, he was seized by the captain of the boat, and severely "punched" in the ribs, with an umbrella, by a clerk in one of the Departments. The President was so confined by the table, that he could not rise at first, nor use his omnipresent cane; and so anxious were all present to ascertain whether Jackson was injured, that the friends of the ruffian were allowed to carry him ashore and effect his escape. "Had I been apprised," said the President, "that Randolph stood before me, I should have been prepared for him, and I could have defended myself. No villain has ever escaped me before; and he would not, had it not been for my confined situation." A few minutes afterward, when a citizen of Alexandria said to the hero, "Sir, if you will pardon me, in case I am tried and convicted, I will kill Randolph for this insult to you, in fifteen minutes;" the President instantly replied, "No, Sir; I can not do that. I want no man to stand between me and my assailant, nor none to take revenge on my account. Had I been prepared for this cowardly villain's approach, I can assure you all, that he would never have the temerity to undertake such a thing again."

While energy and good statesmanship in the management of the domestic affairs of the nation marked the entire administration of President Jackson, and many serious difficulties, such as the rebellious movement in South Carolina, and the hostilities of discontented Indian tribes, were settled by the exercise of rare judgment and discretion, that administration of eight years is more remarkable for the honorable successes of its foreign diplomacy. The President's cardinal maxim in dealing with other governments, was, "Ask nothing but what is right—submit to nothing wrong." This noble principle of action was the key to his success. He made many valuable treaties, and obtained full indemnification for commercial outrages committed during the lapse of a quarter of a century; and so thorough was the respect (and perhaps fear) of foreign nations for the power of the United States, under its energetic executive, that during his continuance in office, not a single outrage was committed upon our commerce.

During the first year of Jackson's administration, a direct trade with the British West India Islands was obtained. This was enjoyed by the American colonies before the Revolution, but was lost by the revolt. Unsuccessful efforts for its recovery had been made by every preceding administration; and Quincey Adams, toward the close of his presidency, had been compelled to proclaim officially that "all direct commerce between the United States and the British West India Islands had ceased." Jackson sent a special minister to England to negotiate for this trade, and, acting upon the maxim above named, it was obtained.

Next, and more important to our national character, was the French Indemnity Treaty. Under the operations of the decrees of Napoleon, from 1806 to 1811, the commerce of the United States had suffered greatly. Redress from the French government had been diligently but vainly sought by every administration; and other governments, liable for similar spoiliations, took shelter behind the refusal of France. Jackson called attention to this subject in his first annual message to Congress; and the United States Minister in Paris was specially instructed to act in the premises. The French government, with its new monarch (Louis Philippe) at its head, agreed to pay the sum demanded, in six annual installments. The first payment was not promptly met, when the energetic creditor demanded an immediate fulfillment of the promises of the dilatory debtor. The French government hesitated, and even allowed friendly relations with the United States to terminate, the respective ministers to be withdrawn, and war to be contemplated. The President was inflexible, and promptly accepted war, if that must be the alternative. Louis Philippe and the Chamber of Deputies yielded, on compulsion, and all demands were paid. Denmark, Naples, Spain, and Portugal, were also called upon to "pay up," and they did so; for they saw proud France yield, and concluded that no trifter was at the head of the government of the United States. Besides these, an important commercial treaty was made with Russia, and another of amity and commerce with the Sultan of Turkey, and the sovereigns of Muscat and Siam, in the East Indies. A treaty was also renewed with the Emperor of Morocco, on the northern coast of Africa. These several treaties placed our commerce upon an equal footing with that of the most favored European nation, and the political strength of the United States became far more extensively known than it ever had been before. Only about thirty years had elapsed since the flag of the almost unknown United States had been first unfurled in the harbor of Constantinople, by Commodore Bainbridge; and but twenty years since the Barbary powers on the Mediterranean had been made to feel the puissance of the growing Empire of the West.

The memorable administration of President Jackson ended on the 8d of March, 1837. Among the important acts of the Congress then in session, was one of justice to the venerable patriot, about to leave the arena of public life forever. For almost two years the following resolution (offered by Mr. Clay during the excitement immediately succeeding the removal of the public funds from the United States Bank), had remained on the journal of the Senate: "Resolved, That the President, in the late executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the Constitution and laws, but in derogation of both." On motion of Mr. Benton, this record of censure against the President was blotted out on the 16th of March, 1837, by a vote of a majority of the Senate. The Secretary brought out the original manuscript journal, opened to the page containing the resolution of censure, and proceeded, in open session, to draw a square of broad black lines around the sentence, and to write across its face in strong letters, these words: "Expunged by order of the Senate, this 16th day of March, 1837." This was a just tribute to the virtues of an honest man.

Jackson left the Federal City two days after the inauguration of his successor, Martin Van Buren. He appeared at that august ceremonial as a private citizen, and as he sat uncovered in that genial March sun, he was the chief object of regard of the vast multitude assembled there. "For once," says Colonel Benton, who was present, "the rising was eclipsed by the setting sun. Though disrobed of power, and retiring to the shade of private life, it was evident that the ex-President was the absorbing object of intense regard. At the moment he began to descend the broad steps of the portico, to take his seat in the open carriage which was to bear him away, the deep, repressed feeling of the dense mass broke forth; acclamations and cheers bursting from the heart, and filling the air, such as power never commanded, nor man in power received. It was the affection, gratitude, and admiration of the living age, saluting, for the last time, a great man. It was the acclaim of posterity, breaking from the bosoms of contemporaries. It was the anticipation of futurity—unpurchasable homage to the hero-patriot, who, all his life, and in all circumstances of his life—in peace and in war, and glorious in each, had been the friend of his country, and devoted to her, regardless of self."

Crowds followed the carriage of the patriot to the railway station; and when the conductor's bell had sounded, and the venerable man lifted his hat from his white locks, and with his hand waved an adieu, as the cars moved away, the vast multitude were too full of regrets to speak, but gazed on him in silence. And long after the train had disappeared, they still looked in the direction of its exit, with indefinable emotions, as if a bright star had gone out from the sky—as if a glorious prophet had been translated, and left not his mantle behind him. He returned to the home from which he had been absent for eight long years; but, alas! the light of the dwelling was not there. Affectionate friends, and neighbors, and domestics, gathered around him with joyous welcomes; but his heart was with his buried treasure in the grave, and he could not rest until he had wept at the tomb of his best beloved. Then he received his friends kindly—then the Hero, Patriot, and Sage, sat down among the pleasant shades of the Hermitage, to enjoy eight years more of life, “to hold converse with his forests, to cultivate his farm, to gather around him hospitably his friends!” “Who was like him?” asked Bancroft, in his beautiful eulogy. “He was still the load-star of the American people. His fervid thoughts, frankly uttered, still spread the flame of patriotism through the American breast; his counsels were still listened to with reverence; and, almost alone among statesmen, he, in his retirement, was in harmony with every onward movement of his time. His prevailing influence assisted to sway a neighboring nation to desire to share our institutions; his ear heard the footsteps of the coming millions that are to gladden our Western shores; and his eye discerned, in the dim distance, the whitening sails that are to enliven the waters of the Pacific with the social sounds of our successful commerce.”

It would be a pleasant task to delineate, in all their beauty of outline and richness of coloring, the scenes at the Hermitage during the final retirement of its master; and pleasant, too, would it be to pen a record of those numerous small events—almost too small for the grave historian's pen—which make up the sum of character by which he is to be judged as a man. Limit forbids; yet a few more touches of the pencil before we leave this hasty portraiture of one of America's noblest sons.

That man of iron will and inflexible determination, when the occasion demanded their exercise, was as gentle as a child, when surrounded by gentle influences. “I arrived at his house,” says Colonel Benton, “one wet, chilly evening in February [1814], and came upon him in the twilight, sitting alone before the fire, a lamb and a child between his knees. He started a little, called a servant to remove the two innocents to another room, and explained to me how it was. The child had cried because the lamb was out in the cold, and begged him to bring it in, which he had done, to please the child, his adopted son, then not two years old.”

A son of the famous Daniel Boone was in Nashville, to be detained on business for some weeks. He had taken lodgings at a small tavern, as he could not afford to pay for the best accommodations. Jackson heard of it, went to Nashville, found him, and taking him to his house as a guest, as long as his business should keep him in that section, said, “Your father's dog should not stay in a tavern, where I have a house.”

While he was yet connected with the army, an officer complained to him that some soldiers were making a great noise in a tent. “What are they doing?” asked the General. “They are praying now, but have been singing,” was the reply. “And is that a crime?” asked Jackson, with emphasis. “The articles of war,” the officer said, “order punishment for any unusual noise.” “God forbid!” replied the General, with much feeling, “that praying should be an unusual noise in any camp,” and advised the officer to join them.

Jackson's views of duty may be well illustrated by an incident that occurred while he was President. A Western minister of the Gospel applied to him for office. He was told to call again, and in the mean while, the President ascertained his vocation. “Are you not a Christian minister?” asked Jackson. “I am,” the candidate replied. “Well,” said the President, “if you discharge the duties of that office, which is better than I can confer, you will have no time for any other. I advise you to return home and attend to that, without seeking any addition to your responsibility, that you may be enabled, hereafter, to give a good account of your stewardship.”

The brave Colonel Miller was asked at the bloody battle near Niagara Falls, if he could take a certain battery. “I'll try,” was his answer, and the exploit was soon accomplished. He was collector of the port of Salem, Massachusetts, when Jackson became President. Some politicians, in whom the General reposed confidence, wished him removed, and one of their friends appointed in his place. He was represented to Jackson as incompetent and a political opponent. These seemed cause for his removal, and the name of the other man was sent to the Senate. Colonel Benton asked to have the nomination laid over, for he was certain that the President had been misled. He called upon Jackson, and asked, “Do you know who is the collector of the port of Salem, Sir, whom you are about to remove?” “No,” replied the President; “I can't think of his name; but I know he is an incompetent man, and a New England Hartford Convention Federalist, for G—— and H—— told me so.” “Sir,” said Benton, “the incumbent is General Miller, a brave soldier on the Niagara frontier.” The President, excited with emotion, said, “Not the brave Miller who said ‘I'll try,’ when asked if he could take that British battery at Bridgewater!” “The same man, Sir,” responded Benton. Jackson pulled a bell violently, and when the servant appeared, he said, “Tell Colonel Donelson I want him, quick. Donelson,” said the President, as soon as he entered, “I want the name of the fellow nominated for collector at Salem withdrawn instantly. These politicians are the most remorseless scoundrels alive. Write a letter to General Miller, and tell him he shall hold the office as long as Andrew Jackson lives. Stay—I'll write it myself; the assurance will be more gratifying from a brother soldier." That promise was faithfully kept. These waifs on the surface of Jackson's character indicated the direction of the deep current below.

There was grief, deep and solemn, so deep and solemn as to be almost tearless, in the Hermitage on the second Sabbath in June, 1845. The glorious old patriarch of the mansion, then in his seventy-fifth year, was passing his last hours among the living of earth, calm and peaceful as the holy day. Death had approached him gently as a friend, with a crown of immortality for his soul, and he felt no fears for the future nor regrets for the past. He had no children of his own loins to weep over him, but he had adopted a nephew of his wife, as his son and heir, and he and his sweet companion wept at the bedside of their foster-parent with all the real grief of children. And his servants, too, were bowed with sorrow, for they loved him as their best earthly friend. There were many young people of the neighborhood who felt like children under his roof, and had loved "Aunt Rachel," as they affectionately called Mrs. Jackson, as a dear mother. These were in the house of mourning, with streaming eyes. When the sage felt the cold hand of death upon his brow, he called all to his bedside, and spoke words of tender affection to each. His two little grandchildren were brought from Sabbath school, and he prayed for them, kissed, and blessed them. "Weep not," he said to his daughter, "my sufferings are less than those of Christ upon the cross." His servants gathered around, some in the room, and some on the outside of the house, clinging to the windows to obtain a last sight, and hear the last words of their dear friend. His parting utterances were—"Dear children, servants, and friends, I trust to meet you all in Heaven, both white and black." Thus peacefully passed the spirit of ANDREW JACKSON from earth to the world of light and immortality. His mortal remains rest beneath a beautiful mausoleum, in the form of the Temple of Liberty, by the side of his beloved Rachel, among the pleasant trees of the Hermitage.

THE TOMB AT THE HERMITAGE.

LONGWOOD.—THE OLD HOUSE.

NAPOLEON BONAPARTE.

BY JOHN S. C. ABBOTT.

SAINT HELENA—(concluded.)

DECEMBER 10, 1815. The Emperor was this day conducted to his new residence at Longwood. In cheerful spirits he rode on horseback along the rugged path of barren volcanic rocks, a distance of two miles, until he arrived at his final prison-house. Here he found, in the midst of bleak, storm-washed crags, a long, low, one-story house, rudely put together, but far too small for the accommodation of the few yet devoted friends who had come to share his captivity. The Emperor examined his prison with serenity and good-nature, seeming to think more of the comfort of his companions than of his own.

About a mile from Longwood, on the road to the Briars, there was a small hovel, called Hut's Gate, which General Bertrand, with his wife and son, was permitted to occupy. General Gourgaud and Count Las Cases eagerly solicited permission to sleep in tents, rather than remain in Jamestown, apart from the Emperor. A tent, under the windows of the Emperor, was pitched for General Gourgaud; and an unfinished room was hastily prepared for Las Cases. Dr. O'Meara was also under the necessity of dwelling in a tent. In process of time a room was prepared for each of these gentlemen. For the subsistence of the imperial captive and his exiled court, the British Ministry appropriated sixty thousand dollars a year. This was a small sum, considering the enormous expense of provisions, and of every comfort, upon that distant and barren rock. The followers of the Emperor resolutely persisted in treating him with all that deference and respect which were due to his illustrious character and to his past achievements. They refused to acquiesce in the insult cast upon France, upon them, and upon Napoleon, by addressing him as if he had been but a successful general, who, by the energies of the sword, had usurped sovereign power.

The accompanying view of the house at Longwood, with the plan of the rooms, will give an idea of the accommodation prepared for the Emperor and his party of twenty-two individuals. The Emperor immediately established himself in his ordinary habits of industry. He did every thing in his power to cheer his companions, and to promote kindly feelings throughout his household. Through the remaining monotonous and melancholy years of captivity, sickness, and death, he was by far the most cheerful and uncomplaining of the whole number.*

The Emperor often invited the children of General Bertrand and General Montholon into his room. They were always delighted with this privilege. They came rushing to Napoleon with their playthings, shouting and laughing in a perfect tumult of joy, and appealing to him as the arbiter of their discussions. The Emperor entered heartily into their sports, and surrendered himself to all the fun and the frolic. "How happy they are," said the Emperor one day, "when I send for them or play with them. All their wishes are satisfied. Passions have not yet approached their hearts. They feel the plenitude of existence. Let them enjoy it. At their age I thought and felt as they do. But what storms since. How much that little Hortensia grows and improves. If she lives, of how many young élégans will she not disturb the repose. I shall then be no more."

At one time he took a deep interest in his little garden, and, with his affectionate companions, beguiled many weary hours with the spade and the hoe. He planted shrubbery and flowers, and raised peas and beans.

He had a basin constructed on the grounds for a fish pond. Some fishes were obtained, which Napoleon was desirous of placing in the water with his own hand. He wished all the children of Longwood to accompany him, that he might enjoy their happiness. The little group, buoyant with hope and pleasure, were soon gathered around the Emperor whom they so dearly loved. The gloom of Longwood was relieved by this gleam of sunshine, as Napoleon, with his retinue of artless prattlers, went to the water and watched the arrowy movements of the fishes in its crystal depths.

A picture of his son had been placed in a box of books transmitted to him from Europe. Tears gushed into the eyes of Napoleon as he gazed upon it. The attendants, moved by this outburst of parental love, stopped their work of opening the packages, and stood in an attitude of sympathy. "Dear boy!" exclaimed the Emperor; "if he does not fall a victim to some political atrocity, he will not be unworthy of his father."

The annoyances and mental tortures to which the Emperor was exposed were innumerable. Las Cases was torn from him, and then his physician, O'Meara. For a long time the Emperor was slowly sinking into the grave without any medical attendance, as he resolutely refused to see any agent of his insulting jailer, Sir Hudson Lowe.

In the year 1819 the British government consented that the friends of Napoleon should send to him from Europe another physician. On the 19th of September of that year, Doctor Antommarchi, who had been selected, arrived at St. Helena. Two ecclesiastics accompanied Dr. Antommarchi, as Napoleon had expressed reiterated and very earnest desires that the ordinances of religion might be regularly administered to his household at St. Helena. One of these, the Abbé Buonavita, was an aged prelate, who had been chaplain to Napoleon's mother at Elba, and also to the Princess Pauline at Rome. The other was a young man, the Abbé Vignali, who was also a physician.

Sept. 22, 1819. Dr. Antommarchi had his first interview with Napoleon. He found him in bed, in a small, dark room, very meanly furnished. It was a quarter past two o'clock in the afternoon. The room was so dark that when the Doctor first entered he could not see Napoleon. The Emperor perceiving this, in gentle tones requested him to approach. He questioned him very minutely respecting his parentage, his past history, his motives for consenting to come to such a miserable rock, and his medical education. Satisfied with his replies, the Emperor entered into a frank and touching conversation respecting his friends in Europe.

He then saw the two Abbés. At the close of a confiding and an affecting interview, the Emperor said, in the tones of a man upon the verge of the grave:

"We have been too long deprived of the ordinances of religion not to be eager to enjoy them immediately, now that they are within our power. Hereafter we will have the communion service every Sabbath, and we will observe the sacred days recognized by the Concordat. I wish to establish at St. Helena the religious ceremonies which are celebrated in France. On these occasions we will erect a movable altar in the dining-room. You, Mons. Abbé, are aged and infirm. I will select the hour which will be most convenient for you. You may officiate between nine and ten o'clock in the morning."

In the evening the Emperor was alone with Count Montholon. The Count was not a religious man. He has frankly said, "In the midst of camps I forgot religion." Napoleon, with great joy, informed Montholon of his intention to attend mass the next day. He then uttered the following remarkable confession:

"Upon the throne, surrounded by generals far from devout, yes, I will not deny it, I had too much regard for public opinion, and far too much timidity, and perhaps I did not dare to say aloud, 'I am a believer.' I said, 'Religion is a power—a political engine.' But, even then, if any one had questioned me directly, I should have replied, 'Yes! I am a Christian.' And if it had been necessary to confess my faith at the price of martyrdom, I should have found all my firmness. Yes! I should have endured it rather than deny my religion. But now that I am at St. Helena, why should I dissemble that which I believe at the bottom of my heart? Here I live for myself. I wish for a priest, I desire the communion of the Lord's Supper, and to confess what I believe. I will go to the mass. I will not force any one to accompany me there. But those who love me will follow me."

General Bertrand was an avowed unbeliever, and often displeased Napoleon by speaking disrespectfully of sacred things. The Emperor was one day, about this time, conversing with him upon the subject of atheism.

"Your spirit," said he, "is it the same as the spirit of the herdsman, whom you see in the valley below feeding his flocks? Is there not as great a distance between you and him, as between a horse and a man? But how do you know this? You have never seen his spirit. No! the spirit of a beast has the endowment of being invisible. It has that privilege equally with the spirit of the most exalted genius.

"But you have talked with the herdsman; you have examined his countenance; you have questioned him, and his responses have told you what he is. You judge, then, the cause from the effects; and you judge correctly. Certainly your reason, your intelligence, your faculties are vastly above those of the herdsman. Very well; I judge in the same way. Divine effects compel me to believe in a Divine Cause. Yes! there is a Divine Cause, a Sovereign Reason, an Infinite Being. That Cause is the cause of causes. That Reason is the reason creative of intelligence. There exists an Infinite Being, compared with whom you, General Bertrand, are but an atom; compared with whom I, Napoleon, with all my genius, am truly nothing—a pure nothing; do you understand? I perceive him, God; I see him; have need of him; I believe in him. If you do not perceive him; if you do not believe in him; very well, so much the worse for you. But you will, General Bertrand, yet believe in God. I can pardon many things; but I have a horror of an atheist and a materialist. Think you that I can have any sympathies in common with the man who does not believe in the existence of the soul? who believes that he is but a lump of clay, and who wishes that I may also be like him, a lump of clay?"

General Montholon, after his return to Europe, said to M. de Beauterne:

"Yes; the Emperor was a Christian. With him faith was a natural, a fundamental principle. The religious sentiment was immediately roused when in the slightest degree summoned by an exterior sensation or an incidental thought. When any thing cruel or irreligious presented itself, it seemed to do violence to his deepest feelings; he could not restrain himself. He protested, opposed, and was indignant. Such was his natural character. I have seen it, yes, I have seen it; and I, a man of camps, who had forgotten my religion—I confess it—who did not practice it, I at first was astonished; but then I received thoughts and impressions which still continue with me the subjects of profound reflection. I have seen the Emperor religious, and I have said to myself, 'He died a Christian, in the fear of God.' I can not forget that old age is upon me, that I must soon die; and I wish to die like the Emperor. I do not doubt even that General Bertrand often recalls, as I do, the religious conversations and the death of the Emperor. The General, perhaps, may finish his career like his master and his friend."*

* Sentiment de Napoleon sur le Christianisme: Conversations religieuses, recueillies à Sainte Helene par M. le General Comte de Montholon, par M. le Chevalier de Beauterne, p. 21.

The conversation at St. Helena very frequently turned upon the subject of religion. One day Napoleon was speaking of the Divinity of Christ, General Bertrand said:

"I can not conceive, Sire, how a great man like you can believe that the Supreme Being ever exhibited himself to men under a human form, with a body, a face, mouth, and eyes. Let Jesus be whatever you please—the highest intelligence, the purest heart, the most profound legislator, and, in all respects, the most singular being who has ever existed. I grant it. Still he was simply a man, who taught his disciples, and deluded credulous people, as did Orpheus, Confucius, Brahma. Jesus caused himself to be adored, because his predecessors, Isis and Osiris, Jupiter and Juno, had proudly made themselves objects of worship. The ascendancy of Jesus over his time, was like the ascendancy of the gods and the heroes of fable. If Jesus has impassioned and attached to his chariot the multitude—if he has revolutionized the world—I see in that only the power of genius, and the action of a commanding spirit, which vanquishes the world, as so many conquerors have done—Alexander, Cæsar, you, Sire, and Mohammed with a sword."

Napoleon replied:

"I know men, and I tell you that Jesus Christ is not a man. Superficial minds see a resemblance between Christ and the founders of empires and the gods of other religions. That resemblance does not exist. There is between Christianity and whatever other religion the distance of infinity.

"We can say to the authors of every other religion, 'You are neither gods nor the agents of the Deity. You are but missionaries of falsehood, moulded from the same clay with the rest of mortals. You are made with all the passions and vices inseparable from them. Your temples and your priests proclaim your origin.' Such will be the judgment, the cry of conscience, of whoever examines the gods and the temples of paganism.

"Paganism was never accepted, as truth, by the wise men of Greece; neither by Socrates, Pythagoras, Plato, Anaxagoras, or Pericles. On the other side, the loftiest intellects, since the advent of Christianity, have had faith, a living faith, a practical faith, in the mysteries and the doctrines of the gospel; not only Bossuet and Fenelon, who were preachers, but Descartes and Newton, Leibnitz and Pascal, Corneille and Racine, Charlemagne and Louis XIV.

"Paganism is the work of man. One can here read but our imbecility. What do these gods, so boastful, knew more than other mortals? these legislators, Greek or Roman, this Numa, this Lycurgus, these priests of India or of Memphis, this Confucius, this Mohammed? Absolutely nothing. They have made a perfect chaos of morals. There is not one among them all who has said any thing new in reference to our future destiny, to the soul, to the essence of God, to the creation. Enter the sanctuaries of paganism. You there find perfect chaos, a thousand contradictions, war between the gods, the immobility of sculpture, the division and the rending of unity, the parceling out of the divine attributes mutilated or denied in their essence, the sophisms of ignorance and presumption, polluted fêtes, impurity and abomination adored, all sorts of corruption festering in the thick shades, with the rotten wood, the idol, and his priest. Does this honor God, or does it dishonor him? Are these religions and these gods to be compared with Christianity?

"As for me, I say no. I summon entire Olympus to my tribunal. I judge the gods, but am far from prostrating myself before their vain images. The gods, the legislators of India and of China, of Rome and of Athens, have nothing which can overawe me. Not that I am unjust to them! No; I appreciate them, because I know their value. Undeniably princes, whose existence is fixed in the memory as an image of order and of power, as the ideal of force and beauty, such princes were no ordinary men.

"I see in Lycurgus, Numa, and Mohammed only legislators, who, having the first rank in the State, have sought the best solution of the social problem; but I see nothing there which reveals divinity. They themselves have never raised their pretensions so high. As for me, I recognize the gods and these great men as beings like myself. They have performed a lofty part in their times, as I have done. Nothing announces them divine. On the contrary, there are numerous resemblances between them and myself; foibles and errors which ally them to me and to humanity.

"It is not so with Christ. Every thing in him astonishes me. His spirit overawes me, and his will confounds me. Between him and whoever else in the world there is no possible term of comparison. He is truly a being by himself. His ideas and his sentiments, the truths which he announces, his manner of convincing, are not explained either by human organization or by the nature of things.

"His birth, and the history of his life; the profundity of his doctrine, which grapples the mightiest difficulties, and which is of those difficulties the most admirable solution; his gospel, his apparition, his empire, his march across the ages and the realms—every thing is, for me, a prodigy, a mystery insoluble, which plunges me into a reverie from which I can not escape—a mystery which is there before my eyes—a mystery which I can neither deny nor explain. Here I see nothing human.

"The nearer I approach, the more carefully I examine, every thing is above me—every thing remains grand, of a grandeur which overpowers. His religion is a revelation from an intelligence, which certainly is not that of man. There is there a profound originality, which has created a series of words and of maxims before unknown. Jesus borrowed nothing from our sciences. One can absolutely find nowhere, but in him alone, the imitation or the example of his life. He is not a philosopher, since he advances by miracles, and from the commencement his disciples worshiped him. He persuades them far more by an appeal to the heart than by any display of method and of logic. Neither did he impose upon them any preliminary studies, or any knowledge of letters. All his religion consists in believing.

"In fact, the sciences and philosophy avail nothing for salvation; and Jesus came into the world to reveal the mysteries of heaven and the laws of the spirit. Also, he has nothing to do but with the soul, and to that alone he brings his gospel. The soul is sufficient for him, as he is sufficient for the soul. Before him the soul was nothing. Matter and time were the masters of the world. At his voice every thing returns to order. Science and philosophy become secondary. The soul has reconquered its sovereignty. All the scholastic scaffolding falls, as an edifice ruined, before one single word—Faith.

"What a master, and what a word, which can effect such a revolution! With what authority does he teach men to pray! He imposes his belief. And no one, thus far, has been able to contradict him; first, because the gospel contains the purest morality, and also because the doctrine which it contains of obscurity, is only the proclamation and the truth of that which exists where no eye can see, and no reason can penetrate. Who is the insensate who will say No to the intrepid voyager who recounts the marvels of the icy peaks which he alone has had the boldness to visit? Christ is that bold voyager. One can doubtless remain incredulous. But no one can venture to say, It is not so.

"Moreover, consult the philosophers upon those mysterious questions which relate to the essence of man, and the essence of religion. What is their response? Where is the man of good sense who has ever learned any thing from the system of metaphysics, ancient or modern, which is not truly a vain and pompous ideology, without any connection with our domestic life, with our passions? Unquestionably, with skill in thinking, one can seize the key of the philosophy of Socrates and Plato. But to do this, it is necessary to be a metaphysician; and moreover, with years of study, one must possess special aptitude. But good sense alone, the heart, an honest spirit, are sufficient to comprehend Christianity.

"The Christian religion is neither ideology nor metaphysics, but a practical rule, which directs the actions of man, corrects him, counsels him, and assists him in all his conduct. The Bible contains a complete series of facts and of historical men, to explain time and eternity, such as no other religion has to offer. If this is not the true religion, one is very excusable in being deceived; for every thing in it is grand and worthy of God. I search in vain in history to find the similar to Jesus Christ, or any thing which can approach the gospel. Neither history, nor humanity, nor the ages, nor nature offer me any thing with which I am able to compare it or to explain it. Here every thing is extraordinary. The more I consider the gospel, the more I am assured that there is nothing there which is not beyond the march of events, and above the human mind. Even the impious themselves have never dared to deny the sublimity of the gospel, which inspires them with a sort of compulsory veneration. What happiness that book procures for those who believe it! What marvels those admire there who reflect upon it!

"All the words there are imbedded and joined one upon another, like the stones of an edifice. The spirit which binds these words together is a divine cement, which now reveals the sense, and again veils it from the mind. Each phrase has a sense complete, which traces the perfection of unity and the profundity of the whole. Book unique, where the mind finds a moral beauty before unknown, and an idea of the Supreme superior even to that which creation suggests. Who, but God, could produce that type, that idea of perfection, equally exclusive and original?

"Christ, having but a few weak disciples, was condemned to death. He died the object of the wrath of the Jewish priests, and of the contempt of the nation, and abandoned and denied by his own disciples.

"They are about to take me, and to crucify me, said he. I shall be abandoned of all the world. My chief disciple will deny me at the commencement of my punishment. I shall be left to the wicked. But then, divine justice being satisfied, original sin being expiated by my sufferings, the bond of man to God will be renewed, and my death will be the life of my disciples. Then they will be more strong without me than with me; for they will see me rise again. I shall ascend to the skies; and I shall send to them, from heaven, a Spirit who will instruct them. The spirit of the cross will enable them to understand my gospel. In fine, they will believe it; they will preach it; and they will convert the world.

"And this strange promise, so aptly called by Paul the 'foolishness of the cross,' this prediction of one miserably crucified, is literally accomplished. And the mode of the accomplishment is perhaps more prodigious than the promise.

"It is not a day, nor a battle which has decided it. Is it the lifetime of a man? No! It is a war, a long combat of three hundred years, commenced by the apostles and continued by their successors and by succeeding generations of Christians. In this conflict all the kings and all the forces of the earth were arrayed on one side. Upon the other I see no army, but a mysterious energy; individuals scattered here and there, in all parts of the globe, having no other rallying sign than a common faith in the mysteries of the cross.

"What a mysterious symbol! the instrument of the punishment of the Man-God. His disciples were armed with it. 'The Christ,' they said, 'God has died for the salvation of men.' What a strife, what a tempest these simple words have raised around the humble standard of the punishment of the Man-God! On the one side, we see rage and all the furies of hatred and violence. On the other, there is gentleness, moral courage, infinite resignation. For three hundred years spirit struggled against the brutality of sense, conscience against despotism, the soul against the body, virtue against all the vices. The blood of Christians flowed in torrents. They died kissing the hand which slew them. The soul alone protested, while the body surrendered itself to all tortures. Every where Christians fell, and every where they triumphed.

"You speak of Cæsar, of Alexander; of their conquests, and of the enthusiasm which they enkindled in the hearts of their soldiers. But can you conceive of a dead man making conquests, with an army faithful and entirely devoted to his memory. My armies have forgotten me, even while living, as the Carthaginian army forgot Hannibal. Such is our power! A single battle lost crushes us, and adversity scatters our friends.

"Can you conceive of Cæsar as the eternal emperor of the Roman senate, and from the depths of his mausoleum governing the empire, watching over the destinies of Rome? Such is the history of the invasion and conquest of the world by Christianity. Such is the power of the God of the Christians; and such is the perpetual miracle of the progress of the faith and of the government of His church. Nations pass away, thrones crumble, but the church remains. What is then the power which has protected this church, thus assailed by the furious billows of rage and the hostility of ages? Whose is the arm which, for eighteen hundred years, has protected the church from so many storms which have threatened to engulf it?

"Alexander, Cæsar, Charlemagne, and myself founded empires. But upon what did we rest the creations of our genius? Upon force. Jesus Christ alone founded his empire upon love; and at this hour millions of men would die for him.

"In every other existence but that of Christ, how many imperfections? Where is the character which has not yielded, vanquished by obstacles? Where is the individual who has never been governed by circumstances or places, who has never succumbed to the influence of the times, who has never compounded with any customs or passions? From the first day to the last he is the same, always the same; majestic and simple, infinitely firm and infinitely gentle.

"Truth should embrace the universe. Such is Christianity, the only religion which destroys sectional prejudice, the only one which proclaims the unity and the absolute brotherhood of the whole human family, the only one which is purely spiritual; in fine, the only one which assigns to all, without distinction, for a true country, the bosom of the Creator, God. Christ proved that he was the son of the Eternal, by his disregard of time. All his doctrines signify one only, and the same thing, Eternity.

"It is true that Christ proposes to our faith a series of mysteries. He commands, with authority, that we should believe them, giving no other reason than those tremendous words, 'I am God.' He declares it. What an abyss he creates, by that declaration, between himself and all the fabricators of religion. What audacity, what sacrilege, what blasphemy, if it were not true! I say more; the universal triumph of an affirmation of that kind, if the triumph were not really that of God himself, would be a plausible excuse, and the proof of atheism.

"Moreover, in propounding mysteries Christ is harmonious with nature, which is profoundly mysterious. From whence do I come? whither do I go? who am I? Human life is a mystery in its origin, its organization, and its end. In man and out of man, in nature, every thing is mysterious. And can one wish that religion should not be mysterious? The creation and the destiny of the world are an unfathomable abyss, as also is the creation and the destiny of each individual. Christianity at least does not evade these great questions. It meets them boldly. And our doctrines are a solution of them for every one who believes.

"The gospel possesses a secret virtue, a mysterious efficacy, a warmth which penetrates and soothes the heart. One finds, in meditating upon it, that which one experiences in contemplating the heavens. The gospel is not a book; it is a living being, with an action, a power, which invades every thing which opposes its extension. Behold it upon this table, this book surpassing all others (here the Emperor deferentially placed his hand upon it); I never omit to read it, and every day with the same pleasure.

"Nowhere is to be found such a series of beautiful ideas, admirable moral maxims, which pass before us like the battalions of a celestial army, and which produce in our soul the same emotion which one experiences in contemplating the infinite expanse of the skies, resplendent in a summer's night, with all the brilliance of the stars. Not only is our mind absorbed, it is controlled, and the soul can never go astray with this book for its guide. Once master of our spirit, the faithful gospel loves us. God even is our friend, our father, and truly our God. The mother has no greater care for the infant whom she nurses.

"What a proof of the divinity of Christ! With an empire so absolute, he has but one single end, the spiritual melioration of individuals, the purity of conscience, the union to that which is true, the holiness of the soul.

"Christ speaks, and at once generations become his by stricter, closer ties than those of blood; by the most sacred, the most indissoluble of all unions. He lights up the flame of a love which consumes self-love, which prevails over every other love. The founders of other religions never conceived of this mystical love, which is the essence of Christianity, and is beautifully called charity. In every attempt to effect this thing, namely, to make himself beloved, man deeply feels his own impotence. So that Christ's greatest miracle undoubtedly is, the reign of charity.

"I have so inspired multitudes that they would die for me. God forbid that I should form any comparison between the enthusiasm of the soldier and Christian charity, which are as unlike as their cause.

"But, after all, my presence was necessary; the lightning of my eye, my voice, a word from me; then the sacred fire was kindled in their hearts. I do indeed possess the secret of this magical power, which lifts the soul, but I could never impart it to any one. None of my generals ever learnt it from me. Nor have I the means of perpetuating my name and love for me, in the hearts of men, and to effect these things without physical means.

"Now that I am at St. Helena; now that I am alone chained upon this rock, who fights and wins empires for me? who are the courtiers of my misfortune? who thinks of me? who makes efforts for me in Europe? where are my friends? Yes, two or three, whom your fidelity immortalizes, you share, you console my exile."

Here the voice of the Emperor trembled with emotion, and for a moment he was silent. He then continued:

"Yes, our life once shone with all the brilliance of the diadem and the throne; and yours, Bertrand, reflected that splendor, as the dome of the Invalides, gilt by us, reflects the rays of the sun. But disasters came; the gold gradually became dim. The rain of misfortune and outrage with which I am daily deluged has effaced all the brightness. We are mere lead now, General Bertrand, and soon I shall be in my grave.

"Such is the fate of great men! So it was with Cæsar and Alexander. And I, too, am forgotten. And the name of a conqueror and an emperor is a college theme! Our exploits are tasks given to pupils by their tutor, who sit in judgment upon us, awarding us censure or praise. And mark what is soon to become of me; assassinated by the English oligarchy, I die before my time; and my dead body, too, must return to the earth, to become food for worms. Behold the destiny, near at hand, of him who has been called the great Napoleon. What an abyss between my deep misery and the eternal reign of Christ, which is proclaimed, loved, adored, and which is extending over all the earth. Is this to die? Is it not rather to live? The death of Christ! It is the death of God."

LONGWOOD.—THE NEW HOUSE.

For a moment the Emperor was silent. As General Bertrand made no reply, he solemnly added, "If you do not perceive that Jesus Christ is God, very well, then I did wrong to make you a general."

During the spring months of the year 1821, the Emperor, whose health had been long declining, was evidently approaching death. The British government had now finished a more comfortable residence for Napoleon than the old house at Longwood; but he was too feeble to bear the fatigue and exposure of removal, and it was never occupied by him. A brief journal will record the pathetic scenes of his last days.

April 24. "The Emperor," says Montholon, "has again spoken to me of his will. His imagination is unceasingly employed in seeking to find resources from which to gratify his liberality. Each day brings to his mind the remembrance of some other old servant whom he would wish to remunerate."

April 25. The Emperor slept quietly most of the night. Count Montholon sat at his bedside. At 4 o'clock in the morning, Napoleon started up and exclaimed, in dreamy delirium, "I have just seen my good Josephine. She disappeared at the moment when I was about to take her in my arms. She was seated there. It seemed to me that I had seen her yesterday evening. She is not changed. She is still the same, full of devotion to me. She told me that we were about to see each other again, never more to part. Did you see her?" He soon again fell asleep.

In the morning General Bertrand read to him from an English journal. He happened to fall upon a very atrocious libel against Caulaincourt and Savary, as being peculiar culprits in what the English called the assassination of the Duke d'Enghien. The magnanimity of Napoleon revolted at the idea of allowing the odium of any of the unpopular acts of his reign to be laid upon his friends. "This is shameful," said the Emperor, and then, turning to Montholon, he added, "bring me my will." Without saying another word he opened the will and interlined the following declaration:

"I caused the Duke d'Enghein to be arrested and tried, because that step was essential to the safety, interest, and honor of the French people, when the Count d'Artois was maintaining, by his own confession, sixty assassins at Paris. Under similar circumstances I would act in the same way."

Having written these few lines, without adding a word he handed back the will to Montholon. There is something very remarkable in this declaration. In the first place, Napoleon solemnly assumes all the responsibility of the act. He takes upon himself whatever may be attached to it which is blameworthy. In the second place, he is very accurate in his statement. He says, "I caused the Duke d'Enghien to be arrested and tried." The evidence is very conclusive that Napoleon, notwithstanding the undeniable proof of the treason of the Duke, intended to have pardoned him. His execution

Napoleon deeply deplored. He, however, would ask for no abatement of censure on that score, but held himself answerable for the acts which occurred under his reign. The Emperor then dictated the letter which was to announce his death to Sir Hudson Lowe.

April 28. The prostration of the Emperor was extreme. He spoke of his approaching dissolution with great composure. "After my death," said he, "which can not be far distant, I desire that you will open my body. I insist also that you promise that no English medical man shall touch me. If, however, the assistance of one should be indispensable, Doctor Arnott is the only one whom you have permission to employ. I further desire that you will take my heart, put it in spirits of wine, and carry it to Parma to my dear Maria Louisa. You will tell her that I tenderly loved her, that I never ceased to love her. You will relate to her all you have seen, and every particular respecting my situation and death. I particularly recommend to you carefully to examine my stomach, and to make a precise and detailed report of the state in which you may find it; which report you will give to my son. The vomitings which succeed each other, almost without interruption, lead me to suppose that the stomach is, of all my organs, the most diseased. I am inclined to believe that it is attacked with the same disorder that killed my father, I mean a scirrhus in the pylorus. I began to suspect that such was the case as soon as I saw the frequency and obstinate recurrence of the vomitings. I beg that you will be very particular in your examination, that, when you see my son, you may be able to communicate your observations to him, and point out to him the most proper medicines to use. When I am no more you will go to Rome. You will see my mother and my family, and will relate to them all you have observed concerning my situation, my disorder, and my death, upon this dreary and miserable rock. You will tell them that the great Napoleon expired in the most deplorable state, deprived of every thing, abandoned to himself and to his glory, and that he bequeathed, with his dying breath, to all the reigning families of Europe, the horror and opprobrium of his last moments."

From this effort he soon sank down in complete exhaustion, and deliriously murmured broken and incoherent sentences.

April 29. The Emperor passed a very restless night, suffering from a raging fever. Being unable to sleep, at four o'clock in the morning he requested Montholon to bring a table to his bedside; and then occupied himself, for a couple of hours, in dictating two projects, one on the destination of the palace of Versailles, and the other on the organization of the National Guard for the defense of Paris. "Astomishment," says Montholon, "has often been felt at the great faculties of the Emperor, which permitted him, on the eve of, or the day after a battle, which was either about to decide, or had decided the fate of a throne, to sign decrees, and occupy himself with matters purely administrative. But these facts are far inferior to the one which we here attest. But five days later, all that remained of this sublime genius was a corpse. And yet his thoughts were still constantly directed toward the happiness and future prospects of France."

When Dr. Antommarchi came in, he found the Emperor, though manifestly fast sinking, calm and rational. Napoleon spoke again of the cancer in the stomach, with which he had supposed that he was afflicted, and said to the Doctor,

"I recommend to you once more to examine my pylorus with the greatest care. Write down your observations, and deliver them to my son. I wish, at least, to preserve him from the disease."

Antommarchi suggested the substitution of a blister for the plaster which he had applied to the epigastric region. "Since you wish it," said the Emperor, "be it so. Not that I expect the least benefit from it. But my end is approaching, and I am desirous of showing, by my resignation, my gratitude for your care and attention. Apply, therefore, the blister."

The feverish state of his stomach induced him to drink much cold water. With characteristic gratitude he exclaimed, "If fate had decreed that I should recover, I would erect a monument upon the spot where the water flows, and would crown the fountain, in testimony of the relief which it has afforded me. If I die, and my body, proscribed as my person has been, should be denied a little earth, I desire that my remains may be deposited in the cathedral of Ajaccio, in Corsica. And if it should not be permitted me to rest where I was born, let me be buried near the limpid stream of this pure water."

May 2. The Emperor was in a raging fever during the night, and quite delirious. His wandering spirit retraced the scenes of the past, visited again his beloved France, hovered affectionately over his idolized son, and held familiar converse with the companions of his toil and his glory. Again the lurid storm of war beat upon his disturbed fancy, as his unrelenting assailants combined anew for his destruction. Wildly he exclaimed, "Steingel, Dessaix, Massena! Ah! victory is declaring. Run, hasten, press the charge! They are ours!" Suddenly collecting his strength, in his eagerness he sprang from the bed; but his limbs failed him, and he fell prostrate upon the floor.

At nine o'clock in the morning the fever abated, and reason returned to her throne. Calling the Doctor to his bedside, he said to him earnestly, "Recollect what I have directed you to do after my death. Proceed very carefully to the anatomical examination of my stomach. I wish it, that I may save my son from this cruel disease. You will see him, Doctor, and you will point out to him what is best to be done, and will save him from the cruel sufferings I now experience. This is the last service I ask of you."

At noon the violence of the disease returned, and Napoleon, looking steadfastly and silently upon the Doctor for a few moments, said, "Doctor, I am very ill. I feel that I am going to die." He immediately sank away into insensibility. All the inmates of Longwood were unremitting in their attentions to the beloved sufferer. He was to them all, from the highest to the lowest, a father whom they almost adored. The zeal and solicitude they manifested deeply moved the sensibilities of the Emperor. He spoke to them in grateful words, and remembered them all in his will.

As he recovered from this insensibility he spoke faintly to his companions, enjoining it upon them to be particularly careful in attending to the comforts of the humbler members of his household after he should be gone. "And my poor Chinese," said he, "do not let them be forgotten. Let them have a few scores of Napoleons. I must take leave of them also." It is refreshing to meet such recognitions of the brotherhood of man.

May 3. At two o'clock in the afternoon the Emperor revived for a moment, and said to those who were appointed the executors of his will, and who were at his bedside,

"I am about to die, and you are to return to Europe. You have shared my exile. You will be faithful to my memory. I have sanctioned all good principles, and have infused them into my laws and my acts. I have not omitted a single one. Unfortunately, however, the circumstances in which I was placed were arduous, and I was obliged to act with severity, and to postpone the execution of my plans. Our reverses occurred. I could not unbend the bow; and France has been deprived of the liberal institutions which I intended to give her. She judges me with indulgence. She feels grateful for my intentions. She cherishes my name and my victories. Imitate her example. Be faithful to the opinions we have defended, and to the glory we have acquired. Any other course can only lead to shame and confusion."

He then sent for the Abbé Vignali. A movable altar was placed at the Emperor's bedside. All retired except the Abbé. Napoleon then, in silence and solitude, upon his dying bed, received the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. After the solemn ordinance Count Montholon returned to the room. The tranquil tones of the Emperor's voice, and the placid expression of his countenance, indicated the serenity of his spirit. He conversed a few moments upon religious subjects, and peacefully fell asleep. As he awoke in the morning he said to his valet, "Open the window, Marchand; open it wide, that I may breathe the air, the good air, which the good God has made."

May 5. The night of the 4th of May, dark, cheerless, and tempestuous, enveloped St. Helena in even unwonted gloom. The rain fell in torrents. A tornado of frightful violence swept the bleak rocks. Every tree which Napoleon had cherished was torn up by the roots, and laid prostrate in the mud. The dying Emperor, unconscious of every thing which was passing around him, tossed restlessly upon his pillow.

And now occurred the most affecting scene which had yet been witnessed in this chamber of suffering. The children of the family were introduced, to look, for the last time, upon their friend, now insensible, and breathing heavily in death. They had not seen him for more than a month. Shocked at the change which had taken place in that countenance, which had ever been accustomed to contemplate them with so much benignity and affection, they for a moment gazed upon the pallid and emaciate features with hesitation and terror. Then, with flooded eyes and loud sobbings, they rushed to the bedside, seized the hands of the Emperor, and covered them with kisses and with tears.

All present were overpowered with emotion, and the heavy breathing of the dying was drowned in the irrepressible lamentations of the mourners. Young Napoleon Bertrand was so overcome by the heart-rending scene that he fainted, and fell senseless upon the floor. In the midst of this death-drama one of the servants, who had been sick for forty-eight days, rose from his bed, and emaciate, pallid, delirious, and with disordered dress, entered the room. In fevered dreams he imagined that the Emperor was in trouble, and had called to him for help. The delirious and dying servant stood tottering by the side of his delirious and dying master, wildly exclaiming, "I will not leave the Emperor, I will fight and perish with him!"

The dying hours lingered slowly away, during which inarticulate murmurs were occasionally heard from the lips of the illustrious sufferer. "Twice I thought," says Montholon, "that I distinguished the unconnected words, 'France—army—head of the army—Josephine.'" This was at six o'clock in the morning. During the rest of the day, until six o'clock in the evening, he was lying upon his back, with his right hand out of the bed, and his eyes fixed, seemingly absorbed in deep meditation, and without any appearance of suffering. A pleasant and placid expression was spread over his features, as if he were sweetly sleeping.

A dark and tempestuous night succeeded the stormy day. The gale, with increasing fury, swept the ocean and the black rocks, and wailed as mournful a dirge as could fall on mortal ears. The very island seemed to shake before the gigantic billows, hurled against its craggy cliffs by the spirit of the storm. In the midnight darkness of that terrific elemental war the spirit of Napoleon passed the earthly vail, and entered the dread unknown.

"Isle of Elba—Napoleon," were the last words of the gentle and loving Josephine. "France—the army—Josephine," were the last images which lingered in the heart, and the last words which trembled upon the lips of the dying Emperor.

Napoleon had earnestly expressed the wish that his body might be buried on the banks of the Seine, in the midst of the French people whom he loved so well. But if that privilege were denied his remains, he prayed that his body might be taken to his native island, and deposited in the tomb of his father at Ajaccio. But if the English government declined also that request, he entreated his friends to bury him in a secluded spot, which he had selected, at St. Helena, beneath a weeping willow, which overshadowed the limpid spring from which Napoleon had received so many refreshing draughts of cold water. With his glowing affections he loved this spring as if it had been his personal friend.

Application was immediately made to Sir Hudson Lowe for permission to remove the remains to Europe. He informed the friends of Napoleon that the orders of his government were imperative, that the body of Napoleon was to remain at St. Helena. He, however, gave the assurance that it was quite a matter of indifference to him in what part of the island Napoleon was buried. They entreated him almost with tears, for permission to take the body home to his relatives and friends. But Sir Hudson Lowe, obedient to the requisitions of his government, was necessarily inexorable. He could not consent, notwithstanding the most affecting supplications and entreaties on the part of Madame Bertrand, to allow even the stomach and the heart to be removed.

After a very careful post mortem examination the body was prepared for its burial. The valet de chambre dressed the Emperor, as he was usually dressed in life, with white waistcoat and breeches, black cravat, long boots, and cocked hat. He was thus placed upon the bed, in his small bedroom, which was shrouded in black. The cloak which Napoleon had worn at Marengo was spread over his feet. A silver crucifix was placed upon his chest. Behind his head was an altar, where the Abbé Vignali stood, reciting the prayers of the church.

Napoleon had won the respect and affection of all the inhabitants of that bleak rock. There was no one at St. Helena, save Sir Hudson Lowe, who did not speak in his favor. Rapidly the tidings of his death spread to every individual. An immense crowd was soon assembled at Longwood. During the afternoon of the 6th, and the whole of the 7th, an unending procession passed slowly and solemnly through the room, gazing in silent and religious awe upon the lifeless remains. Even Sir Hudson Lowe said, in this sad hour, "He was England's greatest enemy, and mine too, but I forgive him."

The morning of the 8th of May dawned with unusual brilliance. A perfect calm had succeeded the storm, and not a cloud obscured the brightness of the sun. At an early hour all the inhabitants of the island were directing their steps toward Longwood, to pay their last tribute of respect to the remains of the Emperor. At half past twelve o'clock the grenadiers placed the coffin upon the hearse. The funeral car was drawn by four horses, richly caparisoned, and each led by a groom. The faded cloak he wore at Marengo was his fitting shroud. Four of his devoted friends held the corners of the pall. Twelve grenadiers walked by the side of the hearse, to carry the coffin, where the bad condition of the path along the crags prevented the wheels from advancing. The Emperor's horse, caparisoned in black, was led by a groom.

THE DYING SCENE.

THE GRAVE OF NAPOLEON.

The household of Longwood, dressed in deep mourning, followed sadly behind, weeping, with heart-rending grief, as children at the grave of a father. Next after them came the Admiral and the Governor, on horseback, accompanied by the officers of the staff. In long procession the inhabitants of the island, men, women, and children, reverently joined the funeral train. The garrison, two thousand five hundred in number, which had been stationed upon the island to guard the Emperor, lined the whole of the left side of the road from Longwood nearly to the grave. Bands of music, at appointed intervals, breathed their requiems over the crags bathed in the silent sunlight. As the procession passed along, the soldiers, two by two, fell into the line, and with reversed arms solemnly paced the dead march to the grave. The roar of the ocean was hushed. Not a leaf trembled upon the gum-wood trees. And not a sound, save the death dirge, fell upon the listening ear, as the burial train moved slowly amidst the blackened crags. The whole career of Napoleon constitutes the wildest romance which imagination can conceive. But no events during that wondrous history are more touching and sublime than his death and burial on this lone, barren isle.

At length the hearse stopped. Huge blocks of blackened lava, precipices, and towering crags obstructed the further advance of the wheels. Twelve grenadiers with difficulty took upon their shoulders the remains, in the heavy triple coffin of tin, lead, and mahogany, and carried them along a narrow path, which had been constructed on the side of the rugged mountain, to the place of burial. The booming of minute guns, from the Admiral's ship in the harbor, reverberated from pinnacle to pinnacle of this gloomy rock, adding inconceivable sublimity to the scene. Every heart was vanquished by uncontrollable emotion. The coffin was placed on the verge of the grave. The Abbé Vignali recited the burial service. As the body was then lowered to its resting place, three successive volleys from a battery of fifteen cannon discharged over the grave, resounded in thunder peals along the crags of St. Helena. This was responded to by a simultaneous discharge from the ships in the harbor and every fort upon the island. The grave was then filled in, carefully closed with masonry, and a guard of honor placed over it.

The officers of the Emperor, upon the day of his death, had ordered a stone to be prepared, to rest upon his grave, with this simple inscription:

NAPOLEON.
BORN AT AJACCIO
The 15th of August, 1769.
DIED AT ST. HELENA
The 5th of May, 1821.

The graver had already cut the inscription, when Sir Hudson Lowe informed them that the orders of the British government were imperative; that no inscription could be allowed upon the tomb, but simply the words General Bonaparte. It was a cruel insult, thus to pursue their victim even into the grave. Remonstrances were unavailing. The French gentlemen at last obtained the poor boon of having a stone cover the grave without any inscription whatever. The willows which overhung the tomb were immediately stripped of their foliage, as every individual wished to carry away some souvenir of the most extraordinary man this world has ever known.

On the 27th of May the household of Napoleon sadly embarked for Europe. The day before their departure they went in a body to the tomb of the Emperor, and covered it with flowers and bathed it with their tears. They then embarked on board an English ship, and waved a last adieu to that dreary rock, where they had endured five and a half years of exile and of woe; but where they had also won the homage of the world by their devotion to greatness and goodness in adversity.

One of their number, Sergeant Hubert, in the enthusiasm of his deathless devotion, refused to abandon even the grave of his Emperor. For nineteen years he continued at St. Helena, daily guarding the solitary tomb. And when, at the united voice of France, that tomb gave up its sacred relics, and they were removed to repose upon the banks of the Seine, beneath the dome of the Invalides, among the people he had loved so well, this faithful servant followed them to their final resting-place. Napoleon now sleeps in the bosom of France, enthroned, as monarch was never enthroned before, in the hearts of his countrymen. France has reared for him a mausoleum which is a nation's pride. Through all coming ages, travelers from all lands will, with religious awe, visit the tomb of Napoleon. The voice of obloquy is fast dying away, and will soon be hushed forever.

THE DEAD SEA, SODOM, AND GOMORRAH.

THE interest we take in the Holy Land never dies. Over and over again we read with pleasure descriptions of Mount Olivet, Jerusalem, and Genesareth, the hallowed birth-place at Bethlehem, and the time-honored remains of the people of Judah. Fashion and accident stimulate or discourage our researches into the antiquities of other classic sites; but travels in Judea are always welcome. 'Twas the same fifteen centuries ago. No common feeling urged the journey commemorated in the old "Pilgrims' progress from Bordeaux to Jerusalem," in the fourth century; no ordinary motive provoked the crusades. It has been considered proper, in modern times, to sneer at those great enterprises, to talk of them as the fruit of barbarous superstition, and to weigh their merits in the same scale as we would the Japan expedition or the war with Mexico. There may possibly be some error in this off-hand way of dealing with the past. We, who think lightly of the Bouillons and Cœur de Lion, may profitably compare their spirit and their aims with our own, and set down, if we can, wherein the difference between us lies. It was no doubt a very uncivilized mode of proving their affection for the birth-place of Christianity to carry fire and sword into the Saracen homes; but we must remember that they had no travelers to traverse Palestine from Samaria to Moab, no books to describe the condition of the Holy Land, no records of what man was doing with the spot God had chosen for his own people and for the Redeemer's birth-place. If we can fancy such a change in the world's face as would exclude us from the shores of the Holy Land, and close the entrance of the sacred cities to the people of Christendom, such events as the preaching of a new Peter the Hermit, and the equipment of flesh armies of crusaders, would by no means seem impossible. As matters now stand, we need no such ebullitions of Christian zeal. We know far more about the land of the Jews than the degraded Arabs who hold it: year after year, our learned men and our zealous missionaries wander over its deserted plains, and bring home rich harvests of historic and legendary lore. Of late years, the passion for Eastern travel has increased more than ever. All the great authors have pined for a pilgrimage to Jerusalem; our libraries swell with hot-pressed volumes on new discoveries in the land of Canaan, Samaria, and Judea. It is possible, as Lamennais and many famous preachers in our own country assure us, that we are growing indifferent to the essentials of religion; but most assuredly, our attachment for the historic associations of Christianity was never more lively or universal.

A former number of this Magazine contained a sketch of the Dead Sea from the pen of one of our most esteemed contributors. At that time, our information on the subject was derived from the travels of Irby and Mangles, and the works of Burckhardt, Robinson, and Lynch. The former, enterprising and zealous explorer, had penetrated as far as Kerak, in the land of Moab. Burckhardt, a missionary sent out from London, traversed the whole of the valley through which the Jordan and the Dead Sea flow. The Rev. Dr. Robinson, whom we are proud to call our countryman, extended his explorations still further; and though his conclusions do not always coincide with those of later travelers—as, for instance, in the location of Zoar, which he placed on the eastern shore of the Dead Sea—his observations are always worthy of respect. Finally, Lieutenant Lynch, of the United States Navy, made his expedition through the Dead Sea in 1847 and 1848, and not only described the character of that lake with fidelity, but added much to our knowledge of the interesting sites on its shores.

We have now another student and explorer in the field—Félicien de Saulcy, a Frenchman, and a member of the Institute. This gentleman has long been favorably known as one of the first Orientalists and Archaeologists of France. An antiquary and a philosopher of more than average attainments, his private fortune enabled him to gratify his tastes without interruption from business cares. Bereaved, in July, 1850, of his wife, to whom he was tenderly attached, he resolved to exchange the painful scenes by which he was surrounded for others less fraught with melancholy suggestions; and with this view, he undertook a journey to the Holy Land. He was eminently fitted to be a useful traveler. His mind was well stored with information, and his heart was deeply imbued with the cardinal truths of the Christian religion. To these advantages he added others scarcely less valuable for such a task—great powers of endurance, unquestionable courage, and practical common sense. On his first application, the French government conferred upon him the title of Chargé d'une mission scientifique; and he had as little difficulty in finding a few trusty friends, imbued with the same ideas and full of the same hopes as himself, to accompany him on his pilgrimage. A learned and pious Abbé, a few accomplished youths, whose passion for natural history was likely to be gratified on such a journey; these, with M. de Rothschild, who was enlisted at Jerusalem, constituted the expedition which traveled through Palestine under the orders of M. de Saulcy. All, especially the leader, set out full of ardor and spirit.

M. de Saulcy's zeal was gratified at the very beginning of his journey. At Beyrout he was shown the identical spot where St. George, of British memory, killed the dragon. The saint was prone to cleanliness, a remarkable virtue in his days. After his victory he called for a piece of soap, and washed his hands, which were covered with the blood of his vanquished foe—whence, saith tradition, arose a dirty stain which M. de Saulcy saw on a rock at the place. A little further on, he rested at the spot where the same authority assures the traveler that Jonah was landed out of the belly of the fish. There is nothing to mark the prophet's escape. Some remains of a large town, in the shape of fallen and broken pillars, several Fellah cottages, date-trees, a Mohammedan owaly, and a khan or two, are all that De Saulcy notes.

At Beyrout the expedition is finally organized. Horses are hired at sixty cents per marching day, and thirty when they are allowed to rest. A Greek cook—a sneaking, servile scoundrel, whose prime object on all occasions is to steal and lie—is likewise secured; but as he robs not only his employers, but every one else on the road, and does not even spare the churches, the French travelers are compelled to discharge him on their arrival at Jerusalem, and replace him by a Christian named Matteo. A batch of moukris—as the Syrian muleteers are called—completes the caravan. More idle, aggravating scamps can not be conceived; our antiquary wonders how he restrained himself from breaking their heads a dozen times a day, and so do we. Whenever the Frenchmen want to start, the moukris want to stay; when the former order a halt, the latter push on. Never a moukri thinks of doing his work, but all together bawl for some one to help them; and when their employer's patience is wearied out, the rascals advance with unblushing face, and ask for a backshish, or present. At length they are off; and the discomforts of the journey begin. One night, after securing, at great expense, a room in a roadside khan, they discover that their apartment is tenanted by a family of poultry. Notwithstanding the expostulations of their host, who protests that no one ever thought of driving his fowls out of doors, the Frenchmen eject their companions; but alas! a hole in the wall renders their labors vain. As fast as the animals are expelled they re-enter, and the travelers are fain to sleep in the midst of a concert of cock-crowing. Next morning three of their horses are missing. The host professes utter astonishment and deep concern; but M. de Saulcy, who seems to have understood the Arab character, presents a pistol to his head, and the lost animals suddenly reappear, all ready harnessed. A few similar adventures mark the journey to Djenin, where M. de Saulcy, with a gallantry which does credit to his age, is vastly smitten with the beauty of the women. Their arms and legs, adorned with massive silver bracelets, he recommends as a useful study to artists.

The road to Jerusalem, if picturesque, does not appear to be quite as safe as travelers might wish. Benighted near Naplouse, Mohammed, the guide, tells his companions, in a jolly tone, to put a bullet in their guns and hurry on. The injunction is scarcely obeyed before the same functionary whispers hurriedly to the Frenchman nearest him, "There they are—see the thieves—let us fall upon them!" No reply being made, Mohammed charges with a furious "Nemchi!" (Come on.) He is challenged by the robbers, but makes no other answer than firing into their midst. A dark form rises, quivers an instant, then falls heavily to the earth. Others emerge from behind bushes and rocks, and scamper into the forest. Mohammed utters the usual anathema: "May Allah curse thee; thee and thy father, and thy father's father!" and returns composedly to his party, after having forced his horse to touch the corpse with his hoof. The deed gave rise to no remorse in the Mussulman's heart; he lit his chibouk, and proceeded on his journey as tranquilly as though his victim had been an insect. An Abbé, who was attached to the expedition, protested lustily against the homicide, but De Saulcy himself, with his usual common sense, viewed it as a clear case of self-defense, and took no more thought on the matter than the authorities of the region.

At last Jerusalem is reached. Like all modern travelers, M. de Saulcy is much dissatisfied with its outward appearance, and complains bitterly of its filthy streets, unsafe pavement, and gloomy aspect. Fortunately he is lodged in a decent hotel, kept by an Englishman, with the un-English name of Meshulam; and the luxury of a clean bed, after the dirt and vermin of the roadside stations, consoles him for other disappointments. His first thought is the prosecution of the main object of his journey; until he has discovered something new, or thrown fresh light on some monument of antiquity, he scarcely ventures to indulge a natural curiosity amidst the relics of the Jewish capital. Even Christmas-day at Bethlehem, with its imposing ceremonies, and striking assemblage of pilgrims from all quarters of the globe, is an enjoyment which he rather blames himself for partaking.

By the 5th January the whole party, reinforced by young De Rothschild, are en route for the Dead Sea. Under the direction of the sheik who was to serve as commandant of the body-guard, a store of presents had been laid in for the Arabs and Bedouins on the way. The list is curious:

Six black cloaks; six white cloaks; twelve pairs of red boots; twenty turbans; ten measures of tobacco; one hundred pipe-bowls; five measures of powder; ten pounds of shot; five hundred needles.

With these peace-offerings, a fair stock of ammunition and money, and high hearts, the travelers cross to Bethlehem, and proceed thence nearly due east to the Dead Sea. On their way they spend a night under the hospitable roof of the monks of Mar-Saba, the successors of the Essenes, that singular tribe of Jews who united the predestinarian notions of Calvin with the communist practices of our contemporary Cabot. On the second day after the departure from Jerusalem the travelers first see the Dead Sea. It is, we are told, an imposing sight, with the Djebel Saba frowning angrily on the south, another ridge of dark mountains sweeping to the horizon on the north, and the torrent Kedron—now called Onad-en-nar—cleaving its way down the mountain sides at their feet. Zealously enough, they hurry their burdened mules down the hill-side, grudging the hour devoted to the collection of botanical and entomological specimens; and take no rest willingly till they stand on the shore. No gloom is there, pious monks and imaginative travelers to the contrary notwithstanding. A beautiful lake, with blue waves dancing in the sunshine, and gently laving a bright sandy beach—such is De Saulcy's description, which confirms, de resto, the narrative of Lieutenant Lynch. The water is so clear that the bottom can be seen at a great distance from the shore; and though patches of dazzling white reveal the superabundance of salt, there is nothing in its color to distinguish it from other limpid lakes. No pestilence is there, for ducks are lazily toying on its surface, just as they do on Lake George; gorgeous insects are fluttering on the shore, and flocks of crows sail grandly from peak to peak among the mountains which border its northern side. Where, asks the scientific Frenchman in triumph, are the marks of death, the fatal effluvia, the grave-like stillness, which travelers have seen on the Dead Sea shore? Yet its name has not been bestowed in error. No living thing that we know of inhabits its waters. Now and then the impetuous torrent of the Kedron, or the Jordan, carries fish into the lake. They struggle a while in the unwholesome fluid, but soon die, and are cast up on the shores. Shellfish fare as badly, and the action of the chemical matter in the water is so powerful as to turn the shells white in a very brief period. It is hardly necessary to observe, however, that the fable about the density of the water being such that no human being or quadruped can wade through it—a story which, to our knowledge, has been current even in Sunday-schools—has no foundation whatever. On the occasion of their second visit to the shore, at the northernmost point of the lake, the whole party cross on horseback to the island Redjona-Louth, with the water nearly as high as their girths. Its taste is bitter and salt. At the southern extremitry, where it is more offensive than at the north, "it resembles common sea water at first, but directly afterward it becomes so nauseous to the palate, lips, and tongue, that one is forced to eject it. It would appear to be a mixture of oil, salt, and coliquintida, and acts, moreover, as a corrosive upon the mucous system, which vainly, for some minutes afterward, endeavors to rid itself of the abominable liquid." A voracious Nubian, who is persuaded by the Frenchmen to swallow a glassful, which he is told is arrack, throws himself upon the ground in frightful contortions, and can scarcely persuade himself that he has not been poisoned.

From the mouth of the Kedron the travelers' route lay almost due south, along the borders of the Asphaltic Lake. The journey was not unattended with peril. Dangerous defiles, abrupt chasms, and narrow paths constantly arrest the cavalcade. One chasm, with sides almost perpendicular, seems at first perfectly impassable to the Europeans. The descent is rapid enough; but the ascent on the other side is no laughing matter. The pedestrians lead the way, clambering over narrow ledges overhanging the abyss. Then come the horses and mules, stumbling and slipping on the smooth bare rock. At one place the ledge, or foot-path, is not more than eighteen inches wide, and winds abruptly round a perpendicular cliff. "The moukris call on the Prophet, begin to weep, shout, and seem as though they were going to tear out their hair by the roots, forgetting that nature has done the work already. One of them, carried away by his anger, abuses Hamdan, the sheik, who, with the utmost composure, prepares to blow his brains out, but relents at the last moment and does nothing." The travelers soon enter the territory of the Sheik Abou-Daouk, and find themselves compelled to choose between being robbed and murdered by his subjects, and hiring their chieftain to escort them through his dominions. They wisely prefer the latter; and a conference is held. The sheik, with his principal men-at-arms, encamps beside the Franks, and begins to parley. He is a strapping fellow, nearly six feet in height, with a muscular frame, aquiline nose, and jolly brown face. His teeth, says De Sauley, resemble the keys of a piano, when he opens his huge mouth to laugh or eat. His eyes are bloodshot from ophthalmia, which the Frenchman has the pleasure of curing. The costume of the lord of the desert does not betoken a flourishing exchequer. A threadbare robe, and still more tattered cloak; a turban, whose color has long since disappeared under sun and rain; and a pair of boots, once red, now shattered and torn into shreds: such is the accoutrement of the potentate who rules the western and southern shores of the Dead Sea. Still, Abou-Daouk is the most respectable of his party. One of his companions has the lean body of a hound, the sharp, piercing black eyes of a terrier, and thin nose and lips like a modern usurer. Another is a savage-looking customer, whose countenance satisfies De Sauley that he would murder father and mother for a dollar. All have horses, and arms in abundance. An hour is spent with these worthy bandits over coffee and chibouks; but every time De Sauley begins to hint at business, a volley of "Entoum thayebin!" (Are you well?) and similar exclamations from the Djahalins interrupts and silences him. It is plain the chiefs will not treat with De Sauley, and Hamdan, the sheik who had accompanied the party from Jerusalem, is compelled to undertake the negotiation in person. After a couple of hours' discussion, it is agreed that Abou-Daouk shall escort the party safely through his realms, being paid at the rate of one dollar a day for his horsemen, and seventy-five cents for his foot soldiers. Fifty dollars extra were to be the perquisite of the sheik himself, if the expedition returned safe.

The party now mustered about forty well-armed men. Fortunately for the Frenchmen, Abou-Daouk, like the jovial highwaymen of former days in England, was true to his word: when danger presented itself, the sheik was the first to affront it. A very few days after he had joined the expedition, the alarm of "Thieves! Abouethats!" was given. Some thirty ill-looking fellows, armed with matchlocks, swords, and clubs were seen on an eminence near the road, evidently bent on mischief. They had, in fact, as the travelers subsequently ascertained, resolved to rob and murder every man of them. Abou-Daouk instantly rode forward, and a parley took place. Appeals to honor or humanity were useless: the sheik simply told the brigands that in thirty seconds they would be killed to the last man. This argument, corroborated by the appearance of the party in order of battle, with arms cocked and pistols in hand, convinced the marauders; they rose, and, instead of blows, offered the kiss of peace to the travelers. The Abouethats were not to be balked, however. A day or two after, the travelers encamped in the heart of their dominions. Sellam, the sheik, was profuse in his hospitalities. Not content with pledging his own life for that of his guests—for which he had bargained to receive a backshish—he brought forth two sheep, which he slaughtered under De Sauley's eyes, and bade his son distribute camel's milk in a filthy wooden porringer. All this seemed friendly enough; and the travelers began to ascribe to jealousy the repeated warnings of Hamdan and Abou-Daouk. But when the hour of departure comes things wear a different aspect. The Abouethats are clamorous for money. Every man screams and howls. The ground reserved for the travelers is invaded, and fierce Abouethats brandish their weapons around the tents. Sellam, the sheik, is as cringing and obsequious as ever; pleads the poverty of his people, and ends with the invariable "Backshish!" De Sauley undertakes to negotiate:

"Thou hast a child: thou must have a wife?"
"I have three."

An exclamation of surprise from the Frenchman.

"I shall soon have four."

Lest these wives should be multiplied before the bargain is closed, De Saulcy hastens to present the sheik with various silver trinkets, rings, seals, a bracelet, a watch, etc.; and he retires content. Directly afterward he reappears and demands "the brother" of the bracelet, which the traveler reluctantly disgorges. He departs again, but is scarcely out of sight before he returns afresh with a sharp query:

"What art thou going to give me for my two sheep and my camel's milk?"

Five hundred piastres—twenty-five dollars—is the price demanded; Hamdan and Abou-Daouk advise payment; the Frenchmen submit, glad enough to be rid of their terrible hosts on any terms.

But if the sheiks suffer their protégés to be robbed by the Ahouethata, they sternly resent any dishonest manoeuvres among their own men. One of Abou-Daouk's Bedouins, being discovered in the act of stealing from a moukri, the whole band set upon him, pelt him with stones, and drive him, half dead, to periah of hunger in the morass. Nor are they wanting in courage when, in their judgment, resistance would be the best policy. While among the Rhaouarnas, the caravan is resting for the night, when a startling noise bursts forth. An Arab shouts, "To your guns!" In a twinkling the little army is arrayed in front of the tents. It is a stirring scene. The dust is flying in every direction—men shout, dogs howl, women scream, travelers and moukris seize the nearest weapon, and prepare to sell their lives as dearly as they can. The guards, under their respective sheiks, are mounted, and can be seen in the distance charging furiously. Some of the younger members of the party evince a strong desire to join them; but De Saulcy prudently forbids any one abandoning the main army. While they are standing round the tent, awaiting their turn for action, the noise ceases, the dust clears away, and in a few moments the Arabs return, their weapons dyed deep red. The story was briefly told. The Rhaouarnas had attacked the camp, and had been defeated with great slaughter.

Meanwhile, M. de Saulcy was reveling in antiquarian researches and discoveries. On the Dead Sea shore, about midway between its northern and southern extremity, he concurs with his predecessors in identifying the ruins of Ayn-Djedy, as the Hazezon-tamar of the Pentateuch, and the yet more famous Engedi of Samuel and the later writers of the Old Testament. This was the place where David hid himself in a cave from the pursuit of Saul, and arose by night, and "cut off the skirt of Saul's robe privily." Ezekiel prophesies that "the fishers shall stand upon it [the bank] from Engedi to En-eglaim; they shall be a place to spread forth nets: their fish shall be according to their kinds, as the fish of the great sea, exceeding many." The day for the fulfilment of this prophecy has not yet come: as was stated above, no fish inhabit the Dead Sea. Ayn-Djedi itself is an immense desert strewed with Arab ruins, but totally destitute of the vines and palm trees which once adorned its face.

A more desolate country than that through which the travelers were passing can not be conceived. Even where the vegetation is luxuriant, it affords little nourishment for man or beast. De Saulcy examined the famous apples of Sodom—

"Those Dead Sea fruits which tempt the eye, But turn to ashes on the lips"— and found, as others had already done, that they were the fruit of a thorny nightshade, which when ripe, emitted, under pressure, thousands of small black grains not unlike ashes. Even the salt which borders the lake is frequently useless. The patriarch Abraham—thus runs the story—once came as usual to the Birket-el-Khalil to purchase his store of salt. The dealers said they had none to sell, though the heaps lying around them belied the assertion. In his wrath the patriarch cursed the place, and foretold that there should be no more salt found there. Ever afterward the crystalline particles resembling salt were found, on examination, to be of the consistency of stone, and insoluble in water.

Pursuing their southerly march, the travelers reach the ruins of Masada, and read once more Josephus's account of its fearful siege by the Romans, when the Jewish garrison, rather than surrender, slaughtered their wives and children with their own hands, and then chose ten out of their number to put their comrades to death. The ten performed their fearful task without finching, and deputed to one of their survivors the duty of immolating them. This too was done; and the last man having assured himself that he alone out of the whole garrison still breathed, fired the citadel, and threw himself on his sword. These interesting ruins had already been introduced to the American public by the Rev. Mr. Wolcott and Captain Lynch, who visited them in 1842 and 1848 respectively. M. de Saulcy handsomely acknowledges that he has but followed in the footsteps of these American travelers.

On the 12th January the travelers reach the Djebel-Sdoum, or Mountain of Salt, which lies nearly at the southern extremity of the Dead Sea. It is a solid mass of salt, varying in height, but never exceeding one hundred yards. Gray at the base, streaks of green and red vary the color toward the summit; where a layer of clay covers a portion of the surface. Fissures, hollowed out by the winter streams, and vast caverns with yawning mouths, are frequent in the sides of the hill. On the spot occupied by this mountain, M. de Saulcy locates the once famous city of Sodom, and adduces in support of his hypothesis a mass of evidence as well from the sacred writings as from profane authors and local traditions. The main apparent difficulty was the popular belief that, after Sodom and the other cities of the Pentapolis had been destroyed by fire from heaven, they were submerged under the Dead Sea, and that their ruins had even been seen by travelers when the waters were low and clear. This story M. de Sauley dismisses as apocryphal and entirely unworthy of belief. It is wholly unsupported by scriptural or other authentic record; and rests, like the other tales about the Dead Sea, on the fables of poets. Our ingenious traveler quotes largely from historians from the time of Moses to that of Josephus, to show that the destruction of Sodom was always mentioned as having been effected by means of fire alone; and infers, reasonably enough, that since neither the biblical writers, nor such careful geographers as Strabo and Masoudy, have alluded to the inundation which is believed by some to have overwhelmed the Pentapolis, it is safe to conclude that no such catastrophe ever took place. A calculation of distances, and a careful collation of the ancient writers, are the main supports of the theory which places Sodom on the site of the Salt Mountain; and in the absence of rebutting testimony, we need not quarrel with the hypothesis. Zoar, which the history of Lot shows us was only some few miles—De Sauley supposes a league—from Sodom, he places at that distance to the north of the Salt Mountain. It is full as likely that it stood there as near the mountain El Mezraah in the land of Moab, where Dr. Robinson and other travelers have located it. Zeboim, another of the condemned cities, De Sauley places on the east shore of the Dead Sea, behind the mountains of Moab, near a spot now called Sebaan. The evidence in this case, though not so full or so circumstantial as in that of Sodom, is still plausible. On still slighter grounds, he conjectures that the ruins which lie to the northeast of Zoar, at a distance of some miles from the lake, may have formed part of the condemned city of Admah.

Some time elapses before any trace of Gomorrah is found. At length, the sight of extensive ruins extending over a space not less than four of our miles, on the northwest corner of the Lake, and at a distance of seventy-five miles from Sodom, attract the travelers' attention. That there has been, at some time or other, a vast city there, the extent and character of the ruins places beyond a doubt: the name given by the Arabs to the spot—Kharbet-Goumran, or the ruins of Goumran—is of itself sufficiently suggestive. If this be not Gomorrah, how does it happen that no historian or traveler affords any clue to the name of so important a town? The wreck of towers, pavilions, and inclosures of various kinds, are visible on every side; no antiquary can doubt but the skeleton of a populous city lies under the ashes and debris. What large city ever stood there unless it be Gomorrah? This reasoning is satisfactory to M. de Sauley; and, to say the least, his surmise is full as plausible as that of Lieutenant Van Der Velde, who saw the spot the year after, and pronounced the so-called ruins to be nothing but heaps of volcanic stones.

Here, then, we have located four of the great cities whose awful destruction is recorded in Genesis. How was their ruin effected? We read in the Pentateuch (Gen. xix. 24, 25): "And the Lord rained upon Sodom and Gomorrah brimstone and fire from the Lord, out of heaven; and he overthrew these cities, and all the plain, and all the inhabitants of the cities, and that which grew upon the ground." Abraham beheld the catastrophe, and saw "the smoke of the country rising up as the smoke of a furnace." The sacred writer, in another place (Deut. xxix. 28), says that "the land is brimstone, and salt, and burning; that it is not sown, nor any grass growth therein." Similar expressions are found in the New Testament, and profane writers of antiquity. All travelers concur in representing the entire shore of the Dead Sea as bearing evident traces of volcanic origin. M. de Sauley noticed frequently craters of extinct volcanoes, and the words of Deuteronomy point distinctly to the condition of a country undergoing a process of volcanic transformation. Vast mounds of ashes, heaps of lava, large masses of salt and other materials, impregnated with brimstone, are found from the Kharbet-Goumran the whole way to the land of Moab, on the eastern coast of the Dead Sea. The inference is obvious, that the destruction of the Pentapolis was effected by means of a tremendous volcanic eruption, or rather, the simultaneous eruption of a multitude of volcanoes. We may judge of the magnitude of the catastrophe from a comparison with other eruptions. The overflow of lava from Vesuvius, when Pompeii and Herculaneum were overwhelmed, barely extended, in any direction, six or seven miles from the crater: here, the hand of the Destroyer reached from Gomorrah, on the northwestern shore of the Lake, to Zeboim on the southeastern—a distance of one hundred and twenty miles at least, and annihilated every thing between these two points.

The theory of a volcanic eruption or convulsion affords a plausible mode of explaining the destruction of Lot's wife. The biblical account says, briefly, that "Lot entered into Zoar . . . But his wife looked back from behind him, and she became a pillar of salt" (Gen. xix. 26). Many commentators have found it necessary to presume a special miracle to explain this passage; and have insisted that the "pillar" must have been round, erect, and smooth, or fluted with a regular capital; just such a pillar, in fact, as we might raise in a colonnade. M. de Sauley—no mean Hebraist—gives a greater latitude to the original word; and supposes that Lot's wife, lingering behind to watch the fearful upheaving of the Salt Mountain, may have been crushed by one of the falling masses; so that, when her husband turned round, he beheld nothing but "a pillar" or a mound "of salt."

How sublime, how awful a spectacle the catastrophe of that day! So terrible, that the memory thereof has not departed from the Arabs of the Dead Sea shore to this day. When a storm burst over its leaden surface, and the last rays of the setting sun shed gleams of fire on the summits of the mountains of Moab, whose base was wrapped in pitchy blackness, the awful grandeur of the seeming conflagration smote those sons of the desert with sudden terror, and they exclaimed, "God is smiting Sodom!"

M. de Saulcy and his companions push on to the Land of Moab, and reach the well-known city of Kerak. The rapacity and villainy of the sheiks and people of Kerak are already familiar to American readers. Lieutenant Lynch was obliged to force his way out of the place musket in hand; and to secure his safety afterward, he led the sheik with him, between two of his men, who had orders to shoot him remorselessly on the slightest disturbance. This same fellow, with his family, descended with a swoop upon the French expedition, and set to plundering them. We can not but regret that M. de Saulcy did not follow our countryman's example, or at least punish some one of the villains, who seem to live exclusively on rapine. The curse of Moab has been but too truly fulfilled. Escaped out of their hands with the loss of all the spare cash they had and a number of valuable articles, the Frenchmen made the best of their way back to Jerusalem. The same troubles as they met on their journey eastward awaited them on their return. One day, near the Souk-el-Thaemeh, a band of brigands burst from the thicket in advance of the caravan, and advanced with their firelocks ready. The gallant Abou-Daouk was, as usual, the first to dash off to their rencontre. When he was within speaking distance, he made the following pithy address to the robbers: "I say, men, there is meat for your teeth here, but there is also meat that will not suit your teeth." This quaint allusion to the double-barreled guns of the party satisfied the marauders, who disappeared as deftly as they had emerged from their fastness. One can hardly help thinking that a crusade among these ghouls of the desert would do the world a vast deal of good. But in these regions nature is as formidable as the brigands. Now, one of the travelers is bitten by a scorpion, and narrowly escapes dying of the bite. At another time a horse and man are engulfed in the morass, and the united strength of the moukris is barely sufficient to extricate them from the miry slough. Fevers hang over the damp recesses where the expedition encamps; bruises are the least penalty of clambering through ravines and over ruins.

On the other hand, a rich field of antiquarian discovery rewards the zealous travelers. The tombs of the kings of Judah afford employment for many a busy day. Hebron—where the graves of the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are said to exist, and where we know that Sarah was buried—a city bearing some resemblance to Jerusalem, can well repay a few days of fatigue and inconvenience. Every biblical student, every man of feeling, would undergo some pain and some trouble to walk under rows of olive trees which were planted before the Christian era, and in whose shade it is more than probable that the Saviour and his disciples have rested. Then there is the village of El-Aazarieh (the ancient Bethany), where Lazarus was raised, and which derives its modern name, according to M. de Saulcy, from that miracle; several mounds of ruins and decayed cities competing for the honor of occupying the site of famous Jericho; the turbid, yellow stream of the Jordan, swollen by the rains, rushing impetuously between lovely banks, covered with poplars, willows, and other trees, and almost baffling the traveler's attempt to obtain a bottle of its precious waters; Zerayn, now a dirty village, once the flourishing Jezeel, where Naboth trained his vines, and the blood of the wicked Jezebel was "licked by dogs," who left of her nothing but the skull, the feet, and the palms of her hands; the nameless ruins of Chorazin and Bethsaida, at once recalling the dread curse of the gospels; the doomed city of Safed, unknown to biblical history, but painfully celebrated by massacres of Christians in former ages, and murderous earthquakes in modern times: all these, and many other spots, richly fraught with legendary lore and historic interest, could well recompense the traveler for the anxieties and perils of the journey. We can not pity M. de Saulcy when he describes sufferings and privations which were recompensed by so noble a return.

CAPTAIN OBSTINATE.

ONE fine evening in the month of July, an old soldier of the "grand army," who had left one of his arms on the field of battle, was seated at the door of his pretty cottage. He was surrounded by a group of young villagers, who were clamorously reminding him of his promise to tell them some of his military adventures. After a moment of pretended resistance to their wishes, the old man took his pipe from his mouth, passed the back of his remaining hand across his lips, and thus commenced his tale:

"In my time, my friends, the French would have disdained to fight against Frenchmen in the streets, as they do in these days. No, no, when we fought it was for the honor of France, and against her foreign enemies. But my story commences on the 6th of November, 1812, a short time after the battle of Wiazma. We beat a retreat, not before the Russians, for they were at a respectful distance from our camp, but before the sharp and bitter cold of their detestable country, a cold more terrible to us than the Russians, Austrians, and Bavarians all put together.

"During the preceding days our officers had told us that we were approaching Smolensko, where we should get food, fire, brandy, and shoes; but in the mean time we were perishing in the glaciers, and continually harassed by the Cossacks. We had marched for six hours wi-out stopping to take breath, for we knew that repose was certain death. An icy wind blew the drifting snow in our faces, and from time to time we stumbled over the frozen corpse of a comrade. We neither spoke nor sang, even complaints were no longer heard, and that was a bad sign. I marched by the side of my captain; short, strongly built, rough, and severe, but brave and true as the blade of his sword; we called him 'Captain Obstinate;' for when once he said a thing, it was fixed; he never changed his opinions. He had been wounded at Wiazma, and his usually crimson face was then ghastly pale, while a ragged white handkerchief, all stained with blood, was bound round his head, and added to the pallor of his countenance. All at once I saw him stagger on his legs like a drunken man, then fall like a block to the ground.

"Morbleu! captain," said I, bending over him, 'you can not remain here.'

"You see that I can, since I do it," replied he, showing his legs.

"Captain," said I, 'you must not give way;' lifting him in my arms, I tried to put him on his feet. He leaned on me, and attempted to walk, but in vain; he fell again, dragging me with him.'

"Jobin," said he, 'all is over. Leave me here, and rejoin your company as quickly as possible. One word before you go: at Voreppe, near Grenoble, lives a good woman, eighty-two years of age, my—my mother. Go and see her, embrace her for me, and tell her that—that—tell her what you will, but give her this purse and my cross. It is all I have! Now go.'

"Is that all, captain?"

"That is all. God bless you! Make haste. Adieu!" My friends, I do not know how it was, but I felt two tears roll down my cheeks.

"No, captain," I cried, 'I will not leave you; either you come with me, or I will remain with you.'

"I forbid you to remain."

"You may put me under arrest then if you like, but at present you must let me do as I please."

"You are an insolent fellow."

"Very good, captain, but you must come with me." He bit his lips with rage, but said no more. I lifted him, and carried him on my shoulders like a sack. You can easily imagine that with such a burden, I could not keep pace with my comrades. In fact, I soon lost sight of their columns, and could discern nothing around me but the white and silent plain. I still walked on, when presently appeared a troop of Cossacks galloping toward me, with furious gesticulations and wild cries.

"The captain was by this time completely insensible, and I resolved, whatever it might cost me, not to abandon him. I laid him down on the ground, and covered him with snow; then I crept beneath a heap of dead bodies, leaving, however, my eyes at liberty. Presently the Cossacks came up, and began to strike with their lances right and left, while their horses trampled us under their feet. One of these heavy beasts set his foot upon my right arm, and crushed it. My friends, I did not speak, I did not stir; I put my right hand into my mouth to stifle the cry of torture which nearly escaped from me, and in a few minutes the Cossacks had dispersed.

"When the last of them had disappeared, I quitted my refuge, and proceeded to disinter the captain. To my joy he gave some signs of life; I contrived to carry him with my one arm toward a rock which offered a sort of shelter, and then I laid myself by his side, wrapping my cloak round us both.

"The night had closed in, and the snow continued to fall.

"The rear-guard had long since disappeared, and the only sound that broke the stillness of the night was the whistle of a ballet, or the howling of the wolves feasting on the corpse that lay stretched around. God knows what thoughts passed through my soul during that dreadful night, which, I felt sure, would be my last upon earth. But I remembered the prayer which my mother had taught me long before, when I was a child at her knee, and bending low, I repeated it with fervor.

"My children, that did me good, and remember always that a sincere and fervent prayer is sure to comfort you. I felt astonishingly calmed when I returned to my place by the captain. But the time passed, and I had fallen into a state of half stupor, when I saw a group of French officers approach. Before I had time to speak to them, their chief, a little man, dressed in a furred pelisse, stepped forward toward me, and said—

"What are you doing here? Why are you away from your regiment?"

"For two good reasons," said I, pointing first to the captain, and then to my bleeding arm.

"The man says true, Sire," said one of those who followed him; 'I saw him marching in the rear of his regiment, and carrying this officer on his back.'

"The Emperor—for, my friends, it was he!—gave me one of those glances that only he, or the eagle of the Alps, could give, and said: 'It is well. You have done very well.' Then opening his pelisse, he took the cross which decorated his green coat, and gave it to me. At that instant I was no longer hungry, no longer cold; I felt no more pain from my arm than if that awkward beast had never touched it.

"Davoust," added the Emperor, addressing the officer who had spoken to him, 'see this man and his captain placed in one of the baggage-wagons. Adieu!' And making me a motion of the hand, he went away."

Here the veteran ceased, and resumed his pipe.

"But tell us what became of 'Captain Obstinate,'" cried many impatient voices.

"The captain recovered, and is now a general on the retired list. But the best of the joke was, that as soon as he got well, he put me under arrest for fifteen days, as a punishment for my infraction of discipline.

"This circumstance came to the ears of Napoleon, and after laughing heartily, he not only caused me to be set free, but promoted me to the rank of sergeant. As to the decoration, my children, here is the ribbon at my button-hole, but the cross I wear next my heart."

And opening his vest, he showed his eager audience the precious relic, suspended from his neck in a little satin bag.

PERSONAL MEMOIRS OF THE HOUSE OF ROMANOFF.

AT the close of the sixteenth and beginning of the seventeenth century, that is to say, while European exiles were thinking of founding a settlement on the wilderness on which New York now stands; while Elizabeth of England was flirting with courtiers thirty years younger than herself, and James I. was "slobbering" the cheeks of his favorites; while the gallant Henry IV. was endeavoring to naturalize tolerance in France by enacting the Edit de Nantes, in spite of Jesuit fury and threats of Ravillac's knife; while Philip II. was gnashing his teeth at the failure of the Spanish Armada, and his imbecile son was trying, after his fashion, to better his country by expelling her most industrious citizens, the Moors and the Jews; while a few enterprising British merchants were freighting ships for Hindostan under their newly-obtained title of the East India Company; and while Spaniards, Portuguese, and Dutch were cutting each others' throats about the lands they had stolen from the natives of South America—about this time, the empire of Moscow and all the Russias was in a most deplorable condition. Feodor, the last descendant of the Rurik dynasty, which had ruled Russia for seven hundred and twenty years, had died childless. The government had fallen a prey to any adventurer who had nerve to seize the sceptre, and money to pay the armed bandits who lorded it over the citizens of Moscow. Boyards, Poles, and Swedes successively usurped the throne and ground the people to the earth, until, in their turn, they were subverted and murdered by bolder and more successful scoundrels than themselves. The legitimate heir to the throne, and the heir of the Ruriks, Dmitri, had been assassinated by an ambitious noble named Boris Godonoff. No less than four impostors arose claiming to be the murdered Dmitri; and such was the innate loyalty of the Russians, that each obtained a large measure of popular support. Conflicts between these aspirants to the crown and the usurpers who held Moscow—frightful dissensions in every province, every village of the empire—unparalleled misery and distress in every form—are the materials for the history of Russia from 1584 to 1618. At the close of this fearful period of anarchy, the outskirts of the empire of the Ruriks were in the possession of Swedes, Poles, Turks, Persians, and Cossacks; several important provinces had altogether thrown off their allegiance to Moscow; the soldiers were unpaid; the treasury was empty; the court was a scene of perpetual bloody intrigues; the whole civil service was disorganized. In their misery, a large number of the Russian nobles offered the throne to the King of Poland; but while negotiations were pending, a butcher of Novogorod succeeded in arousing a sentiment of nationality among his countrymen, and a vigorous effort was made to shake off the Polish yoke. Prince Pojarski led the Russians, and the Poles were driven from Moscow. The victorious army then determined to elect a Czar. Notice was sent to every province in the empire; and the nobility, the clergy, and the burgesses were summoned to send deputies to Moscow to the election. The whole transaction appears to have been conducted with perfect fairness.

For many years the Romanoffs had been one of the leading families of Muscovy. Sprung from an adventurer—claimed alike by Prussia, Germany, and Normandy—who settled in Russia about the middle of the fourteenth century, they had, by their talents and patriotism, commanded a predominating influence in the councils of the Czars. An attempt has recently been made to show that the original Romanoff, whose name was Andrew Kobyla, was of noble extraction, and allied to royal houses; but this foolish endeavor to gratify the pride of the Russian monarchs has not disclosed any facts worthy of historic notice. There is no evidence to show that Andrew Kobyla was any thing but a foreign emigrant. The virtues and talents of his descendants for three centuries would lead an impartial observer to infer that the blood which flowed in his veins was not tainted by any infiltration of royalty. At all events, of whatever lineage he sprang, the bearers of his name under the last of the Ruriks attained eminent rank and wide popularity. Not the least conspicuous of the house was Feodor, whose patriotism was deemed so formidable by the usurper Boris Godonoff, that he persecuted his family with unrelenting rancor, and forced both himself and his wife to become ecclesiastics. Public opinion compelled his successor to elevate the illustrious victim of tyranny to the dignity of Metropolitan of Rostoff; he was subsequently sent to Poland in the capacity of ambassador, which office he filled when the Russians, urged by the butcher of Novogorod, determined to elect a native ruler.

The Council—composed of nobles, clergy, and burgesses, or citizens proper—assembled in Lent, 1618. Three army officers were the most prominent candidates for the suffrages of the electors. All three had taken an active part in the troubles of the last twenty years, and were on many grounds obnoxious to the nation. It is probable that some glimmering of the dangers of military rule penetrated the Council; for, after several days of stormy debate, their choice fell at last upon Michael Romanoff, son of the ambassador to Poland, whose family had suffered much for the country, and whose father, though absent, was the most respected citizen of Russia.

Michael or Mikhail Romanoff was at that time at the convent of Kostroma with his mother. Though but seventeen years of age, he had spent many years in exile and in prison: his brothers had languished and died under the cruelty of Boris: his father, though clothed with the sacred quality of ambassador, had been thrust into a Polish dungeon the moment the news of the Russian movement had reached Warsaw. Misfortune had saddened the minds of both Michael and his mother. They declined the offer of the national Council, and begged the deputation that waited upon them at Kostroma to select some worthier person to fill the office of Czar. But Archbishop Theodorste and the deputies of the Council had resolved to hear of no refusal. They skillfully wrought upon the religious feelings of the young Romanoff and his mother: reminded them that henceforth they were answerable to God for the welfare of Russia: employed all the awe-inspiring forms of the Greek Church to shake their resolution; and finally succeeded in extorting from both a promise to submit themselves to "the will of Heaven, as declared by the voice of the Russian people."

In April of the same year, Michael, the founder of the Romanoff dynasty, was crowned at Moscow. On his coronation, he was required to swear that he would protect the Greek religion; that he would grant an unconditional amnesty to the persecutors of his father; that he would make no new law, change no old one, decide nothing by himself, but cause every man to be judged according to the laws and customs of the empire; that he would not make war or declare peace without the consent of the nation; finally, that he would resign all his personal estates either to his family or to the State. These oaths he took; and it is well worthy of remark that the limitations they constitute were imposed on the monarch of Russia at a time when England, France, and Spain peaceably submitted to forms of monarchy which were all more or less absolute. They may, moreover, be profitably contrasted with the system of monarchy established in Russia nearly a hundred years later by Peter the Great, and preserved by his successors to the present day.

Michael Romanoff reigned thirty-two years over Russia. Materials for his biography are wanting. We know that he contrived to make peace with the Poles and the Swedes, at the expense of provinces which Peter the Great and his successors spent much blood in regaining; that he prohibited the use of tobacco as injurious to the human frame, and issued a ukase—somewhat similar to our Maine Liquor Law—against intoxicating beverages; that he recalled his father from his dungeon in Poland, and associated him with himself in the government of the kingdom; finally, that he acquired extensive popularity among his subjects. His father's wisdom, combined with his own moderation, inspired a policy which was well calculated to reconcile the Russians to the dynasty of which he was the root. His marriages—especially the latter—are the only events of his life, after his accession, which historians have thought it worth while to record. His first wife dying, public notice was given throughout the empire that the Czar intended to marry again, and all eligible young ladies were invited to attend at the palace at a fixed time. The assembled candidates were respectfully received by officers of the household, and entertained for several days, during which the Czar mingled with them in disguise, endeavoring to discover their character and qualities. It would seem that his inspection was not confined to the daylight, a tranquil sleep being deemed as essential a qualification for a Czarina, as a sweet disposition or a docile temper. The examination resulted in the choice of a lady named Streckner, whose father was surprised by the bearers of the welcome news in the act of digging in his field. This singular method of choosing a wife was long in use in Russia; and, as a general rule, it appears to have answered quite as well as the more refined practice of later years.

It seems as though Nature could not endure two good monarchs in succession. Those "happy accidents," as Alexander justly called them, are only thrown in at long intervals, just to prove the rule by furnishing the exception. Michael's son, Alexis, who succeeded to the throne, is proudly mentioned by modern Russian writers as a monarch who rose above paltry considerations of the people's welfare, and gave a tone to imperial despotism. One of the most disreputable nobles of his father's court was named Morosof—a man destitute of character, principle, and talents, and only known by a reputation for unequalled ferocity: him he chose for his guide, counselor, and friend. Tyrant-like, the favorite set to work to strengthen the standing army, and increase the number of the strelitz or mercenary body-guards. From this, he passed to the sale of offices. Morosof kept a market for every thing which should not be sold. He had his price for the judgment of every court in the empire: life, property, and virtue were all regularly bought and sold at his counter. As some of the judges declined to serve him as promptly as his business required, he kept in his pay a body of perjurers, who were hired to swear any thing at his bidding. No petition could reach the Czar without passing through his hands; his perquisites on this branch of his duties were enormous. Not satisfied, however, with absorbing the whole judicial and administrative powers of the empire, and trafficking therein as he would have done in merchandise, he obtained from the Czar a monopoly of the trade in leather, salt, and several other necessities of life. The cost of living was instantly trebled; and the people, who had borne patiently the brutal violence of the strelitz and the incredible corruptions of the court, could not endure starvation in silence. A fierce tumult arose. Crowds of famished mechanics rushed to the palace, overpowered the guards, and called for the head of the author of their troubles, the boyard Morosof. The Czar vainly endeavored to appease their fury by surrendering one of the judges, whose decisions the favorite had been in the habit of selling. The unhappy wretch was instantly torn to pieces; and his colleague shortly afterward shared his fate. A friend of Morosof, who had purchased from him the monopoly of salt, was found in his bed, and beaten to death with clubs. Fearing at length for his own safety, the Czar repealed the monopolies, gave to the mob what they most needed—a supply of food—and entreated them for this time to spare the life of his friend Morosof. His prayer was granted. The miscreant withdrew to his country palace, and lived in splendor on the spoils of the nation.

It has been pretended that Alexis was guiltless of the crimes of his favorite. Charity itself could not construe his subsequent acts favorably. A miserable fanatic, whose very name is a matter of dispute, bethought himself of emulating the imposture of the pseudo-Dmitri, who, before the election of Michael Romanoff, had set up claims upon the Russian throne. It does not appear that he ever collected a respectable body of adherents, or rendered himself in any way formidable to Alexis. Almost the first thing we hear of him is his flight to Poland, and his expulsion from thence by request of the Czar. His whole adventures consist of a series of escapes from the pursuit of Alexis: a more contemptible pretender never lived. Driven from Warsaw to Sweden, from thence to Germany; declared an outcast every where, he finally sought a refuge in the dominions of the Duke of Holstein. It so happened—the circumstance paints the age and the country—that some years previously an ambassador from Holstein had borrowed money of the Czar: the debt was still unpaid. It weighed heavily on the mind of the Duke, whose exchequer was by no means flourishing, and who constantly dreaded lest Alexis should seize a village or two, or an odd hundred of his subjects, by way of satisfaction. Rejoiced indeed was he when the Czar offered to release the debt in exchange for the surrender of the fugitive, seu-disant Dmitri. Bound hand and foot, he was instantly forwarded with all speed to Moscow; where, in presence of the Czar and his nobles, his limbs were cut off one by one by the public executioner, and his head severed from his mutilated trunk. Alexis then slept soundly.

His slumbers were not destined to last long. Deprived of the resources he had formerly derived from Morosof's corruptions, this sagacious prince hit upon a most ingenious scheme for filling the treasury. A formal ukase enacted that thenceforth the copper copeck should pass current for the same value as the old silver coin. Needless to add that in a very few weeks trade was brought to a stand—all commodities had risen tenfold in price—and the utmost misery prevailed in Moscow. The plague had just visited the capital with peculiar virulence; and no sooner had the scourge of God been removed than that of the Czar began to be felt. Then the old Muscovite spirit arose again: some such stalwart plebeian as the butcher of Novogorod leading his townsmen with a knife or a billet of wood in his strong hand. Ten or twelve thousand there were—ready at any moment to die for their Czar, or to allow themselves to be plundered and bullied by his guards—but calling, in God's name, for bread for themselves and their children. No weapons had they but such as they could seize on their own hearth-stones or by the road-side: as angrily, riotously no doubt, they poured from the city to the fortress whither Alexis had fled on the first news of the disturbance. One long shout apprized him of their business. Some fellow, more outspoken than the rest, boldly denounced the courtiers who had advised the fatal measure of tampering with the currency; and did not even spare the household of the Czar in his indignant remonstrance. Alexis strove to gain time. Orders had already been given for the concentration of troops round the fortress; they were gathering fast. Gently and paternally did the Czar rebuke the mob for their unreasonable impatience under the throes of starvation; promising that in due time he would look into the matter, and try to make all right. We can readily fancy what our feelings would be, if, after enduring want and every description of suffering for months, our fury burst forth at last, and the head of the government, the author of our grievances, were to tell us quietly that he would look into the matter. A second shout, more vehement doubtless than the first, announced to the Czar that the starving people could not wait. Troops now surrounded the mob, and Alexis gave the signal. The strelitz fell upon the unfortunate Muscovites with the rage of wild beasts. Unarmed, huddled together in a confused mass, no resistance was possible: a frightful carnage ensued. The whole body was dispersed; and a second assemblage, cowed by the fate of their comrades, surrendered several hundred of their number to the executioner, and sadly returned to their homes.

It is instructive to read the account given of this affair by the monarchical historian Levesque, a man, be it said, of vast erudition, large capacity, and, in other respects, sound and impartial judgment. After describing the cause of the riot, and the journey of the mob to the palace, he adds: "The Czar showed himself to the rebels, who dared to demand that several courtiers who were accused of causing their calamities—among others, Alexis's own father-in-law—should be delivered up to them. The Czar, always inclined to clemency, tried to appease the rioters by gentle means. He addressed them rather as a mediator or a friend than as an angry prince. He condescended to point out that he himself would be culpable were he to surrender any one without a full examination; that he was alike the father of the accusers and the accused, and that, until the condemnation of the latter, both parties had equal claims on his goodness; and promised that he would closely look into the matters of which they complained, and severely punish the guilty. He then presented the princess his wife and his son to the crowd, and bade them bear witness of his engagement. The rioters, convinced that the gentle language of the Czar was an indication of fear, replied by seditious cries. Then the Prince, seeing that they could only be subdued by force, gave the signal to the officers of his household and the strelitz. They were drawn up in order of battle, and instantly fell upon the disorderly and ill-armed crowd, and committed great slaughter. . . . The defeat was scarcely over when three thousand more insurgents appeared, who, hearing the fate of their comrades, threw down their arms, and begged as a favor to be sent to Siberia. A few hundred of them were hanged, and tranquillity was re-established." This was written and printed a few years before the French revolution.

The Czars of the line of Rurik had frequently exercised a pretty tolerable despotism over their subjects, whom they murdered, robbed, and exiled very much as they chose. Some crude notions of popular rights had sprung up, as we have seen, during the interregnum. Alexis resolved not only to place matters on the old footing, but to surpass the most tyrannical of his predecessors in tyranny. He established a secret tribunal, called the Little Chancery, before which any obnoxious person could be dragged, and sentenced to death without the knowledge of any one but the victim, the judge, and the executioner. The most curious feature of the proceedings of this Russian Inquisition was, that private citizens could use it as well as the monarch. Its police were every where; and it was only necessary to utter a few mysterious words, and to point at any individual, to have him seized and immured in the dungeons of the Chancery. To give an appearance of fairness, accuser and accused were both imprisoned; and by way of eliciting the truth, the knot was administered to both until one or the other gave way, and confessed that he was in the wrong. It is not easy to understand how people could have been induced to avail themselves of the privilege afforded by such a tribunal; but whether Alexis used it for his own purposes, and collusion existed between the executioner and the accusers or not, certain it is that prominent citizens were constantly summoned before it, and numbers perished in its mysterious chambers. It was considered one of the most abominable fruits of despotism, and Catherine the Second derived great fame from its final abolition.

While the Little Chancery was doing its work, and Alexis was assisting it by wandering about at night in disguise, questioning people on their political views, and thus treacherously marking out victims for his vengeance, the Czar evinced considerable vigor in more worthy occupations. He coveted the throne of Poland, and would probably have obtained it, had it not been for the valor and skill of John Sobieski. He opened a regular intercourse with several European monarchs, and was the means of drawing the attention of the West to Russia. He had the gold mines opened and worked, and superintended the construction of the two first ships built in Russia. He graciously provided a small pittance for the support of the exiles to Siberia. But these public cares did not alter the native narrowness of his mind or the cruelty of his disposition. Shortly before his death, his physician advised him to be bled. He capriciously ordered that all his courtiers should be bled likewise. One old man, a faithful general, whose brow bore many a scar, and whose blood had been freely shed on the battle-field, demurred at this preposterous request; Alexis heaped the most violent abuse on his head, and was with difficulty restrained from beating him on the spot. Thus alternating between domestic violence and public energy; as anxious for the advancement of Russia as for the destruction of the rights of the Russian people, Alexis terminated his reign at the age of forty-seven, having held the sceptre for thirty-one years. It is said that his death was caused by that very obstinacy which was so fatal to the welfare of his subjects. He steadily refused to listen to the advice of his physicians, and would hear of no attendant but an old woman who pretended to be a witch, and undertook to cure him with magic charms.

Alexis had married twice. By his first wife he had two sons, Feodor and Ivan, and six daughters, one of whom, the Princess Sophia, occupies a conspicuous place in history; by his second he had one son, Peter, afterward Peter the Great, and one daughter. Alexis's body was hardly in the grave when a furious contest arose between these two families for his succession. By the law of primogeniture, which was that of the Russian empire, the right of Feodor, and after him his brother Ivan, was incontestable. But, in the first place, this first principle of the hereditary system has been set aside in Russia as often as it has been followed; and in the second, there were, in the present case, peculiar reasons why neither Feodor nor Ivan should succeed to the throne. The former was sickly, and not likely to live; the latter was nearly blind, nearly deaf, and wholly imbecile. On these grounds the Narishkins, a powerful family, to which Alexis's second wife belonged, claimed the throne for their kinsman, young Peter, then three years old. Had they had no more formidable opponents than Feodor and Ivan, they would probably have succeeded in their design; unfortunately for them, the Princess Sophia supplied what her brothers lacked in masculine vigor and unscrupulous ambition. She divided Moscow with the Narishkins. As usual in civil contests, whichever side the troops espoused was sure of victory. Sophia secured the strelitz, and the Narishkins were forced to submit to the coronation of Feodor.

The life of the third Czar of the Romanoff dynasty is as insignificant as that of the first. He had an able counselor, Prince Galitsin; he did nothing himself; and these two merits have earned him the praise of historians. Illness left him little time to think of government. His marriage to a Polish lady, in opposition to the wishes of the boyards, led to a contest which exhausted what little energy he had, and he met death thankfully in the sixth year of his reign.

The quarrels of the Narishkins with the Princess Sophia then broke out afresh. The latter, with undiminished energy, urged the claims of her idiot brother Ivan, and offered to accept the regency herself; the former, with a strong show of right this time, put forward Peter, a fine boy of ten years old. The sense of the nation, so far as it was manifested, was on the side of Peter; but the strelitz, won by the largesses, and also, it is said, by the beauty and eloquence of Sophia, were ready to go any lengths in favor of their mistress. Peter's party becoming formidable, the Princess resolved to strike a blow which should be final. A report was spread that the Narishkins intended to murder Ivan; money and brandy were freely distributed to the troops; unequivocal hints of plunder were thrown out to the bandit-strelitz; and when all was prepared for the explosion, the signal was given by Sophia herself. The strelitz were let loose, and rushed like wolves to the palace of the Narishkins. It was sacked. The brothers of Natalia, Peter's mother, were massacred, with sixty of their friends and kinsmen. Sophia rode furiously to and fro among the riotous soldiery, urging them to complete their work. Her angelic features wore a demoniac expression; she was not satisfied. The prey had escaped her. While the strelitz were tearing down the door of the palace, Natalia had escaped on foot, with her son Peter in her arms. The city was overrun by drunken, brutal soldiers. She flew with the wings of fear through the narrowest streets and the suburbs to the country. It was winter; the snow was falling thick. Natalia took to the fields, and quickened her pace to reach a shelter. Soon her strength began to fail. The cold began to tell upon her ill-clad form. She hardly knew whither she was going. Still she struggled onward, praying earnestly that God, who had saved her son from the sword of the strelitz, would shield him from the blast of the north wind and the terrors of the cold. Her limbs were nearly failing, when she heard behind her the footsteps of horsemen. She was pursued. They had tracked her. The horrible truth gave her new energy. Clasp her child closer to her breast, and uttering a mental prayer, she runs through the snow with a speed which still leaves some distance between her and her pursuers. The race, however, can not last long. Well-mounted soldiers, thirsting for blood, are sure to overtake a poor broken-hearted woman, overburdened with a child. They are at her heels, shouting and menacing, when the Convent of the Trinity—a refuge for the worst malefactors—opens its door to the fugitive. She has just strength to enter the aisle, hasten to the altar, and deposit her precious burden upon its steps. Here at length, she thinks, is safety. Murder they would commit, but sacrilege!—Absurd to suppose that a soldier of the strelitz knew any scruple! In they rush, scarce a moment after Natalia, their swords drawn, their eyes flashing, their mouths vomiting menace and imprecation. A single bound, and the foremost stands on the steps of the altar; his weapon is raised; Peter's life is not worth a moment's purchase. Natalia springs forward, seizes the soldier's arm, and asks him, with noble indignation, how he dares kill his Czar? The soldier turns fiercely from the child to the mother—quails an instant under her piercing eye—hesitates—a sound is heard outside—'tis the tramp of horsemen. Possibly a rescue. A fierce band of Narishkins, eager for vengeance. So the strelitz think, for they hurriedly retreat from the altar to the church door, mount their horses, and escape, smitten with a sudden panic. The lives of Peter and his heroic mother are safe.

This scene—which Stenben has commemorated in one of his most effective paintings—contrasts strangely with the attitude of the beautiful Sophia during the massacre. Ill-satisfied with her victory, she could not forgive the strelitz for having spared her rival, when a single blow might have relieved her from anxiety forever. To have sacrificed money, peace, and her own virtue—for the contest had cost her no less—and to have failed at last, was a cruel disappointment. Still, though the boy Peter lived, and the murder of his kinsmen so far from annihilating had actually increased the number of his partisans among the nobles and the people, Sophia's efforts had been crowned with a measure of success that had amply rewarded a less ambitious intriguer. Her idiot brother, Ivan, was Czar; and she received herself the title of Regent, with the whole powers of a monarch. Compelled, shortly afterward, to yield to the clamor of the Muscovites, and to associate Peter with her brother Ivan in the nominal office of Czar, she readily contrived to neutralize the act by dispatching Peter to a country village, and surrounding him there with profligates, and companions of the lowest order. Her highest aims were now gratified. The whole Russian empire lay at her feet. Her wildest caprice was law. Aided by the counsels of a wary statesman, Prince Galitzin, and tutored by her own good sense, she avoided the perils which had ruined many similar usurpers, and it seemed as though her authority rested on a durable basis. To secure the throne in her family, she married her brother Ivan to a creature of her own; and though his idiocy was so confirmed that it is doubtful whether he ever saw his wife after the ceremony, the Czarina soon gave birth to a child.

Sophia's fortunes had reached their apogee. Their decline was at hand. The strelitz, who had raised her to power, no sooner saw her authority firmly established than they began to weary of tranquillity, and at length broke into open revolt. With the utmost difficulty Sophia gathered her other troops together; gave them battle, defeated them with great slaughter, and beheaded the principal officers. Then the people began to murmur; an unsuccessful expedition against Turkey fomented their discontent, and the name of Peter was in every man's mouth. Energetic as of old, Sophia resolved to anticipate the threatened blow.

Peter was still in his village, spending his time in riotous licentiousness with the companions Sophia had given him. Habitual drunkenness was the least of the vices of the boy-Czar. Fortunately for him, he was gifted with an inquiring mind, great energy, and indomitable perseverance. As Sophia had neglected his education, he could neither read nor write at the time of his accession; but a Swiss named Lefort, who was one of his companions, taught him not only Russian, but several other modern languages. A taste for military life, which seems to be innate in some northern races, led to the formation of a small troop of volunteer soldiers in his village; Peter entered the troop as drummer, and rapidly rose to the command. As his years advanced, his ambition began to develop itself; he adventured a visit to Moscow, married the daughter of a Russian colonel, and even presumed to take his seat on the throne in the Senate. It was then that Sophia determined to get rid of so dangerous a rival.

The old plan she thought was the best. Six hundred strelitz—with whom she had made peace—were sent to Peter's residence to murder him. The young Czar contrived to make his escape to the convent of the Trinity; and there the people and a large number of the soldiery hastened to join him. Sophia was distracted at this evidence of her unpopularity. She wandered wildly through the streets of Moscow, calling upon her former friends to remain true to her, and parading before the wavering troops that beauty which had once been so irresistible a talisman. It was too late. The tramp of Peter's army was already thundering in the distance. With a few faithful followers and the strelitz, she ventured to give battle; but her rout was immediate and complete. The strelitz were scattered. Galtzin, her minister, was banished, as the ukase says, to "Karga, a city under the Pole," and allowed three cents a day for the support of himself and his family. Sophia herself reluctantly abdicated the regency; Peter afterward ordered her head to be shaved, and confined her person in a nunnery.

Thus, in 1689, Peter became sole monarch of Russia. All things considered, he ranks among the most remarkable personages of history. Though his conquests can not compare with those of many other warrior-kings; though it is on the whole very questionable whether the political condition of the Russian people was at all benefited by the changes he wrought and the example he set to his successors; though he left behind him few legislative memorials of his wisdom; and though a dispassionate review of his character discloses as many grounds for censure and loathing as for praise and admiration; still, the fame of Peter Alexievitch will most certainly endure while the world lasts. It rests on monuments which time will never wholly efface. We may hate him for his crimes, but when we place him side by side with his predecessors on the throne and his companions at court, we can not deny that he looms out in the stature of a giant. If his warmest admirers have not ventured to give him credit for a heart, his bitterest enemies have not denied the vast powers of his mind. Utterly destitute of the finer feelings of human nature, without a trace of affection for those who were nearest and should have been dearest to him; without any reverence for God or pity for man; Peter the Great seems rather an embodiment of the principle of national progress than a member of the human race. It is by his frailties alone we recognize the man. He trampled under foot humanity, religion, and love. If his heart ever warmed it was at the sight of a gallant ship; if he worshipped any god, it was Russia; if he ever loved any thing it was work, obstacles, and difficulties. Danger was his delight; physical or moral, he revelled in its encounter. With the same reckless daring that he threw himself into the midst of his troops at a sham fight, calling on them to cease their play, and use their weapons in earnest against one another—himself sharing the murderous pastime—he calmly insulted the religious prejudices of his whole people, and ran counter to notions which Czar after Czar had been ruined in attempting to disturb. On ascending the throne, he set himself certain tasks. Those he performed, ruthlessly crushing every obstacle, restraint, or prejudice that stood in his way. His marvelous energy, and his utter want of principle and feeling, are equally conspicuous in the performance.

The army was undisciplined. He sent abroad for tried soldiers; imported, despite native prejudice, thousands of Huguenots, Scotchmen, Swiss, Germans, and grafted them into all the regular corps of the army, so as to leaven the whole. In a few months, all he wanted was a general. That would not have been wanting had merit been the ground of promotion in the old Russian army. So to correct the abuse, he served in his own forces as a subaltern, and rose regularly through all the grades. On the return of the victorious army from Turkey, he arranged a triumphal procession at Moscow, wherein the place of honor was occupied by the Generals Schein and Lefort, and the Czar himself walked modestly with the subordinate officers.

He had no navy. His instinctive dread of the water made him shudder when he saw a river. He cured himself and supplied the deficiency of his country with the same vigor. Ice-cold baths every morning accomplished the former; the latter was a work of greater difficulty. Fate threw the hull of a British yacht on his shores. With the eye of genius he discerned its value, studied it minutely, hunted out a Dutch ship carpenter, and bade him forthwith construct several vessels on the plan of the wreck. These he learned to navigate himself in his native rivers and lakes, surpassing all his own sailors in daring and skill. Yachts, however, were not men of war. Russia did not contain a builder capable of constructing a first-class ship. Peter's resolve was soon taken. Appointing a faithful noble to the office of regent, and providing him with an ample force of foreign troops, he set out for Amsterdam with a few companions. Under the name of Peter Carpenter (Timmerman) he obtained employment in the dock-yard, and worked with the shipwrights employed at the place. Every morning he was to be found at his post, adze or hammer in his hand; receiving his wages, living thereon, and lodging as poorly as any mechanic. In the evening, he would sit down covered with dust and dirt, and pen a ukase for the government of Russia, or an order to his army on the confines of the Crimea. When he had learned all that the Dutch could teach, he crossed over to England. There, as on the Continent, the King and Court were anxious to pay him royal honors; but Peter had no time for such folly. He had come to see dock-yards, not palaces; ship builders, not dukes. He thanked King William for his offers, but hastened to Deptford, and begged the master shipwright to give him employment as a carpenter. Again he set the workmen an example of industry, frugality, and perseverance; toiling in their midst as though he had no other aim in life but to earn his wages conscientiously. When he was able to build as good a ship as any man in England, he left, as abruptly and unceremoniously as he had arrived; hastened home, and set several vessels on the stocks. So, in course of time, Russia had a navy.

For upward of a century the throne had been periodically shaken by revolts among the soldiery. Peter resolved to put an end to such work. Shortly after his accession a conspiracy was formed, chiefly among the officers of the strelitz, to dethrone him and reinstate Sophia. It came to his ears; and, having ascertained that the conspirators were to meet at a certain house at ten at night, he ordered a company of his guards to invest the house and seize them. A few minutes after ten, he proceeded to the place alone, and on foot. Lights were visible at the windows, and supposing that the guards were already within, he boldly opened the door, and entered the room where the conspirators sat. No guards were visible: by a slip of the pen, Peter had written the hour of eleven instead of ten in his order to the officer. Nothing daunted, Peter sat down among the men who, he knew, had sworn to kill him that night. They were naturally taken aback by his visit: the more so, as he appeared in high spirits, drank, talked, and made himself quite at home. As soon, however, as the first surprise had passed away, one of the conspirators said to another in a half whisper: "Brother, it is time." "Not yet, villain," shouted Peter, rising from his seat; "but 'tis time for me," and knocked him down with a blow of his fist. All rose, and a hundred swords were drawn upon the monarch; but at that critical moment the guards arrived, rushed into the room, and overpowered the conspirators before a single weapon had reached Peter's body. There was nothing left for the vanquished but to implore the mercy of their sovereign. He showed it as his nature prompted. The whole band were first broken on the rack. They were then slowly dismembered, an interval of time being left between the amputation of each limb; and the blood being carefully stanchd, so as to prolong the agony of the sufferers. Life was finally extinguished by various processes; and the mutilated remains were gathered round the base of a column in the most public place in Moscow—the heads of the victims raised aloft on pikes in the centre. So appalling a spectacle shocked even the most ferocious of the barbarian strelitz.

This was only a beginning. During his absence abroad a second revolt had broken out among the strelitz, and on his return he found several thousands of the insurgents in prison awaiting his pleasure. The punishment inflicted on the conspirators of his early reign was mild compared to what befell these luckless captives. Every variety of torture was put in practice: the imagination of Peter and his courtiers was exhausted in devising fresh refinements of cruelty. The Inquisition was fairly surpassed in atrocity. After some months spent in mangling and mutilating his victims, he found that two thousand still survived. Tired of the pastime, he ordered them all to be executed on one day—volunteering himself to assist as one of the executioners. In presence of the whole population of the capital he drank twenty cups of wine, and at each cup struck off the head of a prisoner with a blow of his sword; and when the sight of blood and the effects of the wine had bereft him of every vestige of reason, he plunged into the throng of dead and living, commanding his friends to follow him, and hewed and hacked the bodies with the reckless fury of a demon. With all the horrors of its history, Moscow never saw such a monstrous spectacle as on that day.

The strelitz, however, were not vanquished. Three officers had the folly to write to Sophia, entreating her to make an effort to reinstate herself on the throne. Peter intercepted the letter, and had the three conspirators hanged before Sophia's window. As if this were not enough, he cut off the arm of one of the corpses, fastened the letter in its stiffened fingers, and hung it up in her bedroom until the flesh rotted from the bones. Sophia had been familiar enough with scenes of blood; but this was too much for her. Confinement had weakened her frame: before the arm of the dead soldier had mouldered into dust, she was in the grave.

After this, there was very little sedition in Russia during Peter's reign.

When he had neither wars to wage nor culprits to execute, Peter's mind turned to his people. That he desired their good there can not be a doubt; but it never seems to have occurred to him that that was a matter on which they might be supposed to have an opinion. He did all the thinking of his empire himself. The council of the boyards and nobles—a poor apology for a check upon the monarch, but still some sort of obstacle to despotism—he flatly refused to tolerate: having sent the members about their business, he replaced them by a council of his own choosing. The church he hated. When the patriarch died, and the people implored him to name another, he struck his sword against his brawny chest, and told them he was their patriarch. To bring the popes or bishops into contempt, he hired a parcel of drunken fellows to personate them, and sent them reeling from the effects of brandy into the streets. He shut up several of the religious houses, and would allow none to become ecclesiastics until they were too old to be soldiers. One can easily imagine the rancor with which the church regarded their ruthless tyrant. Had the metropolitans possessed as much brains as passion, Peter's reign might not have been as tranquil as it was. But they were children in his hands. When he founded St. Petersburg, the people and the clergy were very loath to migrate to its deadly marshes: their reluctance was increased by the intelligence that, on a public festival, the statue of the Virgin, which had been taken to the church on the Neva, shed visible tears in token of sympathy for their distress. Peter was by no means the sort of man to be affected by such phenomena. Walking coolly into the church, he seized the weeping statue by the head, gouged it, and discovered a small reservoir of oil concealed behind the eyes, from whence a little stream had been contrived to trickle down the cheeks. The discomfiture of the clerical impostors can well be imagined.

The nobles and the church crushed, the people came in for their share of attention. He objected to the dress that was worn at the time: it was altered, so as to assimilate to that of Western Europe. He disliked beards, and promoted shaving by taxing them. He found fault with marriages contracted by parents without the concurrence of the parties themselves; and thenceforth, every couple was obliged to show that they had been acquainted at least six weeks before they could be united. He sought to promote social intercourse among the citizens of Moscow; and commanded them to give assemblies or social parties every week, to which every resident was invited by a ukase. The master of the house was not compelled to be present; but he was bound to furnish brandy and tobacco for his guests. The latter were required to bow at the entrance of their entertainer's house: if any one omitted the salute, the guards seized him and forced him to swallow a tumbler of brandy by way of punishment. Intoxication was so prevalent at the time in Russia, that these parties were mere drinking bouts; Peter thoughtfully enacted that at ten o'clock the master of the house should be at liberty to turn his guests, drunk or sober, out of doors.

The wisest of Peter's numerous ordinances, referring to the social advancement of his people, was that which required young men to travel abroad. It was contrary to the old custom of Russia; and has, since Peter's time, been materially curtailed by his successors. Doubtless it exercised a most beneficial effect on Russian society in the last century. When Peter came to the throne, a Russian nobleman—or gentleman, if such a word can be so misapplied—was a riotous, overbearing, ignorant, drunken creature; who led a stupid, sensual life among his serfs, and knew no higher pleasure than offering brutal violence to a virgin, or striking off the head of a man. Though Peter himself resembled his countrymen in many of these respects, he did not admire his own defects in others: his bosom-friends were chiefly foreigners, or Russians who had traveled abroad. Lefort, the Swiss—a man of much ability and no principle, descended from a noble family in Piedmont, and tolerably refined in his tastes and manners—was his chief adviser. Another close friend was Mentzikoff, the founder of the present family of the name. He began life as a pastry cook, and sold patties in the streets of Moscow when Lefort took him under his protection and introduced him to the Czar. Other foreigners were admitted to the imperial circle on the strength of their naval skill. Dutch skippers he adored. In truth, Peter had sense enough to be democratic in this sense at least, that he encouraged talent wherever he found it.

The domestic life of Peter the Great is as unlike that of any other monarch as his public career. He married, when very young, Eudocia, daughter of Colonel Lapuchin. From the very day of her union he began to neglect her for other women; and though she bore him a son, the unhappy Alexis, his treatment of her was uniformly unfeeling and heartless. He brought with him, on his return from Germany, a Dutch girl named Anne Moens, and never condescended to conceal the intrigue from his wife. The latter, goaded to revenge, encouraged the addresses of a young man named Glebok. When the Czar heard of it, he ordered his wife to be closely imprisoned; seized her lover, and had him impaled before his eyes. It is said that, while the wretch was writhing on the spike, Peter had a chair brought out, and watched his agonies, reviling and taunting him, until Glebok spat in his face.

Anne Moens soon made way for other favorites, and Peter lived, for some years, as virtuously as kings usually do. A strange romance—for a parallel to which we must recur to the history of the famous Lady Hamilton—furnished him with a substitute for the disgraced Eudocia. At the capture of Marienburg, during the war with Sweden, the Russians took prisoner a young girl whose attractions induced the general, Bauer, to claim her for himself. As far as we can now learn, she seems to have been the daughter of a peasant girl, and, as she was supported by Count Rosen, it has been conjectured that he was her father. Sent out to service in the family of a Lutheran minister, she had married a dragoon a day or two before her capture by the Russians. General Bauer took her to Moscow with him, and after a few months sold her to Prince Mentzikoff, who, in his turn, disposed of her to the Czar himself. Such things have been common enough at Courts, and many a man has risen to eminence by purveying for a king in a similar way. She could neither read nor write; and is not said to have been beautiful. Her figure was good, however; and when, under the directions of her early protectors, she had succeeded in effacing from her hands the traces of her youthful drudgery, and had dyed her hair, she presented a very tolerable appearance. Peter was no judge of beauty, and was not particularly select in his tastes. Martha, or Catherine as he christened her, possessed, in her imperturbable good temper, a charm which enthralled the impetuous Czar; in his wildest fits of passion she could soothe him, and restore him to his senses by her winning grace and gentleness. Very soon he found her so necessary to his happiness that he resolved to marry her; and the wife of a Swedish dragoon, the cast-off favorite of Bauer and Mentzikoff, became the consort of Peter the Great. He took her to the army with him, and it is said that she exercised extensive influence over his mind: the truce which saved the Russian army at the Pruth is understood to have been proposed by her even without Peter's knowledge. She was equally influential at home. There is grave reason to believe that the atrocious deed which remains to be told of Peter was done at her instigation.

The Czar's first wife, Eudocia, had given birth to a son, Alexis. At the time of his birth, his father had already ceased to visit his mother: the son shared her fate. From his infancy Peter disliked him. As he grew up, his character developed in strong contrast to his father's. He was idle, fond of literature and music; disliked field sports and manual occupation: was a devout member of the church, and a deep theological student; and though by no means moral, was given to none of the excesses which had marked his father's youth. As soon as he attained manhood, the Czar compelled him against his will to marry a German princess of the Wolfenbuttel family. Alexis detested her, and evinced his feelings in the brutal fashion of his family. His father, who commonly beat his wives and the ladies of the Court with his cane, and thought nothing of kicking a general down-stairs, accused Alexis of having struck his wife at a time when she had especial claims on his regard. There is, unfortunately, no reason to doubt the truth of the charge. The wonder is how Peter objected to a practice he so constantly inculcated by his example. In truth, it does not need much research to discover that Peter, like the wolf in the fable, desired an excuse to punish his son: his treatment of his wife was a fair pretext to start with. He threatened to disinherit Alexis: the latter replied by a frank renunciation of his rights to the throne. The Czar then menaced him with imprisonment in a monastery: he declared that nothing would be more congenial to his feelings. Finding these threats fall harmlessly, Peter set his mind to discover something more to his purpose. There can not be a doubt but the executioner of the strelitz would have succeeded to admiration, had Alexis afforded him a chance. Fearing the worst, the young prince fled abroad. His father sent messengers after him in hot haste, entreating him to return. The men selected for the service, and the arguments they employed, indicate pretty plainly that the Czar's resolution was even then firmly taken. The former were a sort of private executioner or sbirro, who bore the nominal title of Captain in the guards: and one Tolstoi, a fellow who Peter himself used to say ought to have his teeth knocked out to prevent his biting. They approached Alexis with a promise that, in the event of his return, his father "would love him still better than he had ever done;" and threatened every monarch in whose dominions he remained with instant vengeance from the Czar. Alexis, always weak and foolish, allowed himself to be persuaded to return. He had no sooner set foot in Russia than he was placed under the eye of the police. Arrived at Moscow, Peter had him closely imprisoned, disinherited him by a formal act, and forbade him to communicate with any one but his guards and the aforementioned Tolstoi. Alexis reminded his father of his promise to treat him well: the Czar replied, that a man who could desert his wife for a Finnish woman, as Alexis had done, had no right to speak at all. The whole transaction appears plain as noonday, when we find the husband of the injured Eudocia using such language to her son. Soon a fresh charge—of tampering with foreign powers and plotting against the sovereignty of Peter—was trumped up, and Alexis was called upon to defend himself. How could he do any thing of the kind? A weak, retiring lad, whose intellect had never been of the strongest, he had undergone more than enough to destroy his mind. He denied: then, on the strength of a promise of forgiveness, admitted facts which had never occurred: denied them again, when required to explain: confessed afresh, when deluded by false accounts of others having accused him. One day, the Czar would visit him in his dungeon, and promise him his freedom; the next, Tolstoi would threaten him with the rack. His confessor was really subjected to that torture, and, as often happened, avowed under its infliction all that Peter wanted. His statement shown to Alexis, the latter began to doubt his own memory. He made a confession which contradicts itself in every particular, and bears upon the face of it conclusive evidence of the insanity of its author. It was enough, however, for Peter, who assembled a sort of Court of nobles, and accused him in person before them. Alexis appeared at the bar, we are told, "wasted and haggard from long confinement; his lofty stature bent down by illness and despair; his powerful voice so weakened that its tones could not be recognized by his former friends; and his whole appearance so degraded that those who knew him best could not trace in that emaciated figure a single resemblance to the once handsome czarovitch." Peter began his address to the Court by stating his own right to put his son to death without let or hindrance from any one; but added that he was unwilling to assume so grave a responsibility alone. In point of fact, the field hands on a Southern plantation are not greater slaves than were the members of that Court: one and all they straightway found Alexis guilty, and sentenced him to death; as Voltaire sarcastically remarks, those who could not write getting the others to sign their names. Alexis was remanded to prison. Shortly afterward, one of the Imperial sbirri procured from a druggist a potion which neither he nor the apothecary dared to smell. It was taken to Alexis's cell. No more was heard. The walls were thick. It could matter little to the unfortunate Prince. Soon, a cry was spread through the city that he had died of apoplexy. Dead most certainly he was: face distorted, limbs cramped, every muscle rigid in frightful convulsion. Fortunate it is for the historian that there lived at the Court of Peter an officer, named Bruce, who could tell us the story of the visit to the druggist's.

Peter's public life is written in the quays, the palaces, the monuments of St. Petersburg. You may read it in the wars waged against Sweden, Turks, Persians, and the territory won from foes on all sides. Every Russian regiment that stood man by man, to the last, to be cut down by the invincible legions of Napoleon, bore witness to his military talents. Every Russian ship that floats is a tribute to his indefatigable energy. You find traces of him every where—in the tyranny of the government—in the material advancement of the country—in the perfection of the army—in the spirit of the wearer of the crown. The boast of Louis XIV.—that he was the State—appears a paltry piece of coxcombry, when one sees how truly it may be spoken of Peter the Great. It is but justice to add, that in his overwhelming zeal for the State, he was as reckless of his own welfare, and even of his life, as of the happiness and existence of others. This is so apparent as to give a coloring of probability to the charitable construction which has been placed upon his acts by those who have said he never had a thought but for his country. It may be true that he only butchered the strelitz because he saw that no lighter punishment would secure public tranquillity; that he repudiated Eudocia, and elevated Catherine to the throne, because the one misunderstood while the other cordially embraced his schemes of reform; that he entrapped Alexis, and put him to death, because he foresaw that he would not prosecute his plans; that he sacrificed thousands of lives in the marshes on the banks of the Neva, because he discerned the necessity for a St. Petersburg; that he bereft the Russian people of the last vestige of liberty, because he knew they would make a bad use of it. But when a man thus erects his will into a higher law, above all principle, precept, moral or divine rule, perfect and unvarying success can alone palliate the act in the eyes of posterity. Failure in one single particular stamps him a tyrant and reprobate. When, therefore, we find that the fiendish execution of the strelitz did not prevent the murder of three of Peter's successors, or constant outbreaks in the capital; that Eudocia was a saint to the worthless, drunken Catherine; that Alexis's murder paved the way to the throne for a parcel of men and women who were not fit even for life; that the enslavement of the Russian people has compelled a state of society in Russia which no man of feeling can contemplate without horror; we are bound to conclude that, with all his lofty aims, and all his boundless energy, the good and the evil were so balanced in the character and works of Peter the Great, as to leave it a matter of doubt whether Russia would have been a loser if he had never lived.

His last act was a source of endless misery to his country. A couple of years before his death he had associated his wife Catherine with him in the government; he went further, and obliged the boyards and nobles to swear that they would support whomsoever he appointed as his successor. The principle of hereditary monarchy thus thrown to the winds, as every other principle had been during his reign, he died of strangury, aggravated, it is said, by exposure to cold and wet on a boating excursion; and immediately after his death his widow, Catherine, claimed the throne.

Oaths extorted by despots have not been usually regarded as binding by courtiers when they could be evaded. The sentiment of the Russian nobles at Peter's death was in favor of the claims of his grandson Peter, son of Alexis. Catherine, however, had on her side her old protector Mentzikoff, who commanded the soldiery. The lucky pastry-cook naturally preferred the cause of a woman whose fortunes were due in a great measure to his own agency, to that of a prince whose father he had helped to assassinate; and as the army, like the pretorian guards of Rome, held the throne in their gift, Catherine was duly crowned—the first Empress Russia had had since the tenth century.

It has been said of Catherine that she ended her life as she began it. This is unjust to Bauer and Mentzikoff, and especially unjust to the Lutheran minister in whose house she had served as nurse. There are degrees in vice, as in every thing else. Lady Hamilton herself would seem a saint to some characters the world has seen. When Catherine, freed from the sharp watchfulness of Peter, plunged into the pleasures of her youth, she showed that the education of a court had not been lost upon her, and that the Empress Catherine was a very superior sort of profligate to the dragon's wife Martha. Business she left to Mentzikoff, who endeavored, as best he could, to carry out Peter's unfinished schemes. Thus released from the toils of her station, she abandoned herself to the gratification of her passions; turning night into day, and day into night. The latter she loved to spend in the open air, drinking Tokay until her attendants carried her to bed; and set the example of that open licentiousness which, under her female successors, became so monstrous a feature of Russian society. A cancer, which had afflicted her for years, was aggravated by her excesses; dropsy set in, and other diseases—fit penalty for her vices—cut her off in the thirty-ninth year of her age. Voltaire, the parasite of the second Catherine, endeavoring to reconcile the objections raised by Peter the Great to his son's matrimonial infidelity with his own abandonment of Eudocia for Catherine, naively argues that the great qualities of the latter justified the Czar in trampling the divine law under foot to do her honor. Into such quagmires do the shrewdest men fall when they try to find apologies for royal guilt.

Catherine's death removed the only obstacle to the accession of the legitimate heir to the crown, Peter Alexiovitch, the grandson of Peter the Great. He was a young man of promise; had he lived long enough to reign in person, he might have redeemed some of the faults of his race. Unfortunately, his youth threw him from the first into the hands of favorites. He found the government controlled by Mentzikoff; and for a time he submitted, like Catherine, to the despotism of that brutal soldier. To such a pitch had the insolence of the former pastry-cook grown, that he did not scruple to use his cane upon the highest officers of the court, and to threaten even bishops with the knout. Bred in the rude school of Peter, who was himself an adept with this weapon of Russian torture, Mentzikoff was fond of accompanying an order with a blow, and constantly superintended the punishment of political offenders. His descendant, whose haughty carriage and imperious tone excited such astonishment at Constantinople a couple of years ago, was a very feeble copy of the founder of his race.

In the midst of his power and might, he received an order to withdraw to Siberia. The young Czar had fallen in love with Catherine Dalgorky, and her brother Ivan had easily contrived to turn his sister's conquest to account. Mentzikoff was exiled. Ivan Dalgorky took his place; and Peter married Catherine. It was only a change of favorites. Though a younger man, Dalgorky was as unprincipled as Mentzikoff, and labored as zealously to usurp the whole power of the state, and make his own fortune. To get Peter out of the way, he sent him into the country, and induced him to spend his time in hunting, while he levied taxes and built himself palaces. Unluckily for him, the young Czar died a few months afterward, at the age of fifteen; and when Dalgorky attempted to proclaim his sister Empress, after the fashion of Catherine I., the people would not hear of it. It was the second time a Dalgorky had narrowly missed the throne: a former member of the family had run Michael Romanoff hard at the election in 1613.

The scene of that eventful year was now renewed. The death of Peter II. extinguished the male line of the Romanoffs. The legitimate heir to the throne, according to hereditary rule, was Peter, the son of Anne, Duchess of Holstein Gottorp, a daughter of Peter the Great. His mother was a Romanoff, and his father was a Dane. He was, however, only two years old; and his aunt Elizabeth, another daughter of Peter the Great, as well as the three daughters of the imbecile Ivan, whom Sophia had for a time foisted into the throne, likewise put forward claims upon the sceptre. Russia was called upon to choose between these competitors. Times had changed since the conscientious boyards of Moscow had summoned nobles, clergy, and people to send deputies to a national council to vote freely for a Czar. Thanks to Peter the Great, the army was strong enough to crown whom it pleased; and his generals and other great officers saw no necessity for an appeal to any one beyond their own ranks. A caucus—to which a few of the nobility were invited by the soldiers, for form's sake—discussed the rival claims, and decided in favor of Anne, daughter of Ivan, who was then Duchess of Courland. Why she was chosen, in preference to her sisters and the line of Peter, can not now be discovered, nor does it matter much. It is enough for us to know that she was chosen by the army, and that conditions were imposed upon her which went to limit her prerogative. She was compelled to swear that she would govern in conformity with a Council of seven, chosen by the caucus, and that she would not bring with her to Russia her chamberlain Biren. She accepted these conditions at Mitau, and repaired immediately to Moscow.

She no sooner felt herself securely seated on the throne, than she began to cast about for a party of her own among the soldiery. An empress could hardly fail in such a project. Anne soon felt herself strong enough to declare that she had come to the throne, not by the choice of those who had elected her, but by hereditary right; and to repudiate the guarantees she had given on her accession. Her next step was to send for the proscribed Biren. This was the son of a gamekeeper; a man of prepossessing appearance, good parts, and remarkable capacity for intrigue. Him the Empress, when only Duchess of Courland, had raised to various offices about her person, to the dissatisfaction of her friends, and to the great detriment of her character. Fearing the tyranny of a favorite, Marshal Munich, Osterman, and the other army leaders, had expressly stipulated that he was not to come to Russia with Anne. Lightly the oath sat upon the royal conscience: Biren was received with unusual honor, and was soon intrusted with the entire confidence of the Empress. It was he who conducted her foreign policy, and superintended the domestic concerns of the empire. Munich, Osterman, and the other leaders of the caucus he contrived to exile on various pretexts to the country parts; their friends and followers he punished more severely. The knout and Siberia were the panaceas he applied to every evil. The former he held to be the best reply to any petition or complaint from the people; the latter the most conclusive remedy for those who felt themselves aggrieved by his rule. In the course of some nine years he is said to have sent 20,000 persons to the Siberian wilds, which gives an average of more than six exiles per day. For the lady in whose name he perpetrated these atrocities, his affection and a few harmless pleasures were a sufficing occupation. She was not distinguished by the coarse vices of so many of her race. She did not get drunk, and is not known to have set a premium on female profligacy. Fond of music and dancing, of a gay, cheerful character, she preferred the tranquil joys of domestic life to the turmoil and anxiety of government, and the boisterous revels of her successors. On the few occasions when she emerged from her retirement, she furnished evidence of what she might have done had she possessed the vigor of Elizabeth or Catherine II. Prince Galitzin, one of the highest nobles in Russia, became a convert from the Greek to the Roman Catholic Church; she sentenced him to become court fool, and had him beaten by her pages when his jests failed to amuse her. Again, just before the close of her reign, she took offense at the corruption of one of her ministers, Volynski—a man who does not seem to have been a whit worse than his colleagues: she had his tongue torn out by the roots, his right hand cut off, and his mutilated body beheaded.

Meanwhile Biren was working out his own and his mistress's ruin. It is plain enough to us to-day, whatever doubt may have existed formerly on the point, that he aspired to the title as well as the power of a sovereign. Anne being childless, her death would again revive the pretensions which had followed that of Peter II. Biren put himself up to auction among the rival claimants, and Anne, the Duchess of Brunswick, niece of the Empress, having offered him the regency during the minority of her son, Ivan, this ambitious minister espoused her cause, and procured the recognition of Ivan as heir to the throne. By this time, however, his race was run. He had trampled the old army leaders under foot for nine years. It was their turn now. So disorganized was the government that Biren was unable to make any resistance when they rose against him. On a signal given, Munich, and a few other popular soldiers, appeared at the barracks and proclaimed Ivan Czar. No opposition was offered: so speedily was the revolution effected, that Biren was seized and sent to Siberia with a party of convicts whom he had himself sentenced to that exile.

The new Czar was three months old and in his cradle when he was called to reign over the empire of Peter the Great. His mother, who had been appointed Regent, was a girl of sixteen, who had married the Duke of Brunswick. Daughter and wife of a German, she had nothing in common with the Russians; she had not even sense—how many girls of sixteen have?—to conduct herself with propriety on the throne. A few months were spent by the Regent in quarreling with her husband, and trying to Germanize her new dominions; then symptoms of a revolution appeared on every side. The only persons who could have opposed a successful resistance to an attack on the throne, were Munich and Osterman, who had overthrown Biren; but no sooner had Anne obtained the Regency through their aid, than she neglected them, and allowed a favorite waiting-maid, named Juliana de Mangden, to usurp the whole control of public affairs.

The soldiery began to look about for another ruler. The race of Ivan had proved utterly worthless; but there were still females among the surviving children of his half-brother Peter the Great. One of these, Elizabeth, had inherited the features, and, it was supposed, many of the qualities of her father. She had taken no part in politics, and was therefore esteemed. Her appearance was prepossessing; though her cast of countenance was masculine, its expression was sweet, and her figure was elegant. The charm of her conversation was irresistible. To this princess the thoughts of the army now turned. When first sounded upon the subject, she gave no encouragement to the conspirators; but her doctor, a Frenchman, named Lestocq, was more enterprising, and undertook to conduct the matter for her. It was an easy task. On the night of the 5th December he was at her door with a sledge. Wrapped in furs, she allowed herself to be placed in the vehicle by Lestocq, and was swiftly borne to the barracks of the guards. There she read a speech which had been prepared for her; and Lestocq and others added a few exciting words. The soldiers shouted long live the Empress Elizabeth, and rushed instantly to the palace where the Czar and the Regent were sleeping. The latter, with her husband, were secured at once and sent to prison. Little Ivan, then sixteen months old, was roused by the noise, and, with childish simplicity, attempted to imitate the cries of the soldiers who took him from his cradle. "Little knowest thou, child," said Elizabeth, who stood by, "that 'tis thine own ruin thou applaudest!"

Ruin indeed! The lamentable history of the French Dauphin who died in the Temple compared favorably with the fate of Ivan Antonovitch. Thrust into prison before he was two years old, he spent eight years in various places of confinement, his dungeon being changed whenever the rank of its occupant became known to the people. At ten years of age he was thought so formidable that Elizabeth removed him to the fortress of Schlussenberg, where he was immured in a single room, without any furniture but a truckle-bed, a table, and a chair. The windows were painted so that he could not see the green fields or the blue sky outside. At rare intervals he was allowed to walk a few minutes in a courtyard inclosed by high walls; but this privilege was so seldom granted him, that when he was asked by Elizabeth's successor whether he had any request to make, all the poor boy begged was to be allowed to breathe the fresh air a little oftener. It was a part of Elizabeth's policy—a policy which monarchs usually pursue in the like case—to destroy the intellect of her victim. Ivan, once Czar of Russia, was not taught to read or write. He stammered, and perhaps from the effects of his solitude, had great difficulty in finding words to express his thoughts. His passions were allowed to develop themselves with the utmost freedom. Brandy was furnished him in quantities, and his temper encouraged to grow ferocious and sullen. Of the world beyond his dungeon, he knew, of course, nothing but what his jailers chose to tell him. He had a dim notion that he ought to be Czar of Russia; and when Peter III., whom he had never seen, visited him, he naively observed that he would some day regain his crown and put all his enemies to death. The utterance of this sentiment sealed his fate. The Empress Catherine sent a special officer, with private instructions, to take charge of his person. On the night of the 4th July, 1764, an alarm was given in the fort. Shots were fired, and a rumor was spread that Ivan was about to be rescued. Catherine's emissary at once rushed with a comrade to Ivan's room, roused him from his bed, and stabbed him with his sword. Though wounded and unarmed, the captive struggled desperately with his assassins. He broke one of their swords, and grappled with the man who held it; but as they fell to the floor together, his companion thrust his weapon through his back, and put an end to his life. Next morning, in a pool of gore, the body of the Czar Ivan was found pierced with twenty-five wounds. There is enough evidence to convict Catherine the Great of his murder before any jury in the world.

To return to Elizabeth, who, on the morning of 6th December, 1741, found herself Empress of Russia. Her first act was to exile all the friends of Ivan's family; her next to mete out the same measure to her own. Lestocq, her faithful physician, who had placed her on the throne, was sent to Archangel, then an ice-bound desert, where he died in great poverty. As she had really inherited some share of her father's vigor, she then devoted herself to the concerns of her station, and took a leading part as well in the domestic affairs of the empire as in external politics. Her name figures extensively in the history of Russia. There was no lack of energy in the government during the twenty years of her reign. The measure for which she has received most praise from historians is the abolition of capital punishment. It is right, however, to observe that political offenses were expressly excluded from the benefit of the ukase; and, moreover, though the ax and the halter were prohibited, the use of the knout, which answered the very same purpose, was preserved, and torture was inflicted wherever death would have been the penalty under former reigns. It was a favorite practice of Elizabeth, in sentencing a criminal, to refer to her clemency whereby his life was saved, and to command that his tongue be torn out by the roots, and his body otherwise mutilated. Similar punishments were frequently inflicted on females. These proofs of her humane disposition have been highly lauded by historians.

Before her advent to the throne, she had been affianced to the Duke of Holstein, who died before the marriage was solemnised. Elizabeth enregistered a vow never to marry, and kept it. It was perhaps this obstacle which prevented her union with Alexis Razumoffski, a noble of her court, to whom she bore two children who took the name of Tarakanoff. When very young these children were sent abroad. One of them, the Princess Tarakanoff, was beautiful, accomplished, and very popular in the Italian society in which she moved. Catherine the Great, living in constant dread of rivals, grew alarmed at the reports which reached her of the attractions of the Princess, and dispatched one of her own lovers to Leghorn, with special instructions. The courtier who undertook this honorable mission was a member of the noble family of Orloff. Catherine herself could not have accomplished it better. Gaining access to the Princess he reminded her of her birth, and assured her that his mistress had lofty views for her. To this he added a declaration of his own love; and the unfortunate girl, bewildered by the announcement of prospects to which she had never aspired, and yielding to the passionate appeals of the handsome Russian, consented to marry him and return to Russia. The ceremony was performed by a mock priest, assisted by several accomplices of Orloff. As soon as it was over, she was carried on board a ship lying in the offing, and, to her horror, while still in her bridal attire, was seized and handcuffed. The poor girl, in an agony of terror, threw herself at Orloff's feet, calling him her dear husband, and entreating him to protect her. The brute spurned her with his foot; and, as the sailors began to be touched by her beauty and her distress, he sent her below and confined her in a small cabin. Conveyed to St. Petersburg, she never saw Orloff more. The day of her arrival she was dispatched to the prison on the borders of the Neva, and confined in a low, damp, fetid cell on the ground floor. Ten years afterward, one September night, a fierce equinoctial gale began to plop the surface of the Gulf of Finland. Waves, mountain high, rushed impetuously into the mouth of the Neva; and, as the wind increased in fury, the waters of the river rose with ominous rapidity. The wharves were soon covered. Vessels were torn from their moorings. The streets were flooded. On every side men, women, and children were seen flying from their dwellings through the storm to seek refuge on some neighboring eminence. St. Petersburg seemed doomed. At the first symptom of danger, the guards had fled from the prison. The water forced itself into the lower chambers, and began to fill them. No eye has seen the events of that night; but we can readily picture the agonies of the unfortunate Tarakanoff, as the waters gradually rose, and strong walls and no less strong bolted doors forbade even a hope of escape, and showed her that her cell was to be her tomb. No matter how madly her shrieks resounded through the prison, the storm shrieked louder; and there was no one to hear the last cries of the dying girl. When the inundation subsided, the drowned body of the Princess Tarakanoff, the daughter of the Empress Elizabeth, was taken from the cell where she died and privately buried.

As Elizabeth grew older, she resigned most of the cares of state to her favorite Panin, who had risen from the rank of guardsman to that of gentleman of the bedchamber, and subsequently became one of the ablest Ministers Russia ever had. Pleasures of the most debasing kind absorbed the whole time of the Empress. Such vices as history can only shadow in faint outline marked her declining years. With a select circle of profligates, she abandoned herself to the vilest habits of drunkenness; selecting brandy for her beverage as better suited to her exhausted palate than more delicate liquors. So systematic was she that she had her dresses made so that her attendants could cut them off in an instant when intoxication had deprived her of the use of her limbs. When on her death-bed, her physicians prescribed rigid abstinence from brandy; but she procured a case, which she kept under her bed with the key under her pillow. She died, we are told, in tortures such as delirium tremens usually produces, with a half-empty bottle in her hand, and obscene language on her tongue.

It had been her fondest wish to leave her throne to her sister's son, Peter. His father was the Duke of Holstein Gottorp; and, though related to the Romanoff family by his mother, he was essentially a German in all his tastes and feelings. Elizabeth had brought him up under her care, and it was therefore no wonder that long before her death he was accounted vicious, ignorant, and depraved. He readily acquired his aunt's love for brandy; and took no mean share in her usual recreations. To provide him with a wife was Elizabeth's first care. It was an easy matter. Times had changed since the Czar Ivan Vasilivitch sent an humble message to King Sigismund of Poland, praying to be allowed to espouse his sister, and received in reply from the haughty Pole a cow dressed in woman's clothes. There were now plenty of German princes and small fry of royalty glad to bite at the imperial bait. The Duchess of Anhalt-Zerbst took ship at once and landed her daughter Sophia at St. Petersburg. Learning there that Elizabeth was at Moscow, she repaired thither, and had the good fortune to find that her daughter pleased the Empress. At that time Sophia of Anhalt-Zerbst was a handsome girl. Though her nose was aquiline and her features were not regular, the general appearance of her face was pleasing: she had sweet blue eyes, lovely auburn hair, with black eyebrows, and a graceful figure. Altogether a very passable wife for such a prince as Peter, who, naturally ugly, had been dreadfully disfigured by small-pox. His face, with his little pug nose, and red hair, added to the scars of disease, was so repulsive, that when Sophia first saw him she rushed to her room in an agony of tears and fainted away. Her scruples soon vanished, however; and, to the delight of Elizabeth, she was wedded to Peter shortly afterward, and assumed the name of Catherine on becoming a member of the Greek Church.

Peter was not even a man. Even before Elizabeth's death his wife had forsaken his society for that of others; yet it was with the utmost difficulty that the Empress persuaded Peter to notice her conduct. Convinced of her infidelity, he agreed to separate from her; and consoled himself in the friendship of the Princess Worontzoff, whose father, then Chancellor of the empire, was only too happy to encourage the heir to the throne. When Elizabeth died, the flush of power was too much for Peter's senses. In a paroxysm of good-will to all men, he became reconciled to his wife after a separation of upward of a year; and acknowledged the child to whom she gave birth shortly after their reunion, and who subsequently became the Emperor Paul. Munich, Biren, and all the other political exiles were recalled; a jubilee was proclaimed, and every body said that Peter was going to turn out a great monarch. They knew him ill who could speak thus. While ukases, framed in his name, were abolishing the court of Privy Chancery, sanctioning foreign travel, and declaring an amnesty to the exiles of former reigns, it is doubtful whether Peter even knew of their existence. A young man, who ought to fill a large place in Russian history, was the real author of these reforms. His name was Ghdovitch: had he been the minister of a luckier Czar, we should have known more of him. Peter had no more share in his acts than he who reads these pages. For him, life had no fuller delights than gross debauches; the crown no higher prerogative than an immunity from responsibility for habitual vice. With the Princess Worontzoff, and a few choice companions, he emulated the orgies of his aunt: it was his proudest boast to say that he had surpassed her in viciousness. All he knew of politics was that Prussia was the greatest power on earth; all he sought was to win the friendship of the Prussian monarch, and to imitate his policy. For this he sacrificed the good-will of every subject in his empire.

His wife, Catherine, was no inattentive spectator of his conduct. Though her own life had been a notorious scandal, when Peter abandoned himself to profligacy she became regular in her devotions. When he worshiped the Prussians, she surpassed the Muscovites themselves in her fidelity to Russian interests. With the aid of her lover, Orloff, her ambitious projects were at length matured.

On the night of the 8th July, 1762, Peter was plunged in revelry at the palace of Oranienbaum. Catherine was sleeping at Petershoff, in her pavilion on the borders of the Neva. At midnight, a carriage left St. Petersburg for her residence. It contained two men, Orloff her lover, and a soldier of the guards. The former had a private key to the pavilion; with its aid, an entry was effected without disturbing the attendants, and in the dead of night a soldier stood by Catherine's bedside. Startled by the apparition, she sprung up in her bed. "Silence," whispered the soldier, "rise, and follow me."

In an instant Catherine was dressed, and with a single attendant, was flying toward St. Petersburg. Before half the journey had been accomplished, the horses fell dead from fatigue. Petershoff was twenty-one miles from the capital. No fresh horses were to be had. Catherine took refuge in a farm house; and for a moment, it seemed as though the movement would have been ruined by the death of a horse. While she was wringing her hands in her vexation, a peasant with a market-cart passed. Orloff seized the vehicle, dismissed the owner, and, placing Catherine on a bundle of hay, drove rapidly to St. Petersburg, where they arrived at seven in the morning. Orloff's brothers and friends were ready to receive her. Above all, the Princess Dashkoff, whose jealousy of her sister, the Princess Worontzoff, supplied the place of attachment to Catherine, displayed extraordinary activity on her behalf. Habited in man's attire, she rode to the barracks, and with the aid of brandy plentifully distributed among the soldiers, soon prevailed upon them to proclaim Catherine. One regiment followed another; by nine o'clock the whole army, with some trifling exceptions, was in her favor. Thence to the church of our Lady of Vasan, where the Pope of Novogorod, won by her affectation of piety, crowned her Empress. The taverns were thrown open. Soldiers and populace were bidden to drink and eat their fill. For some hours the saturnalia were enacted at St. Petersburg.

A report was spread that the Czar Peter had died. Happy for him had it been true; he was only dead drunk at Oranienbaum. On the day of Catherine's accession he was to have dined with her, by way of a change, at Petershoff; he started, but strange rumors reaching his ears on the way, he resolved to send Chancellor Worontzoff to St. Petersburg to ascertain their meaning. That eminent courtier, who had seen with pride the dishonor of his wife and two of his daughters, found Catherine in the palace on his arrival; without a moment's hesitation, he gave in his adhesion to the new monarch, and abandoned Peter as readily as he had sacrificed his family.

Alarmed at his prolonged absence, Peter flew to Petershoff with his little band of friends. Hastily entering the pavilion, he searched every room, and looked even under the beds to see if his wife were not hid somewhere. When the truth burst upon him, he wandered wildly in the gardens, which command a magnificent view of the Gulf of Finland, Cronstadt, and the Neva, ever and anon exclaiming to the Princess Worontzoff, "I told you Catherine was capable of every thing." When the news of his abandonment by the soldiers reached him, he held a council of his followers, and asked their advice. The gray headed soldier, Munich, who had seen many revolutions, urged the policy of opposing a bold resistance to Catherine. The Princess Worontzoff recommended a peaceable surrender; and Peter, who never had the spirit of a man, adopted her counsel, and wrote to Catherine, begging leave to retire to Holstein with his favorite. Not a word of answer did the Empress make; but at the head of a regiment marched on Petershoff. A second embassy proved equally fruitless. Peter abandoned himself to the most abject terror, and insisted on dining on the sea-shore, lest he should be surprised in the pavilion. Worontzoff and the other women were urgent in their entreaties that Peter would return to Oranienbaum. Munich, who knew that that beautiful palace was not susceptible of a defense against a military force, recommended Cronstadt. This time his opinion prevailed. Just as the sound of Catherine's approach was heard in the alleys of Petershoff, Peter and his party set sail in small boats. It was too late. The governor of Cronstadt had declared for Catherine. When challenged, Peter rose in his boat and shouted: "Don't you know me, the Czar Peter?" The answer was emphatic: "We don't know you at all." Munich, Ghudovitch, and one or two others were for landing at all hazards, and trying to win back the garrison; but Peter was so frightened that he ran to hide his head in the Princess Worontzoff's lap, and ordered the boats to put to sea.

The fleet lying at Reval still remained, and Munich urgently advised the Czar to hasten thither. But terror had taken possession of Peter's mind. He would hear of nothing but a return to Oranienbaum, where he arrived at four in the morning. Spurning the proposal made by Munich and the guards to defend the place to the last, he wrote letter after letter to Catherine, imploring mercy, and offering to go wherever she pleased. To these supplications the Empress made no answer, and Peter, distracted by his fears, at last set out for St. Petersburg to see her. The moment he set foot in the capital, he was surrounded by the guards, and borne to the top of the great staircase of the palace. There all manner of insult was showered upon him. His clothes were torn from his back, his rings wrenched from his fingers. Upward of an hour he remained barefoot in his shirt, exposed to the jeers of the soldiers; more debased by his own pitiable meanness than by the ignominy of his position. At length a night gown was thrust upon him and he was conveyed to prison.

The stont walls of his dungeon seemed to reassure him. He sent word to Catherine that he would like to have his Bible, a negro servant, and his favorite dog: if it pleased her to grant him these favors, he was content to spend his life in prison. Pity was no part of his wife's character: she made him no answer; but silently had him removed to the house of one of her most devoted adherents, the hetman of the Cossacks. There, on the 16th July, he was honored by a visit from Alexis Orloff, who drank with him. A few minutes afterward he perceived he was poisoned, and called for milk, which is used as an antidote in many cases. Orloff offered him a second glass of the drugged wine. On his refusing it, the courtier seized him by the throat, and threw him to the ground. Two of his assistants made a slip noose with a napkin and passed it round Peter's neck; while Orloff, with his knee on his chest, held him to the floor by the hair of his head. Thus he died. Catherine kept his murder a secret for a day: then announced that he had died of colic. His body was exhibited as usual in the Cathedral; but the loyal subjects, who paid their monarch the last tribute of a kiss, perceived with horror that their lips inflamed and swelled on touching the skin of the corpse.

So Catherine I. won the throne.

She has been called Catherine the Great, or, as a witty Frenchman expressed it, Catherine le Grand. Historians have coupled her name with that of Peter, and claimed for both a leading place among the great monarchs of modern times. The present Emperor of Russia has been heard to declare that his empire owes even more to her than to Peter. To this day, writers, even in England and our own country, mention her name with respect, and exact from their readers admiration for her character and honor for her memory.

Whosoever a competent man shall undertake to write the history of Russia in accordance with the current of modern opinion, these views will undergo a sensible modification. It is not the design of this paper to make any reference to the history of Russia beyond what may be indispensable to develop the personal character of its rulers; but a few lines on the leading facts of Catherine's reign may not be out of place. She was successful in her wars against the Turks and the Poles; but the glory resulting from these triumphs can not be wrested from Sowarrow without obvious injustice.

She became in some sort an arbiter of destiny in Europe by her proclamation of the "armed neutrality;" but every student of history knows that this was wholly the work of Panin. She published some fragments of a code; parts thereof are original, and are immoral, unsound, and tyrannical: the balance is stolen from Montesquieu. Under her reign, the army was strengthened and improved: even this questionable benefit was due to Potemkin. Her reforms in the administration of government, in the judicial system, in the criminal code; her bold strokes of national policy; her reputed encouragement of letters; her liberal philosophy, were all borrowed from others. As well praise the mirror for the beauty it reflects, as laud Catherine for the talent and sagacity of those who surrounded her. On the other hand, even giving her credit for the acts of her counselors, it still remains to be seen how far Russia was a gainer thereby. She raised superb palaces no doubt, and gave fêtes, in which a sham volcano, nearly as large as Vesuvius, was made to vomit flames in presence of a delighted audience of her lovers; but these are hardly valid claims to immortality. These palaces and these fêtes cost the Russian people more millions than Peter the Great ever raised. Though her revenue at her accession was nearly double that of Peter, she found it necessary to increase it by a sort of income tax; before her death, it reached thirty-five millions of dollars—an enormous sum at that period in Russia, and fully three times as much as Peter the Great had required to carry out his extensive reforms, build St. Petersburg, and equip a fleet. During her reign, it has been estimated that she spent twenty to twenty-five millions in presents to her favorites alone. On one occasion, the revenue not coming in fast enough, she issued paper to an extent which she agreed to limit at one hundred millions of roubles, say $60,000,000; and, relying on the faith of her promise, the people took the notes. She issued six hundred millions instead of one, and the moment the fraud was discovered, the paper depreciated to one third its former value.

She reigned thirty-three years. During that time her dominions increased nearly one twentieth in extent, and one third in population. This was not a larger increase than had been witnessed during the two preceding periods of the like duration; while the twenty-nine years of Alexander's reign saw Russia swell more than one ninth in superficial area, and two thirds in population.

If we attempt to test the merits of Catherine by inquiring what good she did to her people, and what improvements she wrought in their condition, we shall find that to them her reign was one unmitigated evil. Her licentious conduct was a detestable example. Her public corruptions disorganized the Government. Her code riveted the shackles of tyranny on her subjects. Hypocritically declaring to Voltaire that she was at heart a republican, she it was who first introduced predial serfdom into Lesser Russia. She paralyzed trade by her over-issue of paper money. She extinguished patriotism, by rendering pre-ferment dependent on her own amours. She shattered morality by setting a premium on vice. She shook the foundations of Christianity by professing atheism. If, in short, we deduct from her fame what she owed to Panin, Potemkin, and Suwarrow; if we endeavor to forget the flattery of Voltaire—who, abused as he has been, has still been copied by all the historians of Russia—we shall find that Catherine the Great might have been more fitly designated Catherine the Bad.

It is difficult even to hint at her private life without disgracing these pages. Lover after lover succeeded to her affections; the office being recognized by the government, and regularly salaried like that of a general or a secretary. No less than twelve men filled it openly during her reign. Hence a horrible and general depravity spread throughout the kingdom. Female virtue was at an end, when the Empress used so little art to conceal her intrigues. Wives of men of all classes openly repudiated all obligation of fidelity. The ladies of the Court went further, and, following the example of Catherine, assumed to control their husbands' business. Wives of generals were seen commanding armies; wives of secretaries opened dispatches. The Court of the French Regent, in the last century, was a model of purity in comparison with St. Petersburg and Moscow under Catherine. Age brought neither amendment nor remorse with it. At seventy-five she was more depraved than at thirty. To read the annals of the time, one almost wonders that some awful judgment from heaven did not destroy the Russian Sodom and Gomorrah; or, at least, that some popular outbreak did not avenge the wrongs of the masses.

This last danger was probably averted by the tact, judgment, and activity of Catherine. In the midst of her exactions, she was careful not to wound the Russian spirit by betraying a preference for foreigners: all her favorites were Muscovites. While occupied in consolidating the most complete despotism in the world, she kept up a friendly intercourse with foreign republicans—invited Voltaire to Russia, and offered D'Alembert the tutorship of her son. Two great sources of peril were thus avoided. Her army she kept constantly engaged on the frontiers; and diverted the attention of the soldiers from her own administration by stimulating a desire for foreign conquest. In the midst of her licentious excesses, she never forgot that she was Empress of Russia. At six every morning she was in her cabinet, opening dispatches, issuing orders to her generals, and deciding on petitions. She was never a hard drinker; and her temperance in this respect enabled her to preserve her energy to a very advanced age.

The last years of her reign were chiefly occupied in providing for her succession. Her son Paul she married, when a mere boy, to a princess of Hesse-Darmstadt; and, at her death, to the beautiful Marie of Wurtemberg. He grew up a frivolous, narrow-minded man; and his mother took such a violent dislike to him that she compelled him to live at a distance from the capital. At the birth of his children, they were taken from their parents by order of Catherine, and brought up under her direction. Paul she absolutely persecuted. His residence was surrounded by spies; and while she was spending millions on the palaces of Tsarko-zelo, Tauride, etc., she left him and his wife in absolute want of the necessities of life. Paul's terror at the sight of her tall, erect figure, always dressed in a green dress, tight at the sleeves, and surmounted by a diamond head-dress, is said to have been positively ludicrous. He opposed not a word of remonstrance to her usurpation of his paternal rights. Even before his sons attained manhood, Catherine resolved to marry them, and sent for eleven German princesses to choose from. Paul was not consulted any more than the valets of the household. All this he bore patiently, waiting for the day of deliverance.

It came at last. For some time Catherine had abandoned herself to profligacy with greater recklessness than ever. It began to tell upon her frame. On the 9th November, 1796, she appeared as usual in her cabinet early in the morning, and took her coffee. A few minutes afterward she retired to her chamber, where she was found stretched on the floor insensible.

Paul arrived instantly, and was introduced to his sons, Alexander and Constantine. The whole family surrounded the bedside. Alexander gave way to piercing lamentations; his father thought of nothing but giving orders for a grand funeral, and arranging the by-standers so as to form a tableau round the death-bed. Suddenly the dying Empress opened her eyes, stared wildly on Paul, and moved her lips to speak; fortunate it was for her son that her tongue refused its functions, for the words she could not utter would have disinherited him, and nominated Alexander her successor.

The moment she was dead, Paul set about undoing her work. He disbanded most of her armies, declared peace with her enemies, recalled from Siberia the exiles she had sent there, and declared that his policy would be the reverse of hers. This pleased the overtaxed people; but their rejoicings were premature. Catherine, with all her faults, had too much sense to exact Asiatic servility from her people, or to busy herself about petty trifles. Paul had a microscopic soul. His idea of imperial dignity was to see his subjects enter his presence with their heads bowed to the earth, and to have them kneel before him until, as he said, he could hear their knee strike the floor. When he drove out, he would punish those who did not alight from their carriages and prostrate themselves as he passed. His notions of military science were confined to the uniform of the soldiers. He obliged them to wear tails and powder; and when the rough old Marshals Suwarrow pithily exclaimed, "Hair-powder is not gunpowder, curls are not cannons, tails are not bayonets," he very nearly sent him to Siberia. If one subject was nearer his heart than any other, it was buttons on soldiers coats. He would walk a mile to make a sentinel button his coat a trifle higher or a hole lower. In his palace at Paulosky he had a turret expressly constructed in order to inspect with a telescope the uniform of the guards. Unheard-of punishments were inflicted when they were not attired according to his fancy. At all hours of the day and night he would insist on military parades, hardly allowing the soldiers time to eat or sleep. He was never satisfied. He once complained to Alexander that the troops were negligent and undisciplined. His son denied the charge. The Czar proposed, to test the point, that the whole garrison should beat to arms at one that night. The Grand Duke promised obedience, and at the hour fixed, while the whole city was plunged in sleep, the drums and fife sounded an alarm. In an instant the whole garrison was under arms. The citizens rushed from their beds to ascertain the cause of the unusual uproar. People were seen hurrying to and fro in wild dismay. The soldiers themselves did not know why they were called out. The noise awoke the Czar, and totally forgetting his conversation with Alexander, he supposed that a rebellion had broken out, and thought only of his personal safety. When Alexander reached the palace, he found that his father had mounted a horse and fled. Setting spurs in pursuit, he soon came in sight of the fugitive, whose terror added such wings to his flight that he was overtaken with difficulty. Paul threw himself at the knees of his son, imploring mercy, and could hardly be persuaded that the whole affair was the result of a freak of his own.

The people were as badly treated as the military. He took a dislike to round hats, and authorized any one to tear them from the head of their wearer. He would allow no one to keep a dog near his residence. To learning he had an insufferable antipathy. He prohibited the importation of French books or newspapers, and only allowed three printing presses in his whole dominions. If a man's face displeased him, he would have him arrested. If his dress did not suit his fancy, he would cane him. The knout and Siberia he decreed for all sorts of imaginary offenses, so that no man felt safe. Surrounded by spies, he fancied that every one was a conspirator. He used to threaten his amiable wife with his fist, and tell her: Madam, if you think to play the Catherine, you will not find me a Peter III. So inconsistent and absurd grew his conduct at last, that it was generally believed he was mad; and the disease was attributed to his disappointment at the rejection of his addresses by the Countess Laponkin.

A conspiracy was at length formed to rid the throne of such a dangerous maniac. It came to Paul's ears, and he summoned Count Pahlen, Governor of St. Petersburg, before him to inquire into the affair. "Sire," said the wily courtier, "I know it all; to assure myself of the guilty, I am myself a conspirator." He was in fact, and, alarmed by the king's vigilance, resolved that the blow should be struck at once. That afternoon a letter, containing full details of the conspiracy, was placed in the hands of the Czar's friend and counselor, Kutaisoff; but somehow he mislaid it before it was read. Another letter, containing the like information, was handed to the Czar while supping with his favorite; the ill-fated man thrust it unopened into his pocket. The hand of destiny was clearly upon him. At eleven that night, as he lay in his bed at the palace of Saint Michael, a small band of twenty conspirators effected an entrance into the private rooms: the Cossack at the door of the royal bed-chamber challenged them, but was instantly cut down by one of the party. All then rushed into the room. The bedclothes were in disorder—the sheets were warm—but Paul was not to be seen. The scuffle at the door had alarmed him, and he had risen and hid himself behind a screen. His refuge was soon discovered. Dragged into the middle of the room, one of the Zuboffs broke his arms with a club, and others wounded him with their swords. After a feeble resistance he was overpowered and strangled. His last words—terrible words—were: "And you too, my Constantine!"

A message was instantly sent to the Empress Marie to say that the Czar had died of apoplexy. "Tis false!" cried the affectionate woman, and rising from her bed without dressing, she flew to her husband's apartments. A strong guard of soldiers refused to allow her to pass. She prayed, threatened, even struggled with the guards, but all in vain; overcome at last by her grief, she swooned away, and was carried to her room.

No Czar ever came to the throne under brighter auspices than Alexander. Nature had endowed him with manly beauty, an intelligent mind, and a generous heart. From his tutor, Laharpe, a Swiss republican, he had derived liberal notions and enlightened principles. Even Catherine had exerted herself to guard him against the vices to which she was herself a victim. Married at sixteen to a virtuous and amiable girl, nearly two years his junior, his life, previous to his accession, had been fraught with perfect happiness to himself, and had raised bright hopes in the minds of the Russian people. His amiable manners had endeared him to the whole Court. The masses set no bounds to their enthusiasm when it was announced that Alexander was opposed to war, and required no more levies. The world saw with pleasure that the throne which had been defiled by so many tyrants and profligates, was about to be occupied by a Czar in every way estimable.

His first acts abundantly justified these anticipations. He abolished legal torture and confiscations, swept away the last vestige of the old Chancery, reduced the taxes, cut down the expenses of the court, relaxed the laws against printing, founded public schools, and devoted his whole time to the business of the state. He wrote and spoke loudly and energetically in favor of liberty. When, in addition to these acts, he gave constant proofs of humanity—such as leaping from his boat into the Neva to save a drowning sailor, and holding a wounded laborer in his arms until a surgeon came to his assistance—the people thought that Heaven, in pity for their past afflictions, had sent a deity to reign over them.

Unfortunately for Alexander, he was born a monarch. He held in his hands a power equal to any on the earth. A martial nation only waited his commands to carry his banners to any capital in Europe. He had been taught by Catherine that the national destiny of Russia was conquest. On the frontier he saw provinces and countries which a single campaign might add to his dominions. Who among the best of us could resist such temptations? Alexander committed his first fault when he undertook to extend his dominions by unjust wars. What he gained in territory he lost in abiding fame and popular affection; and the lust for conquest left him no time to think of reform.

Soon the career of Napoleon forced him to enlarge the sphere of his foreign operations. At first he had acknowledged his admiration for the great Corsican; but the death of the Duke d'Enghien, and in some measure his jealousy of so powerful a rival, produced a change in his feelings, and he declared war against France. Then came Jena, Eylau, Friedland; to be followed by the peace of Tilsit, and Alexander's reconciliation with his foe. His enthusiastic idolatry of Napoleon then went so far that he would have offered him his sister in marriage, had his mother not opposed the match. His ambition, whetted by the acquisition of Finland, coveted Constantinople; he offered to divide Europe with Napoleon, and, as an earnest of his intentions, agreed to enter into the Continental blockade against England. Changeable as the wind, Alexander soon tired of the French alliance. Pretenses for a rupture were not wanting; and the "Great Army," under the Emperor Napoleon, invaded Russia. Alexander took the command himself; but the danger was pressing; he had sense enough to see that a more skillful tactician was needed, and he made way for Kutousof. The entry into Paris was the noblest moment of Alexander's life. His graceful politeness to the conquered, his generous protection of Napoleon, his elevated ideas and noble sentiments, won all hearts. They prove once more that had Alexander been any thing but a Czar he would have been one of the greatest men of modern times. Unfortunately he was born a monarch.

On his return to Russia he found the country in a deplorable condition. The defeat of the French had been purchased by the ruin of the Russians. Ten years' war had raised the taxes to a higher point than they had ever reached before. The people groaned under a system of unparalleled corruption. Every eye was turned to the Czar, who, it was fondly hoped, would now forsake the interests of France for those of his own country. Russia was disappointed. Chivalry was a larger component of Alexander's character than wisdom or even patriotism. He loved to be called the arbiter of Europe; thirsted for military renown; enjoyed the dangers and glories of the battle-field; but was utterly unfit to transact the toilsome business of domestic government. He tried it for a brief space, but soon abandoned the task, and the real government of Russia fell into the hands of a friend of the Emperor Paul, Arakhtcheief. This man had more mind than Paul, but not less tyranny. One by one, he contrived to nullify all Alexander's reforms, and once more re-established the old despotism of the former century. He discouraged public instruction, and set the example of ignorance. The reactionary tide set in with full force.

Alexander meanwhile was engrossed in foreign affairs. He was the life and soul of the various congresses which were held in Europe from 1815 to 1820; and, strange to say, was the principal author of those extraordinary manifestoes of despotism which astonished the enlightened world during that period. The fact was, Alexander's mind had undergone another change. He was tired of liberal theories.

Toward the close of his reign domestic afflictions embittered his life. He had many years before separated quietly from his wife, and lived with a lady, Madame Nariashkin, whom he had taken from her husband. By her he had a daughter, whom he loved passionately. Young Sophia was beautiful, affectionate, and amiable: in her society the Czar spent all his leisure moments. When she reached womanhood she was affianced to a noble Russian; but on her return from Paris, whither she had gone for her health, she was seized with consumption, and died. Her father never recovered the blow. He had no legitimate children—Sophia was every thing to him. Even the consolations of the good Elizabeth, his wife, who returned to his side as soon as she heard of his misfortune, could not dispel his melancholy. He gave up diversions of all kinds, and led a monotonous, melancholy life. He rose invariably at six: in summer, read or wrote a couple of hours, took a walk, and breakfasted; then drove to Pavlosky, the residence of his mother, and spent some time in conversation with her and his sisters; returned home, dined alone with the Empress, and spent the remainder of the day in walking alone in his gardens or reading: in winter, he went regularly every day at nine to see the guard mount. He saw no society whatever; received the ambassadors as seldom as possible; and hardly ever spoke to any of his ministers except on business. He was fond of traveling, and is said to have gone over some 150,000 miles of road in the course of his life. In his later years he was a sincere Christian—more of a Protestant than a member of the Greek Church; a believer in Madame de Krudener rather than the Metropolitan; withal, devotedly fond of his Bible. His chivalrous nature never changed. One of his last acts was to expose his life, over and over again, in endeavoring to rescue the poor people who were menaced by the inundation of the Neva in 1824.

Shortly afterward he accompanied his wife, who was assailed by a pulmonary disease, to the Crimea; was seized with fever there, and died in a few days. His faithful companion soon followed him to the tomb.

Notwithstanding Alexander's neglect of his duties as a sovereign, and the mischiefs which his ambition, his inconstancy, and his fatal regard for Arakhtcheief brought upon the people of Russia, his death was widely and deeply deplored. There was so much that was honorable, and manly, and genial in him; he was so different to the miscreants who had preceded him on the throne; and, in his worst moments, he had evinced so many human and Christian virtues, that an impartial observer may well honor his memory, and a Russian lament his early death. He was indeed, with all his faults, a "happy accident."

By the law of Russia the crown now devolved upon the eldest of his surviving brothers, Constantine. The nation trembled at the prospect of his reign, for he was the exact counterpart of his father Paul. Endowed with as poor faculties, he was stained by the same vices and follies as that miserable monarch. He had the same inordinate passion for playing at soldiers, and worrying them about their tenue; his habits of tyranny when Grand Duke had obliged every one to fly his society; his ignorance was the scorn of his attendants. With his head and heart, he had inherited Paul's face and figure; presenting in this respect a striking contrast to his brothers. This was the man whose coronation was now hourly expected. We can well conceive the delight with which the nation heard that, by a formal act executed three years previously, Constantine had renounced his claims to the succession, which accordingly devolved upon his younger brother, Nicholas.

It was stated in the act of renunciation that Constantine waived his rights in consequence of his conscious incapacity to reign. There were better reasons for the proceeding than this. Paul's last words still rung in the ears of the imperial family and the court. The day had gone by when Russia could tamely submit to the rule of a parricide. Again, Constantine had separated from his first wife, and lived for years in the society of a dissolute Frenchwoman. She had, in her turn, made way in his affections for a young Polish lady, whose ears were closed to any proposal short of marriage. Constantine's wife was still alive; divorces are very rarely granted in the Greek Church; the amorous Grand Duke was in despair. Profiting by his perplexity, the Emperor Alexander, acting in concert with their mother, Marie, proposed a bargain to Constantine, by which, in exchange for the divorce he desired, he should renounce his claim to the succession. Constantine gratified his passion, and Alexander had the satisfaction of knowing that he was not to be succeeded by a second Paul, whose earliest act had been to share the murder of his father.

Nicholas was twenty-nine years of age when he came to the throne. Born the year of Catherine's death, he had been educated under the eye of his excellent mother, the Empress Marie, from whom he had derived sound religious instruction and high moral principle. Childhood had veiled from him the awful tragedy which closed his father's life, and the great wars which terminated with the burning of the Kremlin. Warned by the example of his brothers, his marriage had been delayed till he attained his majority, when he was united to Louise Charlotte, daughter of Frederic William III. of Prussia, a lady whose amiable character and fond affection have never been questioned. From the period of his marriage till his accession he had, like all members of the royal family, devoted himself to military studies. He lived retired, and spent most of his time in the barracks. It does not appear that he derived much fruit from his perseverance. He never was a good general, and frequently displayed such want of skill as to expose him to the ridicule of his officers. If we are to believe the works of some of his countrymen, he nearly contrived to frustrate the success of his own army in 1828, by his ill-judged interference and injudicious manoeuvres. Of the science of government and politics he knew still less. He had, however, great energy, vigorous purpose, and, at first, a firm desire to do well.

The very day of his accession, the most formidable revolt that Russia had known since the days of Michael Romanoff, broke out in the capital. It was not formidable by its strength or the skill by which it was marked: a couple of thousand officers and men of intellect composed its entire force, and their plans were woefully defective. But it differed from all former insurrections in its principle. They had been family quarrels for power, court intrigues, outbursts of insubordination among the soldiery—this was the first direct blow struck for popular rights. The aim of Rylieief in the north, and Pestel in the south, was to supersede the autocracy of the Czsars by a constitutional monarchy. They wanted freedom for themselves and their fellow-countrymen; and though they foresaw that the struggle might involve the death of the Czar, this they regarded as a mere incidental consequence, and not the main object of their movement. They would have accepted even Constantine, had he offered them constitutional guarantees for their natural rights. An insurrection on this ground was a new and a startling event for Russia.

On the 25th of December, the oath was to be administered to the regiments. Instead of swearing, several abandoned their barracks and marched to the great square in St. Petersburg on which the statue of Peter the Great rests, shouting, Hurrah for Constantine! They might as well have shouted, Hurrah for the Pope! so far as their purpose went—but all insurgents must have a rallying cry. Confiding his son to a loyal Finnish regiment, Nicholas took the command of a few trusty battalions, and advanced against the rebels. He tried again and again to divert them from their purpose; but failing, resorted at last, at nightfall, to the final expedient of grape. They were incapable of resisting, and, in an hour after the first cannon shot, the streets were cleared, and the rebellion was quelled. Ryléfief and several other leaders were taken, together with Pestel, whose movements in the south were anticipated. These two eminent men—the one, a stern republican of the old Roman school, whose soul knew no swerving from the direct line of principle, and who thought of nothing but freeing his country—the other, a chivalrous young officer, full of nobility, eloquence, and fire—were hanged, with three others, on the borders of the Neva. After the drop had fallen, three of the ropes broke, and the bodies of the condemned fell heavily into the grave already dug at their feet. "Cursed country," exclaimed Ryléfief, "where people can neither conspire, nor judge, nor hang!" Disabled by their fall, they were carried once more to the scaffold, and the gray dawn saw their bodies stiffened in death. Several other conspirators were sent to Siberia.

An ominous beginning for a reign. It had afforded Nicholas an opportunity for the display of personal courage; other qualities were now required of him. Like Alexander's, his early reign promised great things. He gained popularity by associating freely with his subjects, and interesting himself in their welfare. He cut down the expenses of the Court, and thus relieved the tax-payers. He undertook to reform every department of the government, and displayed untiring activity in the public business. His frame showed signs of the excessive labor he imposed on himself; his wife constantly pleaded with him for some relaxation from his toils. Where he could detect corruption, he punished it severely. Thus for a year or two he did well.

Soon, however, he struck upon the rock on which his brother had foundered. Insatiable ambition, traditional thirst for conquest, hurried him into wars. The taxes rose again. Discontent revived. Secret societies were formed. Insurrections broke out in various provinces. The old argument—grape—was brought to bear, and the poor peasants, who had rebelled because they would not starve, were shot because they could not pay. No one knows the history of these troubles. The truth is contraband in Russia: we must wait for years before they who saw those deeds will dare to tell them.

Then Poland, crushed under the iron heel of Constantine, made a feeble effort to rear its head. The club of Nicholas battered it to the earth. Effectually to prevent future complaints, whole provinces were depopulated. Men were shot in scores. Women—nuns—were imprisoned, scourged, and tortured for years, till, out of two large convents, only one poor, emaciated, crippled creature escaped to reveal the horrible history.

The retrograde movement was in full vigor. Secret police—the constant weapon of despotism—swarmed in the cities. In his anxiety to keep down the people, Nicholas lost sight of the villanies of the functionaries: corruption was never more universal. Restraints were placed on foreign travel; and Russian subjects were forbidden to publish any thing abroad. Fresh levies swelled the army to a monstrous extent. With a revenue not exceeding $100,000,000, one million of men were kept under arms. How any thing was left for those who were not soldiers is a mystery. It is almost a wonder how the judges and other public functionaries can contrive to steal as they do. Knowledge was proscribed. In the quaint words of a verse quoted by a recent writer:

"He said to the mind,
Go into darkness!
And signed it;
Be it so!
Czar Nikolai."

But in truth he could no less. There is no compromise possible between despotism and intelligence. Nicholas had to choose between crushing out every spark of intellect and freedom, and abandoning his throne. He chose the former. The domestic virtues which have marked the whole of his career show that he is not a bad man, as Paul and the Peters were. He loves his wife and his children, and leads a moral life. His immense labors for the codification of the Russian law, prove that he desired the good of his country. Even his implacable and cruel resentment at the delinquencies of corrupt officers, argues a sincere interest in the popular welfare.

Liberalism in an autocrat is a mistake. Alexander found it so; and so has Nicholas. He must be a vindictive, remorseless tyrant, filled with a deadly enmity to every thing that is noble, or good, or truly great in man; or he must cease to be an Emperor at all.

A TRAGEDY IN MARRIED LIFE.

I WAS sitting one summer evening in my chambers, sipping my after-dinner coffee, when, of all men in the world, who should step in but Dick Woodenspoon. I was very glad to see Dick, as I had a great regard for him. He was my chum in college, and some years my junior; so that I looked upon him almost with paternal feelings. He sat down, and we talked for some time upon indifferent subjects. At length Dick arose, took a turn or two through the room; then, coming up close to me, he spoke a few words in an indistinct and hurried manner.

"In the name of all that is serious, say that again, Dick, will you?—and speak slowly, that I may be sure I understand you.”

“Chubble, I’m going to be married!” repeated Dick Woodenspoon, in sounds of unmistakable import, but somewhat nervously emitted.

“Married!” said I, echoing him.

“Married!” replied he, echoing my echo.

There was a pause. At length I broke silence—

“Compose yourself, my dear fellow; finish your cup of coffee, and then tell me all about it.”

I turned my chair round to the fire, put my feet on the bars of the grate, and raised my hand to my eyes as if shading them from the light, but in reality that I might spare him the pain of being looked at. Oh, how I felt for his emotion!

“Well, my dear Caleb, you know very well what my opinion of matrimony has always been.”

“Ay, Dick; I knew you were hankering after that blessed estate any time this twelvemonth past.”

“And you know, Caleb, how I esteem the sex, and how happy I should account myself if I could find a woman who could come up to my beau idéal of a wife.”

“Ah, Dick, that’s the point—your beau idéal of a wife; but suppose she don’t, Dick. A woman’s appearance is all very well. She may have beauty and youth, and seem to be gentle and domestic, and all that, before you marry her; but who is to assure you that these are not all put on? Taking a wife is like buying railway shares—you judge by the prospectus, or the report of the Directors. You buy in, Sir, as you did last year, Dick, in the “Great Pankosmikon” Company—ten, twenty, thirty shares—well, it turns out to be a bubble, a bite, a hoax. Shares fall fifty per cent.—seventy-five—a hundred; and then you transfer them to a pauper to avoid a call; and well for you that you can do so, and get rid of them. But if your wife turns out a bad speculation, Dick, you can’t assign her to a pauper—remember that!”

“Nay,” but said Dick, deprecatingly, “hear me out, Caleb, before you pronounce upon the matter—won’t you?”

“Go on, Dick—go on.”

“Well, then, in the first place, my dear Lucy is a charming little girl in point of appearance; such dove-like eyes—the neck of the swan—the—”

“Oh, to be sure—‘Flammeolos oculos, colaque lacteola,’ but pass that over, Dick. Remember that beauty is at best evanescent; disease or accident may destroy it in an hour. As, says Socrates, ‘Καλλος μὲν γὰρ ἡ χρόνος ἀναισθεῖν ἢ νοσος ἐπαίειν.’”

“Nay. But what says St. Augustine?—‘Fulchritudo corporis bonum Dei donum est.’ A beautiful person is a goodly gift from God.”

“Well, well—have it your own way, Dick, in the matter of beauty. Admit, then, that she is fair as Venus. Pass on to the next.”

“A charming temper—modest, yet sprightly; affable, yet dignified; tender, yet reserved in her affections.”

“Hey-day! what a paragon of perfection! But how know you, Dick, that she has all those charms? Have you seen her angry, merry, laughing, weeping, hot, cold, sick, well-dressed, undressed—at all times, and in all gestures and passions? Have you seen how she carries herself with her parents, her friends, her companions?”

“She has no parents, nor a relative in the world, that I know of; and, to tell you the truth, I look upon that circumstance, my dear Caleb, as one of the most favorable to my prospects of matrimonial felicity. There will be nobody to divide her affections with me; no duties to distract her from those she will owe to me.”

“Well, Dick, there is something in that, I grant you. But where, pray, did you find this lone dove?”

“She came with my sister from school, to spend the vacation at my uncle’s, where I saw her for the first time.”

“I understand; and so then you knocked up this flirtation, and committed yourself irretrievably in the short space of three weeks. Oh, Dick, Dick!—aren’t you ashamed of yourself?”

“Ah, Caleb, if you had seen her and known her—”

“Pshaw, Dick! I tell you, where the matter is between a soft heart, like yours, and a pretty face, the more you saw of her the less you were able to know her. But go on, go on; don’t spare my feelings—let me hear all.”

And Dick did go on, and made a clean breast of it, poor fellow, as they say. He told me the progress of his love; the charms, both personal and mental, of the girl; the manner in which, despite of all his shyness, his sensitiveness, and his peculiarities on the subject of the sex, he was led, one fine summer’s evening, upon so short an acquaintance, to “offer his hand and his heart,” as the phrase is; how the young lady at first retired tearfully; how his sister sought her in her room; how they were closeted together, I know not how long; how she came forth in the twilight, smiling through her tears, like the moon through the night-mist (as Dick was pleased poetically to observe); how he renewed his suit; how he took her hand, how he raised it to his lips; how— But I had here peremptorily to interpose, and beg that he would spare himself the recital, and me the hearing, of such “love passages,” assuring him that I could find them all ready made to my hand in the fashionable novels of the day. He complied with my request, and summed up the matter in the intelligible observation, that his addresses were accepted.

“Lucy has left school,” he continued; “I have spoken to her guardian, obtained his assent, and am to be married in a few days. There is but one thing, my dear Caleb, that can add to my happiness, and that is, that you shall be present to witness it. Promise me that you will come to my wedding."

"Dick," said I, "my dear fellow, the thing is impossible. I can't leave this, even for a day, till the term is over. Besides, how do I know that I should be a witness to your happiness? Don't you remember I was the witness to the transfer of the shares in 'the Great Pankosmikon?' You were full of hope then, and yet did it make you happy? did the scheme prosper?"

"Don't, now, Caleb," said Dick, entreatingly—"don't say another word about the 'Pankosmikon,' please. You make me nervous—you do, indeed."

"Well, then, Dick, I won't: but I'll tell you what I'll do—When you are some time married, and can speak from experience; if you are able, with a true heart, to say, that all your bright anticipations have been realized—that you are happy, write to me, my dear fellow, and say so; and be well assured that no light matter shall prevent me going to you, and witnessing with my own eyes your contentment; but not now, Dick—not now."

Dick Woodenspoon arose to depart. He took his hat in his left hand, and with his right hand he grasped mine.

"God bless you, Caleb!" said he; "remember that my heart can never be so filled that there shall not be a corner for you."

"Adieu, Dick. My heart is but a solitary, ill-furnished apartment; you may occupy it entirely. May you be happy."

"Have no fears for me, Caleb. Remember what the son of Sirach says—'A good wife is a good portion. The grace of a wife delighteth her husband, and her discretion will fatten his bones.'"

"Ay, Dick; but says he not also, 'An evil wife is a yoke shaken to and fro; he that hath hold of her is as though he held a scorpion?'"

"Caleb, do you not know that the last gift which God gave man to complete his happiness was a wife?"

"Dick, Dick, are you not aware that the last evil which the devil wrought on Job was to leave him his wife after he had taken away all his goods?"

"Farewell, Caleb, till next we meet."

"Adieu, Dick: may that meeting be a happy one."

When Dick Woodenspoon left me, I fell into a meditation upon his case, and, sooth to say, my musings were of a checkered character. There was much that was good in him calculated to make any reasonable woman happy; and yet he had peculiarities that might wreck his own happiness and that of a wife, who might go on for half a century or so tranquil and contented with a husband of the ordinary run of men. Dick was generous, affectionate, good-natured, and, in the main, good-tempered; but he was fastidious, exacting, and, above all, he was of a most jealous disposition. A vulgar expression, a romping gesture, was sure to shock him, and at once transmute the idol of his admiration into an object of almost disgust. If he was attracted by a young lady, he threw his whole heart into the affair, and expected no less from her in return. She was to have eyes for no one, ears for no one, heart for no one but for himself; and so he watched with cat-like keenness of vision the approach of any other man to the object he had hedged round with his love, and his sensitive jealousy converted the most commonplace civilities into a daring attempt to take the sacred citadel by storm, and the simplest recognition, on the part of the lady, of a kindness or conventional politeness appeared to be an alarming indication of a traitorous disposition to surrender at discretion. Thus it was that little Jessie Mayflower, the poor parson's youngest daughter, ruined her prospects of a comfortable settlement, as Mrs. Woodenspoon, by laughing merrily in Dick's face when he gravely expressed his pain at having caught her in the act of swinging upon the paddock-gate with her young brothers. Poor Jessie! I think she had a happy riddance of him. He would have lectured her out of her very life, or, at all events, have made that life miserable. Better as she still is in her free, frank, blooming maidenhood, tending the old man, and giving and receiving love that knows no alloy or change. Then we all thought that Mary Weston was booked as Mrs. W.; and so she was, I verily believe; but, unfortunately, she refused to dance a third quadrille consecutively with Dick, not thinking it altogether decorous, though she sat down without a partner in order not to give him offense. But Dick's amour propre was wounded beyond the power of Mary's healing.

"Caleb," said he to me, a few days after, "the girl who could be ashamed of being suspected of returning the love of a man who had given her his whole heart, knows not how to love."

Matters had gone further still with Julia Marsden. Dick had actually popped the question to her after dinner, at her father's house. The girl, I really think, liked him very well, and would probably have accepted him too; but she was a sensible girl, and told him kindly, and, indeed, encouragingly, as he admitted afterward, that she should have the night to consider over his offer. This piqued Dick's sensitiveness not a little; but he suppressed his chagrin as well as she could, and commenced a tender tête-à-tête, which was sufficiently engrossing to soothe his vanity and set him right again. But Julia's mother saw the flirtation, and very discreetly determined that it should not be too remarkable. Accordingly, she sent over Captain Cleaver with a polite request that Julia would join him in a duet at the pianoforte. The young lady at once rose and complied. Dick was in a state of exalted jealousy. He sat moodily in his seat during the performance, avoided the girl for the rest of the evening, and, as he wished her good-night, expressed himself with a bitterness and severity upon the subject of her desertion that at once offended and roused her. Julia was a girl of spirit and sense. She did reflect on the matter during the night, and made up her mind, too, that a man of so jealous and exacting a disposition would not be likely to make her happy. And so next morning, when Dick called—for by that time he began to think he was not justified in his conduct—he received a note, in which the young lady politely declined the honor he had intended her. And yet I verily believe that if any woman could have suited Dick, and made him truly happy, by making him reasonable, Julia was just the one to have done so. She would neither have yielded weakly to his caprices, nor would she have rudely shocked his peculiarities; but she would have won him over to the knowledge of his own folly, and taught him to discard those feelings which were the greatest enemies of his peace.

"And now," said I to myself, after I had completed this retrospective survey of Dick's doings for the last twelve months, "there, he's off again; he's been and done it, and no mistake. He's going to marry some milkmaid of a girl, with blue eyes, and a smell of new hay about her. A fool belike, that will lie a-bed reading novels or poetry, and trash of that sort; or an artful puss, that has put on simplicity and sentimentality to hoax poor Dick, playing the angel before marriage that she may play the devil after it. Well, well, it's no affair of mine, after all; hasn't he a right to squander old Woodenspoon's console and three per cents in woman-flesh as well as in railway shares? The old fellow can't look out of his grave at his son's speculations in the wife or the money market."

In due time, or undue—I'm sure I don't know well which I ought to call it—Dick Woodenspoon was married. I learned this fact by the receipt of cards, the day after the wedding; and in a few days after I had a letter from Dick himself, from Brussels, full of raptures, and so forth, declaring that his wife was an angel, and he the happiest of the human species, and announcing, furthermore, that they were making their marriage trip—the Rhine, Switzerland, and back through France. "I hope all this may last," thought I, as I finished reading the letter, "but I wish it had been a little less high-flown. Those raptures must come to an end, some way or other; they must either wear out the man or wear out themselves, and then— Well, well, there's no good in croaking; sufficient for the day is the evil thereof, and who knows but all may come right in the long run, when they settle down a bit?" and so I dismissed the subject from my thoughts, and busied myself about my own proper business. What had I to do with love affairs?

Time passed on, the summer was over, and the term just ended. I was free for a while, and was meditating a trip through Scotland, to geologize a little, and botanize a little, and ruralize a great deal, when, just as I was stowing away my hammer, microscope, and a few odds and ends, in the way of linen, into my bag, I received a letter with the Paris post-mark. The direction was in Dick Woodenspoon's handwriting, so I opened it immediately.

"Paris, Hotel de Lisle et Albion, Rue St. Honore.

"MY DEAR CALEB—My dream of happiness is over, and I have awoke to the reality of wretchedness. I can not command my feelings sufficiently to write to you the details of my affliction. Come to me, my dearest friend; come to me, without a moment's delay. When last we met you promised me that, when I should write to you that I was happy, you would come and witness my happiness. Now that I tell you I am the most miserable of men, will you not fly to comfort and sustain me?"

"RICHARD WOODENSPOON."

I was greatly shocked at this communication. Its vagueness was a thousandfold more painful than any recital of the real facts of the case could be. I tortured myself with a thousand conjectures, but to no purpose. The only conclusion to which I arrived, with any degree of confidence, was, that his misfortune was of a matrimonial nature. I lost no time in setting off for Paris, and found myself the next day in my friend's apartment. Poor Dick flung himself into my arms in an agony of grief that was quite alarming.

"Oh! Caleb, my friend, I am the most wretched, the most unfortunate of human beings; a deceived and dishonored husband—an outcast from society—a wanderer on the face of the earth. Caleb, do not loathe me, do not spurn me; I am a—MURDERER!"

He smote his brow wildly with his open palm, and sank upon a chair, overcome with his emotions. I was thunderstruck—horrified, almost unmanned.

"For God's sake, my dear fellow, compose yourself, and tell me all; let me know the worst—I will never desert you."

He grasped my hand, and wept like a child.

"Come, come, Dick, this will never do; be a man, and bear your fate, whatever it be, like a man. Open your whole heart to me; you know I can neither advise nor comfort you unless you do so."

Dick gave a sigh so loud, so deep, so long, that I thought he must have expelled every atom of air out of his body, and I almost expected (such ludicrous thoughts will sometimes force themselves upon the mind, even during the gravest moments) to see his chest collapse, like one of those paper bags which little boys crush together for the fun of driving the air out with a report. By degrees he became composed, and, between coaxing and admonishing, I got the whole story of his misfortunes out of him. Nothing, it seemed, could exceed the felicity of the young couple for the first few weeks of their married life. Lucy was all that Dick's heart could desire; she lived for him alone—she saw through his eyes—she heard through his ears. Like Petruchio's Catherine, she would have said of any object in nature—

—“Be it moon, or sun, or what you please;
And if you please to call it a rush candle,
Henceforth I vow it shall be so for me.”

Had he said the Jungfrau was a lake, she would have expatiated upon its depth and darkness. She would have pronounced the falls of Shaffhausen a forest of pines at his bidding, and the roar of its waters the song of the nightingale. And so they went on, loving and roving through the length and breadth of the land, like a pair of silly turtle-doves. But I will relate the rest in Dick's own words: “We had reached Geneva on our return homeward. Here we entered somewhat into society, less to please myself than to gratify my wife. We went to spectacles, to concerts, which she enjoyed amazingly; we even attended one of the balls, and Lucy danced with a young German—a broad-shouldered fellow, with blue eyes, a light beard, and long yellow locks that fell down upon his neck. He seemed quite amis with her, and she, Caleb, seemed to me to receive his attentions with more complacency than I thought was becoming. I was hurt, and somewhat cool in my manner to her; she was sad and dejected. I said nothing on the subject; but I left Geneva the following day, and proceeded to Lyons. We were scarcely seated at the table d'hôte when who should sit down beside her but the same German fellow. I returned his cordial salutation with reserve and coldness. He turned from me, and addressed himself to her. She was evidently embarrassed. The dinner was at length ended—I thought it would never come to a close. I hurried her away as soon as I could rise with decency. I spoke to her very gently, but expressed very decidedly my disapprobation of those Continental freedoms. She made no reply, but the tears came into her eyes, and she looked at me sorrowfully and even upbraidingly. From that moment we were ill at ease with each other. Our intercourse lost all its charm. We left Lyons. I was moody—she was melancholy; and more than once I surprised her in tears. We stopped at Chalons-sur-Soane. I liked the place, and took a pretty little retired cottage on the banks of the river, intending to pass a few weeks there in retirement, if not in tranquillity. In this sweet seclusion I was regaining my peace of mind, and Lucy was becoming more like her former self. One day I went into the town, and passing by the principal hotel, I saw a young man loitering at the open window, smoking a meerschau half a yard long; he had a red velvet cap, with a gold tassel, on his head. I looked at him—I could not be mistaken in the blue eyes, yellow locks, and light-brown mustache—yes, Caleb, it was that infernal German. I proceeded on my way homeward, meditating gloomily upon this ill-omened rencontre. What could have brought him to Chalons? what brought him to Lyons? Was there no other route in the wide continent of Europe for him to choose but that which my wife and I were traveling? When I reached our cottage I was thoroughly out of humor. Lucy perceived my chagrin, and endeavored to cheer me. I repelled her overtures. We sat down to dinner, and scarcely interchanged a word. We walked in the evening along the bank of the river. I believe I should have walked all night, so fully was I engrossed with my painful thoughts, had not my wife at length complained of fatigue, and we returned. Next morning after breakfast I proposed that she should accompany me to the chateau of a neighboring gentleman, who had invited me to join in a day's shooting. To my surprise and annoyance she declined, for the first time in her life, to accede to my request, excusing herself on the plea of a headache, or a swelled foot, or something of that sort. I had promised my friend to meet him that day, so I took my gun and went on my way. It was late before I proceeded homeward, so that the sun had set some time before I reached my cottage gate. I remember how sweet and tranquil the scene looked in the dim twilight. The low window of the sitting-room was open, for it was a warm evening, but there was no light within it. I was close up to it upon the soft, close-shaved grass, when I heard the voice of my wife—

“At this hour, then, to-morrow.”

“At the same moment I beheld, by the fading light, my wife seated in a fauteuil, and at her feet, kneeling upon one knee—a man! The blood rushed up into my head, my eyes swam—I staggered; but the devil prompted me to take vengeance. I raised my gun, and fired at the villain. The man fell; my wife uttered a loud shriek, and, springing up, her eyes met mine; she recognized me, and fell to the ground. I rushed from the spot, and found myself in the town, I know not how. I hurried to the railway station, a train was just about to start for Paris; I took my ticket, flung myself into a carriage, which fortunately was vacant, and traveled hither through that miserable night. What I have endured since I can not describe to you. My sole occupation is to brood over my sorrow, to curse my destiny. I have not the courage to look at a journal, though racked by anxiety and fear; for I dread to read the disclosure of my dishonor and my crime.”

Before an hour had elapsed I was on my way to Chalons. The result of my conference with my unhappy friend was the determination to visit the scene of his misfortune, to see his wretched wife if possible, to investigate the whole affair, and to be guided by the issue as to my subsequent proceedings. The following morning I was at the door of Woodenspoon's cottage. It was opened by a rosy-faced country-girl.

“Can madam be seen?” I demanded.

The girl hesitated.

“Take this to her,” said I, giving her my card, “and tell her that I entreat her to see me upon important business.”

In a short time the girl returned and led me into the salon; in a moment after the door was hurriedly opened, and a lady tottered forward. Her face was pale as death, and her eyelids red and swollen from weeping.

"Oh, Mr. Chubble," cried she, seizing my hand, "you come from my husband—I know you do—you are his dearest friend. Where is he? where is he?"

"I do come from your husband, madam," I said, very gravely; "but before I give you any further information I must first trouble you to answer a few questions. Pray be seated."

I looked at the woman that now sat trembling beside me. She was not only very pretty, but very prepossessing in appearance. "So young, so fair, so artless-looking, can it be that she has thus gone astray?" Such were my reflections as I regarded her in silence. My heart was softened toward her, despite of myself.

"Madam," I resumed, in a kinder tone, "you must be perfectly unreserved with me, if you hope that I can effect any good in this unhappy affair. Your husband has told me all."

"Oh, Sir, he has not told you all; he could not, for he does not know all. I will reserve nothing from you, as you are his friend. When you have heard all, you will surely pity me. Oh! I am most wretched!"

And the poor thing did tell me all—her whole married life—her trials—her temptations—her struggles—her failings—and I listened to her with moistened eyes, I am not ashamed to confess it; and I did pity her with my whole heart, and I told her so when she had concluded her sad story.

"It is indeed very terrible," I said, taking her poor trembling hand; "a dreadful lesson of the consequences of giving way to the solicitations of passion."

"Oh, Mr. Chubble, call it by its right name—it was madness! Would to heaven that I had accompanied him that day, or that he had staid with me."

"Well, let us now consider what is best to be done. The matter may admit of some arrangement."

We continued to talk for some time anxiously, and I arranged my plans, and left the lady, promising to call again in the course of the day.

At noon the same day I sat in a private room of the principal hotel at Chalons, in conversation with a young man whom I met there by appointment. The matter under discussion between us required some tact on my part, and I flatter myself that I ultimately arranged it to the satisfaction of both parties. At length our conference was ended, and we arose.

"You agree, then, Monsieur," said I, "to the terms as I have written them down."

"I do, Monsieur."

"Will you be so good, then, as to sign this paper."

"Certainly, Monsieur."

And the young man did so.

"I rely, then, upon your observing them faithfully," and I stretched out my hand.

"Monsieur may depend upon me," said the young man, as his fingers touched my palm, "he has my word of honor."

"Ay," thought I, as I bowed him out, "I have something more binding to rely upon than your word of honor. Well, now for the cottage once more."

Within four-and-twenty hours I was again in Paris, in the same hotel at which Dick was stopping, where I took a snug sitting-room, with a bedroom inside of it. I dispatched a line to him, requesting his presence in monero dixant. Dick came immediately, and I was shocked to see how much he was changed for the worse, even in the short interval since I left him. His first question was, naturally enough, about the homicide.

"Is he dead, Caleb?"

"No."

"Oh, thank God!" and the poor fellow clasped his hands, and looked up thankfully to heaven.

"Is he recovering?"

"Humph—no;" and I shook my head oracularly. "I fear he is not likely to get better."

Dick groaned, and sank down on a chair.

"The man is as well as he can be, and likely to continue so—a healthy-looking fellow he is, by-the-by; broad-shouldered and—"

"Spare me—spare me, Caleb. How can you—?"

"Richard Woodenspoon," said I, rising and addressing him sternly, "listen to me. It is owing to the mercy of God, and not to the forbearance of a weak, passionate man, such as you are, that the youth is not now a corpse, and you a murderer. Hear me while I make known to you two characters of whom as yet you know but little—yourself and your wife. I know the whole of this unhappy affair, and you shall now learn it. You shall hear the confessions and revelations of your own wretched wife, wrung from her by the urgency of the case. She has revealed you, oh! how unwillingly, how tenderly, how extenuatingly, as one whose jealousy exacted from her not free heart-love, but slavish woman-worship: fettering her tongue, her ears, her thoughts, and, as I may say, placing winkers at her eyes, and forcing her to look neither to the right nor to the left, but always straight forward at you—you, and nothing but you! You curbed all the freedoms of her innocent soul; you made her heart sad by your moodiness, and then you resented her sadness; you withdrew your love from her upon every fancied offense, and then you repelled her returning affection; you worried her with your caprices; you grieved her with your reproofs; and, shame upon you, man! you dared to suspect the loyalty of your own wife upon the most absurd fantasies that ever filled the brain of a madman. And she, poor soul, confessed too, what she called 'her temptations, her struggles, her failings'—ay, that she was tempted often and sorely to 'return railing for railing'—that she struggled against her woman's nature, that prompted her to rebel against the cruel yoke that crushed down her fair, young neck; but her woman's heart always kept her true and upright. And her failings, heaven help her! what were they? Why, forsooth, that she failed in the submissive duty of a spaniel. And now hear what she did do—she loved you with the singleness of a heart that had no other object to occupy it. You were to her, father and mother, brother and sister—you filled her whole heart; but that did not satisfy you—you would not let the thoughts of another earthly creature approach even to touch the hem of her garment; you took umbrage at a young gentleman because he behaved like a gentleman and paid respectful attention to your wife, because he seemed to admire her. I hope he did admire her, or I should not give three halfpence for him. You were indignant that he should chance to travel the same road as you, or stop at the same hotel as you; you delivered yourself over to the devil—the devil of jealousy that entered you and possessed you, body and soul—blinding your eyes, hardening your heart, and warping your understanding. And what was the consequence? You wearied her one night off her feet with walking, and when, next day, she would not accompany you, limping upon a swollen foot, you left her, with your heart full of bitterness against her. Well, smarting under the sense of pain, she took advantage of your absence to admit a young man into her presence—yes, she has confessed it—to approach her person—to kneel down before her—to lay his hand upon her—ay, I see you wince, but you must bear it—upon the tenderest part—her swollen foot! that the young rake, a quiet respectable shoemaker! might enlarge her boot, to enable her to walk next day with your lordship without undergoing absolute agony. Ha! ha! ha! You ought to be proud of yourself, oughtn't you?"

I paused—for with all my anger I could not help feeling pity for the wretched man who now crouched before me with his face buried in his hands; but I repressed the feeling. I knew I had a great operation to perform—one on which the very life of my patient depended; and so I was determined that no weakness of heart should make my eye wince or my hand tremble. I had cut down deep and wide upon the morbid part of his nature, and I would not leave a particle of it remaining, so I continued:

"In your blind fury you fired at the poor mechanic. Some good angel struck the barrel upward and you missed him; but the high-spirited gallant who came to invade your honor, fell sprawling to the ground in mortal terror. Man, your innocent wife looked up into your face; she guessed the truth, for she knew you—that moment revealed you to her in your most detestable colors—she sank down, a miserable creature, without hope or faith in you. I wonder her heart didn't break. Well, you fled, after you had achieved this valiant duel. And what did your poor wife do when she came to herself? Why, denounced you of course as you deserved? Oh, no; with ready-witted tenderness for your reputation, she said, in perfect truth—though had it been false, it would have been a pardonable falsehood—that some madman had fired the shot, and she supplicated the gallant not to speak of it, as it might disturb you if it came to your ears. But your absence was soon noticed—the man began to suspect that you were the maniac—and I arrived just in time to prevent his putting the matter into the hands of the mayor. I told him that you were the man—that you were mad—that your family were anxious to save themselves the disgrace of an exposure—think of that admission; and so I patched up the matter with him. He signed an agreement to hold his tongue upon getting two hundred and fifty francs, which I paid him on the spot, and a promise of two hundred and fifty more when you are safe in England. And now, Richard Woodenspoon, impeacher of your own honor—defamer of your own wife—murderer (in the eyes of God) of your fellow-man, what have you to say for yourself? Hold up your head and hold up your hand, and answer to my arraignment—GUILTY, or not GUILTY?"

"Guilty, guilty! Caleb. But oh, if you love me, dear Caleb, with any of our ancient love, desert me not now in my extremity. Where is my poor wife? Let me fly to her; let me sue for pardon; let me comfort her."

"You would seek her in vain, Richard; she has left the cottage."

"Whither has she gone? Let me know. I have a right to know."

"Right! what right, pray? That of a loving husband and a faithful guardian, eh?"

"Man, hard-hearted man, you try me too cruelly. You know where she is; let me seek her."

"I do know where she is; but you shall not seek her. No, Dick;" and the door of the bedroom flew open as I spoke. "She seeks you—the true wife, the long-suffering, the forgiving. Take her to your arms. Whom God hath joined together, let no man put asunder."

The pendule in my bedroom had chimed the quarters twice, as I paced to and fro, and I could, each time I approached the door, hear the soothing accents of the husband, and the gentle sobbing of the wife. At length I felt it was time to check this over-indulgence of feeling. So I knocked at the door, and then entered.

"Oh, Caleb!" said Dick, wringing my hand, "truest of friends!"

"Oh, dear Mr. Chubble, best of men!" cried Lucy, smiling through her tears.

"Hush, dear lady, Mr. Woodenspoon will be jealous, if you address me in such terms."

"Caleb, Caleb, spare me."

"Dear Mr. Chubble, forgive him!"

"When one so wronged as you can forgive him, it is very easy for me to do so."

"And now," thought I, "one touch of the cautery to make the wounds heal, and I renounce surgery forever."

"Dick Woodenspoon, listen to me once again, and for the last time. You have been tried severely, and learned a lesson which I hope will last you all the days of your life. Pardon me if I shrank not from striking heavily—I did it in love. You now know the value of your wife. Pray to God every day of your life that you may be worthy of her. Truth and virtue like hers are not like the hues of the photograph; they will stand the warm glare of the sun, and the breath of heaven, and the touch of the world's hand, and be not a whit the less pure or the less bright. Confide more in her and less in yourself, and believe that a woman is the best guardian of her own honor and of her husband's. Give your own kindly heart fair play, Dick, and love her with the whole strength of it—unselfishly, as a man should love a woman, and not as a child loves a toy. But mark me, Dick, should you ever again go off in your tantrums, then let this sweet child come to me for protection:" and as I spoke I drew her over to my side, and kissed her fair brow. "As sure as my name is Chubble, I will divorce you from her, and marry her myself—I will, by heaven! And now, God bless you; I'll take a lounge in the Champs Elysées till 'tis time to dine."

My surgery worked a complete cure upon Dick Woodenspoon. He made the best husband in the world, and he and his wife were a pattern couple. A little more than a year afterward I paid them a visit. Lucy was then a blooming matron, but she had formed a new attachment, and Dick was not at all jealous of her divided love; nay, I must admit that he loved her all the better when he saw her caressing their little boy. He wasn't in the least jealous of any thing she said or did, and endured with wonderful complacency my kissing his wife upon our first meeting. We had some pleasant chat about old times as we sat over our wine by the fireside after dinner, and as Lucy held up little Dick to me to kiss, and I looked into his large, staring blue eyes, and saw the incipient growth of soft flaxen hair upon his little skull, she smiled archly at her husband as she said—

"Hasn't he fine, broad shoulders, Caleb?"

THE NEWCOMES.*

MEMOIRS OF A MOST RESPECTABLE FAMILY.

BY W. M. THACKERAY.

CHAPTER XLII.

INJURED INNOCENCE.

From Olive Newcome, Esq., to Lieut.-Col. Newcome, C.B.

"BRIGHTON, June 12, 18—.

"MY DEAREST FATHER—As the weather was growing very hot at Naples, and you wished I should come to England to see Mr. Binnie, I came accordingly; and have been here three weeks, and write to you from Aunt Honeyman's parlor at Brighton, where you ate your last dinner before embarking for India. I found your splendid remittance on calling in Fog Court, and have invested a part of the sum in a good horse to ride, upon which I take my diversion with other young dandies in the park. Florac is in England, but he has no need of your kindness. Only think! he is Prince de Moncontour now, the second title of the Duc d'Ivry's family; and M. le Comte de Florac is Duc d'Ivry in consequence of the demise of t'other old gentleman. I believe the late duke's wife shortened his life. O what a woman! She caused a duel between Lord Kew and a Frenchman, which has in its turn occasioned all sorts of evil and division in families, as you shall hear.

"In the first place, in consequence of the duel and of incompatibility of temper, the match between Kew and E. N. has been broken off. I met Lord Kew at Naples with his mother and brother, nice quiet people as you would like them. Kew's wound and subsequent illness have altered him a good deal. He has become much more serious than he used to be; not ludicrously so at all, but he says he thinks his past life has been useless and even criminal, and he wishes to change it. He has sold his horses, and sown his wild oats. He has turned quite a sober, quiet gentleman.

"At our meeting he told me of what had happened between him and Ethel, of whom he spoke most kindly and generously, but avowing his opinion that they never could have been happy in married life. And now I think my dear old father will see that there may be another reason besides my desire to see Mr. Binnie, which has brought me tumbling back to England again. If need be to speak, I never shall have, I hope, any secrets from you. I have not said much about one which has given me the deuce's disquiet for ten months past; because there was no good in talking about it, or vexing you needlessly with reports of my griefs and woes.

"Well, when we were at Baden in September last, and E. and I wrote those letters in common to you, I daresay you can fancy what my feelings might have been toward such a beautiful young creature, who has a hundred faults, for which I love her just as much as for the good that is in her. I became dreadfully smitten indeed, and knowing that she was engaged to Lord Kew, I did as you told me you did once when the enemy was too strong for you—I ran away. I had a bad time of it for two or three months. At Rome, however, I began to take matters more easily, my naturally fine appetite returned, and at the end of the season I found myself uncommonly happy in the society of the Miss Balliols and the Miss Freemans; but when Kew told me at Naples of what had happened, there was straightway a fresh eruption in my heart, and I was fool enough to come almost without sleep to London in order to catch a glimpse of the bright eyes of E. N.

"She is now in this very house up-stairs with one aunt, while the other lets lodgings to her. I have seen her but very seldom indeed since I came to London, where Sir Brian and Lady Ann do not pass the season, and Ethel goes about to a dozen parties every week with old Lady Kew, who neither loves you nor me. Hearing E. say she was coming down to her parents at Brighton, I made so bold as to waylay her at the train (though I didn't tell her that I passed three hours in the waiting-room); and we made the journey together, and she was very kind and beautiful, and though I suppose I might just as well ask the Royal Princess to have me, I can't help hoping and longing and hankering after her. And Aunt Honeyman must have found out that I am fond of her, for the old lady has received me with a scolding. Uncle Charles seems to be in very good condition again. I saw him in full clerical feather at Madame de Moncontour's, a good-natured body who drops her h's, though Florac is not aware of their absence. Pendennis and Warrington I know would send you their best regards. Pen is conceited, but much kinder in reality than he has the air of being. Fred Bayham is doing well, and prospering in his mysterious way.

"Mr. Binnie is not looking at all well; and Mrs. Mack—well, as I know you never attack a lady behind her lovely back, I won't say a word of Mrs. Mack—but she has taken possession of Uncle James, and seems to me to weigh upon him somehow. Rosey is as pretty and good-natured as ever, and has learned two new songs; but you see with my sentiments in another quarter, I feel as it were guilty and awkward in company of Rosey and her mamma. They have become the very greatest friends with Bryanstone Square, and Mrs. Mack is always citing Aunt Hobson as the most superior of women, in which opinion I daresay Aunt Hobson concurs.

"Good-by, my dearest father; my sheet is full; I wish I could put my arm in yours and pace up and down the pier with you, and tell you more and more. But you know enough now, and that I am your affectionate son always,
C. N."

In fact, when Mr. Clive appeared at Stayne Gardens, stepping out of the fly, and handing Miss Ethel thence, Miss Honeyman of course was very glad to see her nephew, and saluted him with a little embrace to show her sense of pleasure at his visit. But the next day, being Sunday, when Clive with a most engaging smile on his countenance walked over to breakfast from his hotel, Miss Honeyman would scarcely speak to him during the meal, looked out at him very haughtily from under her Sunday cap, and received his stories about Italy with "Oh! ah! indeed!" in a very unkind manner. And when breakfast was over, and she had done washing her china, she fluttered up to Clive with such an agitation of plumage, redness of brow, and anger of manner, as a maternal hen shows if she has reason to think you menace her chickens. She fluttered up to Clive, I say, and cried out, "Not in this house, Clive—not in this house, I beg you to understand that!"

Clive, looking amazed, said, "Certainly not, ma'am; I never did do it in the house, as I know you don't like it. I was going into the Square." The young man meaning that he was about to smoke, and conjecturing that his aunt's anger applied to that practice.

"You know very well what I mean, Sir! Don't try to turn me off in that highy-tighty way. My dinner to-day is at half-past one. You can dine or not as you like," and the old lady flounced out of the room.

Poor Clive stood rolling his cigar in sad perplexity of spirit, until Mrs. Honeyman's servant Hannah entered, who, for her part, grinned and looked particularly sly. "In the name of goodness, Hannah, what is the row about?" cries Mr. Clive. "What is my aunt scolding at? What are you grinning at, you old Cheshire cat?"

"Git long, Master Clive," says Hannah, patting the cloth.

"Get along! why get along, and where am I to get along to?"

"Did'ee do ut really now, Master Clive?" cries Mrs. Honeyman's attendant, grinning with the utmost good-humor. "Well, she be as pretty a young lady as ever I saw; and as I told my Missis, 'Miss Martha,' says I, 'there's a pair on 'em.' Though, Missis was mortal angry to be sure. She never could bear it."

"Bear what? you old goose!" cries Clive, who by these playful names had been wont to designate Hannah these twenty years past.

"A young gentleman and a young lady a-kissing of each other in the railway coach," says Hannah, jerking up with her finger to the ceiling, as much as to say, "There she is! Lar, she be a pretty young creature, that she be! and so I told Miss Martha." Thus differently had the news which had come to them on the previous night affected the old lady and her maid.

The news was, that Miss Newcome's maid (a giddy thing from the country, who had not even learned as yet to hold her tongue) had announced with giggling delight to Lady Ann's maid, who was taking tea with Mrs. Hicks, that Mr. Clive had given Miss Ethel a kiss in the tunnel, and she supposed it was a match. This intelligence Hannah Hicks took to her mistress, of whose angry behavior to Clive the next morning you may now understand the cause.

Clive did not know whether to laugh or to be in a rage. He swore that he was as innocent of all intention of kissing Miss Ethel as of embracing Queen Elizabeth. He was shocked to think of his cousin, walking above, fancy-free in maiden meditation, while this conversation regarding her was carried on below. How could he face her, or her mother, or even her maid, now he had cognizance of this naughty calumny? "Of course Hannah had contradicted it?" "Of course I have a-done no such a thing indeed," replied Master Clive's old friend; "of course I have set 'em down a bit; for when little Trimmer said it, and she supposed it was all settled between you, seeing how it had been a-going on in foreign parts last year, Mrs. Pincott says, 'Hold your silly tongue, Trimmer,' she says; 'Miss Ethel marry a painter, indeed, Trimmer!' says she, 'while she has refused to be a Countess,' she says; 'and can be a Marchioness any day, and will be a Marchioness. Marry a painter, indeed!' Mrs. Pincott says; 'Trimmer, I'm surprised at your impudence.' So, my dear, I got angry at that," Clive's champion continued, "and says I, if my young Master ain't good enough for any young lady in this world, says I, I'd like you to show her to me: and if his dear father, the Colonel, says I, ain't as good as your old gentleman up-stairs, says I, who has gruel and dines upon doctor's stuff, then, Mrs. Pincott, says I, my name isn't what it is, says I. Those were my very words, Master Clive, my dear; and then Mrs. Pincott says, Mrs. Hicks, she says, you don't understand society, she says; you don't understand society, he! he!" and the country lady, with considerable humor, gave an imitation of the town lady's manner.

At this juncture Miss Honeyman re-entered the parlor, arrayed in her Sunday bonnet, her stiff and spotless collar, her Cashmere shawl, and Agra brooch, and carrying her Bible and Prayer-book, each stitched in its neat cover of brown silk. "Don't stay chattering here, you idle woman," she cried to her attendant with extreme asperity. "And you, Sir, if you wish to smoke your cigars, you had best walk down to the cliff where the Cockneys are!" she added, glowering at Clive.

"Now I understand it all," Clive said, trying to deprecate her anger. "My dear good aunt, it's a most absurd mistake; upon my honor Miss Ethel is as innocent as you are."

"Innocent or not, this house is not intended for assignations, Clive! As long as Sir Brian Newcome lodges here, you will be pleased to keep away from it, Sir; and though I don't approve of Sunday traveling, I think the very best thing you can do is to put yourself in the train and go back to London."

And now, young people, who read my moral pages, you will see how highly imprudent it is to sit with your cousins in railway-carriages; and how, though you may not mean the slightest harm in the world, a great deal may be attributed to you; and how, when you think you are managing your little absurd love-affairs ever so quietly, Jeames and Betsy in the servants'-hall are very likely talking about them, and you are putting yourself in the power of those menials. If the perusal of these lines has rendered one single young couple uncomfortable, surely my amiable end is answered, and I have written not altogether in vain.

Clive was going away, innocent though he was, yet quivering under his aunt's reproof, and so put out of countenance that he had not even thought of lighting the great cigar which he stuck into his foolish mouth; when a shout of "Clive! Clive!" from half-a-dozen little voices roused him, and presently as many little Newcomes came toddling down the stairs, and this one clung round his knees, and that at the skirts of his coat, and another took his hand and said, he must come and walk with them on the beach.

So away went Clive to walk with his cousins, and then to see his old friend Miss Cann, with whom and the elder children he walked to church, and issuing thence greeted Lady Ann and Ethel (who had also attended the service) in the most natural way in the world.

While engaged in talking with these, Miss Honeyman came out of the sacred edifice, crisp and stately in the famous Agra brooch and Cashmere shawls. The good-natured Lady Ann had a smile and a kind word for her as for every body. Clive went up to his maternal aunt to offer his arm. "You must give him up to us for dinner, Miss Honeyman, if you please to be so very kind. He was so good-natured in escorting Ethel down," Lady Ann said.

"Hm! my lady," says Miss Honeyman, perking her head up in her collar. Clive did not know whether to laugh or not, but a fine blush illuminated his countenance. As for Ethel, she was and looked perfectly unconscious. So, rustling in her stiff black silk, Martha Honeyman walked with her nephew silent by the shore of the much-sounding sea. The idea of courtship, of osculatory processes, of marrying and giving in marriage, made this elderly virgin chafe and fume, she never having, at any period of her life, indulged in any such ideas or practices, and being angry against them, as childless wives will sometimes be angry and testy against matrons with their prattle about their nurseries. Now, Miss Cann was a different sort of spinster, and loved a bit of sentiment with all her heart, from which I am led to conclude—but, pray, is this the history of Miss Cann or of the Newcomes?

All these Newcomes then entered into Miss Honeyman's house, where a number of little knives and forks were laid for them. Ethel was cold and thoughtful; Lady Ann was perfectly good-natured as her wont was. Sir Brian came in on the arm of his valet presently, wearing that look of extra neatness which invalids have, who have just been shaved and combed, and made ready by their attendants to receive company. He was voluble: though there was a perceptible change in his voice: he talked chiefly of matters which had occurred forty years ago, and especially of Clive's own father, when he was a boy, in a manner which interested the young man and Ethel. "He threw me down in a chaise—sad chap—always reading Orme's History of India—wanted marry Frenchwoman. He wondered Mrs. Newcome didn't leave Tom any thing—'pon my word, quite a surprise." The events of to-day, the House of Commons, the City, had little interest for him. All the children went up and shook him by the hand, with awe in their looks, and he patted their yellow heads vacantly and kindly. He asked Clive (several times) where he had been? and said he himself had had a slight 'tack—vay slight—was getting well ev'ry day—strong as a horse—go back to Parliament d'rectly. And then he became a little peevish with Parker, his man, about his broth. The man retired, and came back presently, with profound bows and gravity, to tell Sir Brian dinner was ready, and he went away quite briskly at this news, giving a couple of fingers to Clive before he disappeared into the upper apartments. Good-natured Lady Ann was as easy about this as about the other events of this world. In later days, with what a strange feeling we remember that last sight we have of the old friend; that nod of farewell, and shake of the hand, that last look of the face and figure as the door closes on him, or the coach drives away! So the roast mutton was ready, and all the children dined very heartily.

The infantile meal had not been long concluded, when servants announced "the Marquis of Farintosh;" and that nobleman made his appearance to pay his respects to Miss Newcome and Lady Ann. He brought the very last news of the very last party in London, where "Really, upon my honor, now, it was quite a stupid party, because Miss Newcome wasn't there. It was now, really."

Miss Newcome remarked, "If he said so upon his honor, of course she was satisfied."

"As you weren't there," the young nobleman continued, "the Miss Rackstraws came out quite strong; really they did now, upon my honor. It was quite a quiet thing. Lady Merriborough hadn't even got a new gown on. Lady Ann, you shirk London society this year, and we miss you: we expected you to give us two or three things this season; we did now, really. I said to Tufthunt, only yesterday, why has not Lady Ann Newcome given any thing? You know Tufthunt? They say he's a clever fellow, and that—but he's a low little beast, and I hate him."

Lady Ann said, "Sir Brian's bad state of health prevented her from going out this season, or receiving at home."

"It don't prevent your mother from going out, though," continued my lord. "Upon my honor, I think unless she got two or three things every night, I think she'd die. Lady Kew's like one of those horses, you know, that unless they go they drop."

"Thank you for my mother," said Lady Ann.

"She is, upon my honor. Last night I know she was at ever so many places. She dined at the Bloxam's, for I was there. Then she said she was going to sit with old Mrs. Crackthorpe, who has broke her collar bone (that Crackthorpe in the Life Guards, her grandson, is a brute, and I hope she won't leave him a shillin'); and then she came on to Lady Hawkstone's, where I heard her say she had been at the—at the Flowerdales', too. People begin to go to those Flowerdales. Hanged if I know where they won't go next. Cotton spinner, wasn't he?"

"So were we, my lord," says Miss Newcome.

"Oh yes, I forgot! But you're of an old family—very old family."

"We can't help it," said Miss Ethel, archly. "Indeed, she thought she was."

"Do you believe in the Barber-Surgeon?" asked Clive. And my lord looked at him with a noble curiosity, as much as to say, "Who the deuce was the Barber-Surgeon? and who the devil are you?"

"Why should we disown our family?" Miss Ethel said, simply. "In those early days I suppose people did—did all sorts of things, and it was not considered at all out of the way to be Surgeon to William the Conqueror."

"Edward the Confessor," interposed Clive. "And it must be true, because I have seen a picture of the Barber-Surgeon: a friend of mine, M'Collop, did the picture, and I dare say it is for sale still."

Lady Ann said "she should be delighted to see it." Lord Farintosh remembered that the M'Collop had the moor next to his in Argyleshire, but did not choose to commit himself with the stranger, and preferred looking at his own handsome face and admiring it in the glass until the last speaker had concluded his remarks.

As Clive did not offer any further conversation, but went back to a table where he began to draw the Barber-Surgeon, Lord Farintosh resumed the delightful talk. "What infernal bad glasses these are in these Brighton lodging-houses! They make a man look quite green, really they do—and there's nothing green in me, is there, Lady Ann?"

"But you look very unwell, Lord Farintosh; indeed you do," Miss Newcome said, gravely.

"I think late hours, and smoking, and going to that horrid Platt's, where I dare say you go—"

"Go? don't I? But don't call it horrid; really, now, don't call it horrid!" cried the noble Marquis.

"Well—something has made you look far from well. You know how very well Lord Farintosh used to look, mamma—and to see him now, in only his second season—Oh, it is melancholy!"

"God bless my soul, Miss Newcome! what do you mean? I think I look pretty well," and the noble youth passed his hand through his hair. "It is a hard life, I know; that tearin' about night after night, and sittin' up till ever so much o'clock; and then all these races, you know, comin' one after another—it's enough to knock up any fellow. I'll tell you what I'll do, Miss Newcome. I'll go down to Codlington, to my mother; I will, upon my honor, and lie quiet all July, and then I'll go to Scotland—and you shall see whether I don't look better next season."

"Do, Lord Farintosh!" said Ethel, greatly amused, as much, perhaps, at the young Marquis, as at her cousin Clive, who sat while the other was speaking, fuming with rage, at his table. "What are you doing, Clive?" she asks.

"I was trying to draw, Lord knows who—Lord Newcome, who was killed at the battle of Bosworth," said the artist, and the girl ran to look at the picture.

"Why, you have made him like Punch!" cries the young lady.

"It's a shame caricaturing one's own flesh and blood, isn't it?" asked Clive, gravely.

"What a droll, funny picture!" exclaims Lady Ann. "Isn't it capital, Lord Farintosh?"

"I dare say—I confess I don't understand that sort of thing," says his lordship. "Don't, upon my honor. There's Odo Carton, always making those caricatures—I don't understand 'em. You'll come up to town to-morrow, won't you? And you're goin' to Lady Hm's, and to Hm and Hm's, ain't you?" (The names of these aristocratic places of resort were quite inaudible.) "You mustn't let Miss Blackcap have it all her own way, you know, that you mustn't."

"She won't have it all her own way," says Miss Ethel. "Lord Farintosh, will you do me a favor? Lady Innishowan is your aunt."

"Of course she is my aunt."

"Will you be so very good as to get a card for her party on Tuesday, for my cousin, Mr. Clive Newcome? Clive, please be introduced to the Marquis of Farintosh."

The young Marquis perfectly well recollected those mustaches and their wearer on a former night, though he had not thought fit to make any sign of recognition. "Any thing you wish, Miss Newcome," he said; "delighted, I'm sure;" and turning to Clive—"In the army, I suppose?"

"I am an artist," says Clive, turning very red.

"Oh, really, I didn't know!" cries the nobleman; and my lord bursting out laughing presently as he was engaged in conversation with Miss Ethel on the balcony, Clive thought, very likely with justice, "He is making fun of my mustaches. Confound him! I should like to pitch him over into the street." But this was only a kind wish on Mr. Newcome's part; not followed out by any immediate fulfillment.

As the Marquis of Farintosh seemed inclined to prolong his visit, and his company was exceedingly disagreeable to Clive, the latter took his departure for an afternoon walk, consoled to think that he should have Ethel to himself at the evening's dinner, when Lady Ann would be occupied about Sir Brian, and would be sure to be putting the children to bed, and, in a word, would give him a quarter of an hour of delightful tête-à-tête with the beautiful Ethel.

Clive's disgust was considerable when he came to dinner at length, and found Lord Farintosh, likewise invited, and sprawling in the drawing-room. His hopes of a tête-à-tête were over. Ethel and Lady Ann and my lord talked, as all people will, about their mutual acquaintance: what parties were coming off, who was going to marry whom, and so forth. And as the persons about whom they conversed were in their own station of life, and belonged to the fashionable world, of which Clive had but a slight knowledge, he chose to fancy that his cousin was giving herself airs, and to feel sulky and uneasy during their dialogue.

Miss Newcome had faults of her own, and was worldly enough, as perhaps the reader has begun to perceive; but in this instance no harm, sure, was to be attributed to her. If two gossips in Aunt Honeyman's parlor had talked over the affairs of Mr. Jones and Mr. Brown, Clive would not have been angry; but a young man of spirit not unfrequently mistakes his vanity for independence: and it is certain that nothing is more offensive to us of the middle class than to hear the names of great folks constantly introduced into conversation.

So Clive was silent and ate no dinner, to the alarm of Martha, who had put him to bed many a time, and always had a maternal eye over him. When he actually refused currant and raspberry tart, and custard, the chef-d'œuvre of Mrs. Honeyman, for which she had seen him absolutely cry in his childhood, the good Martha was alarmed.

"Law, Master Clive!" she said, "do 'ee eat some. Missie made it, you know she did;" and she insisted on bringing back the tart to him.

Lady Ann and Ethel laughed at this eagerness on the worthy old woman's part. "Do 'ee eat some, Clive," says Ethel, imitating honest Mrs. Hicks, who had left the room.

"It's doosid good," remarked Lord Farintosh.

"Then do 'ee eat some more," said Miss Newcome: on which the young nobleman, holding out his plate, observed with much affability, that the cook of the lodgings was really a stunner for tarts.

"The cook, dear me, it's not the cook!" cries Miss Ethel. "Don't you remember the princess in the Arabian Nights, who was such a stunner for tarts, Lord Farintosh?"

Lord Farintosh couldn't say that he did.

"Well, I thought not; but there was a princess in Arabia or China, or somewhere, who made such delicious tarts and custards that nobody's could compare with them; and there is an old lady in Brighton who has the same wonderful talent. She is the mistress of this house."

"And she is my aunt, at your lordship's service," said Mr. Clive, with great dignity.

"Upon my honor! did you make 'em, Lady Ann?" asked my lord.

"The Queen of Hearts made tarts!" cried out Miss Newcome, rather eagerly, and blushing somewhat.

"My good old aunt, Miss Honeyman, made this one," Clive would go on to say.

"Mr. Honeyman's sister, the preacher, you know, where we go on Sunday," Miss Ethel interposed.

"The Honeyman pedigree is not a matter of very great importance," Lady Ann remarked, gently. "Kuhn, will you have the goodness to take away these things? When did you hear of Colonel Newcome, Clive?"

An air of deep bewilderment and perplexity had spread over Lord Farintosh's fine countenance while this talk about pastry had been going on. The Arabian Princess, the Queen of Hearts making tarts, Miss Honeyman? Who the deuce were all these? Such may have been his lordship's doubts and queries. Whatever his cogitations were he did not give utterance to them, but remained in silence for some time as did the rest of the little party. Clive tried to think he had asserted his independence by showing that he was not ashamed of his old aunt; but the doubt may be whether there was any necessity for presenting her in this company, and whether Mr. Clive had not much better have left the tart question alone.

Ethel evidently thought so: for she talked and rattled in the most lively manner with Lord Farintosh for the rest of the evening, and scarcely chose to say a word to her cousin. Lady Ann was absent with Sir Brian and her children for the most part of the time: and thus Clive had the pleasure of listening to Miss Newcome uttering all sorts of odd little paradoxes, firing the while sly shots at Mr. Clive, and, indeed, making fun of his friends, exhibiting herself in not the most agreeable light. Her talk only served the more to bewilder Lord Farintosh, who did not understand a tithe of her allusions; for Heaven, which had endowed the young Marquis with personal charms, a large estate, an ancient title and the pride belonging to it, had not supplied his lordship with a great quantity of brains, or a very feeling heart.

Lady Ann came back from the upper regions presently with rather a grave face, and saying that Sir Brian was not so well this evening, upon which the young men rose to depart. My lord said he had "a most delightful dinner and a most delightful tart, 'pon his honor," and was the only one of the little company who laughed at his own remark. Miss Ethel's eyes flashed scorn at Mr. Clive when that unfortunate subject was introduced again.

My lord was going back to London to-morrow. Was Miss Newcome going back? Wouldn't he like to go back in the train with her!—another unlucky observation. Lady Ann said, "It would depend on the state of Sir Brian's health the next morning whether Ethel would return; and both of you gentlemen are too young to be her escort," added the kind lady. Then she shook hands with Clive, as thinking she had said something too severe for him.

Farintosh in the mean time was taking leave of Miss Newcome. "Pray, pray," said his lordship, "don't throw me over at Lady Inishowan's. You know I hate balls and never go to 'em, except when you go. I hate dancing, I do, 'pon my honor."

"Thank you," said Miss Newcome, with a courtesy.

"Except with one person—only one person, upon my honor. I'll remember and get the invitation for your friend. And if you would but try that mare, I give you my honor I bred her at Codlington. She's a beauty to look at, and as quiet as a lamb."

"I don't want a horse like a lamb," replied the young lady.

"Well—she'll go like blazes now: and over timber she's splendid now. She is, upon my honor."

"When I come to London perhaps you may trot her out," said Miss Ethel, giving him her hand and a fine smile.

Clive came up biting his lips. "I suppose you don't condescend to ride Bhurtpore any more now?" he said.

"Poor old Bhurtpore! The children ride him now," said Miss Ethel—giving Clive at the same time a dangerous look of her eyes, as though to see if her shot had hit. Then she added, "No—he has not been brought up to town this year: he is at Newcome, and I like him very much." Perhaps she thought the shot had struck too deep.

But if Clive was hurt he did not show his wound. "You have had him these four years—yes, it's four years since my father broke him for you. And you still continue to like him? What a miracle of constancy! You use him sometimes in the country—when you have no better horse—what a compliment to Bhurtpore!"

"Nonsense!" Miss Ethel here made Clive a sign in her most imperious manner to stay a moment when Lord Farintosh had departed.

But he did not choose to obey this order.

"Good-night," he said, "before I go I must shake hands with my aunt down-stairs." And he was gone, following close upon Lord Farintosh, who I dare say thought, "Why the deuce can't he shake hands with his aunt up here?" and when Clive entered Miss Honeyman's back parlor, making a bow to the young nobleman, my lord went away more perplexed than ever; and the next day told friends at White's what uncommonly queer people those Newcomes were. "I give you my honor there was a fellow at Lady Ann's whom they call Clive, who is a painter by trade—his uncle is a preacher—his father is a horse-dealer, and his aunt lets lodgings and cooks the dinner."

CHAPTER XLIII

RETURNS TO SOME OLD FRIENDS.

THE haggard youth burst into my chambers, in the Temple, on the very next morning, and confided to me the story which has been just here narrated. When he had concluded it, with many ejaculations regarding the heroine of the tale, "I saw her, Sir," he added, "walking with the children and Miss Cann as I drove round in the fly to the station—and didn't even bow to her."

"Why did you go round by the cliff?" asked Clive's friend. "That is not the way from the Steyne Arms to the railroad."

"Hang it," says Clive, turning very red, "I wanted to pass just under her windows, and if I saw her, not to see her; and that's what I did."

"Why did she walk on the cliff?" mused Clive's friend, "at that early hour? Not to meet Lord Farintosh, I should think. He never gets up before twelve. It must have been to see you. Didn't you tell her you were going away in the morning?"

"I tell you what she does with me," continues Mr. Clive. "Sometimes she seems to like me, and then she leaves me. Sometimes she is quite kind—kind she always is—I mean, you know, Pen—you know what I mean; and then up comes the old Countess, or a young Marquis, or some fellow with a handle to his name, and she whistles me off till the next convenient opportunity."

"Women are like that, my ingenious youth," says Clive's counselor.

"I won't stand it. I won't be made a fool of!" he continues. "She seems to expect every body to bow to her, and moves through the world with her imperious air. O how confoundingly handsome she is with them! I tell you what. I feel inclined to tumble down and feel one of her pretty little feet on my neck, and say, There! Trample my life out. Make a slave of me. Let me get a silver collar and mark 'Ethel' on it, and go through the world with my badge."

"And a blue ribbon for a footman to hold you by; and a muzzle to wear in the dog-days. Bow! wow!" says Mr. Pendenmis.

(At this noise Mr. Warrington puts his head in from the neighboring bedchamber, and shows a beard just lathered for shaving. "We are talking sentiment! Go back till you are wanted!" says Mr. Pendenmis. Exit he of the soap-suds.)

"Don't make fun of a fellow," Clive continues, laughing ruefully. "You see I must talk about it to somebody. I shall die if I don't. Sometimes, Sir, I rise up in my might and I defy her lightning. The sarcastic dodge is the best: I have borrowed that from you, Pen, old boy. That puzzles her: that would beat her if I could but go on with it. But there comes a tone of her sweet voice, a look out of those killing gray eyes, and all my frame is in a thrill and a tremble. When she was engaged to Lord Kew I did battle with the confounded passion—and I ran away from it like an honest man, and the gods rewarded me with ease of mind after a while. But now the thing rages worse than ever. Last night, I give you my honor, I heard every one of the confounded hours toll, except the last, when I was dreaming of my father, and the chamber-maid woke me with a hot water jug."

"Did she scold you? What a cruel chamber-maid! I see you have shaven the mustaches off."

"Farintosh asked me whether I was going in the army," said Clive, "and she laughed. I thought I had best dock them. Oh, I would like to eat my head off as well as my hair."

"Have you ever asked her to marry you?" asked Clive's friend.

"I have seen her but five times since my return from abroad," the lad went on; "there has been always somebody by. Who am I? a painter with five hundred a year for an allowance. Isn't she used to walk upon velvet and dine upon silver; and hasn't she got marquises and barons, and all sorts of swells, in her train? I daren't ask her—"

Here his friend hummed Montrose's lines—"He either fears his fate too much, or his desert is small, who dares not put it to the touch, and win or lose it all."

"I own I dare not ask her. If she were to refuse me, I know I should never ask again. This isn't the moment, when all Swelldom is at her feet, for me to come forward and say,

'Maiden, I have watched thee daily, and I think thou lovest me well.' I read that ballad to her at Baden, Sir. I drew a picture of the Lord of Burleigh wooing the maiden, and asked what she would have done?"

"Oh, you did? I thought, when we were at Baden, we were so modest that we did not even whisper our condition."

"A fellow can't help letting it be seen and hinting it," says Clive, with another blush. "They can read it in our looks fast enough; and what is going on in our minds, hang them! I recollect she said, in her grave, cool way, that after all the Lord and Lady of Burleigh did not seem to have made a very good marriage, and that the lady would have been much happier in marrying one of her own degree."

"That was a very prudent saying for a young lady of eighteen," remarks Clive's friend.

"Yes; but it was not an unkind one. Say Ethel thought—thought what was the case; and being engaged herself, and knowing how friends of mine had provided a very pretty little partner for me—she is a dear, good little girl, little Rosey; and twice as good, Pen, when her mother is away—knowing this and that, I say, suppose Ethel wanted to give me a hint to keep quiet, was she not right in the counsel she gave me? She is not fit to be a poor man's wife. Fancy Ethel Newcome going into the kitchen and making pies like Aunt Honeyman!"

"The Circassian beauties don't sell under so many thousand purses," remarked Mr. Pendenmis. "If there's a beauty in a well-regulated Georgian family, they fatten her: they feed her with the best Ricacout des Arabes. They give her silk robes, and perfumed baths; have her taught to play on the dulcimer, and dance and sing; and when she is quite perfect, send her down to Constantinople for the Sultan's inspection. The rest of the family never think of grumbling, but eat coarse meat, bathe in the river, wear old clothes, and praise Allah for their sister's elevation. Bah! Do you suppose the Turkish system doesn't obtain all the world over? My poor Clive, this article in the May Fair Market is beyond your worship's price. Some things in this world are made for our betters, young man. Let Dives say grace for his dinner, and the dogs and Lazarus be thankful for the crumbs. Here comes Warrington, shaven and smart as if he was going out a-courting."

Thus it will be seen, that in his communication with certain friends who approached nearer to his own time of life, Clive was much more eloquent and rhapsodical than in the letter which he wrote to his father, regarding his passion for Miss Ethel. He celebrated her with pencil and pen. He was forever drawing the outline of her head, the solemn eyebrow, the nose (that wondrous little nose), descending from the straight forehead, the short upper lip, and chin sweeping in a full curve to the neck, etc., etc., etc. A frequenter of his studio might see a whole gallery of Ethels there represented: when Mrs. Mackenzie visited that place, and remarked one face and figure repeated on a hundred canvases and papers, gray, white, and brown, I believe she was told that the original was a famous Roman model, from whom Clive had studied a great deal during his residence in Italy; on which Mrs. Mack gave it as her opinion that Clive was a sad wicked young fellow. The widow thought rather the better of him for being a sad wicked young fellow; and as for Miss Rosey, she, of course, was of mamma's way of thinking. Rosey went through the world constantly smiling at whatever occurred. She was good-humored through the dreariest long evenings at the most stupid parties; sate good-humoredly for hours at Shoolbred's while mamma was making purchases; heard good-humoredly those old, old stories of her mother's day after day; bore an hour's joking or an hour's scolding with equal good-humor; and whatever had been the occurrences of her simple day, whether there was sunshine or cloudy weather, or flashes of lightning and bursts of rain, I fancy Miss Mackenzie slept after them quite undisturbedly, and was sure to greet the morrow's dawn with a smile.

Had Clive become more knowing in his travels, had Love or Experience opened his eyes, that they looked so differently now upon objects which before used well enough to please them? It is a fact that, until he went abroad, he thought widow Mackenzie a dashing, lively, agreeable woman: he used to receive her stories about Cheltenham, the colonies, the balls at Government House, the observations which the bishop made, and the peculiar attention of the Chief-Justice to Mrs. Major McShane, with the Major's uneasy behavior—all these to hear at one time did Clive not ungraciously incline. "Our friend, Mrs. Mack," the good old Colonel used to say, "is a clever woman of the world, and has seen a great deal of company." That story of Sir Thomas Sadman dropping a pocket-handkerchief in his court at Colombo, which the Queen's Advocate O'Goggarty picked up, and on which Laura MacS. was embroidered, while the Major was absolutely in the witness-box giving evidence against a native servant who had stolen one of his cocked-hats—that story always made good Thomas Newcome laugh, and Clive used to enjoy it too, and the widow's mischievous fun in narrating it; and now, behold, one day when Mrs. Mackenzie recounted the anecdote in her best manner to Messrs. Pendennis and Warrington, and Frederick Bayham, who had been invited to meet Mr. Clive in Fitzroy Square—when Mr. Binnie chuckled, when Rosey, as in duty bound, looked discomposed, and said "Law, mamma!"—not one sign of good-humor, not one ghost of a smile, made its apparition on Clive's dreary face. He painted imaginary portraits with a strawberry stalk; he looked into his water-glass as though he would plunge and drown there; and Bayham had to remind him that the claret-jug was anxious to have another embrace from its constant friend, F. B. When Mrs. Mack went away distributing smiles, Clive groaned out,

"Good Heavens! how that story does bore me!" and lapsed into his former moodiness, not giving so much as a glance to Rosey, whose sweet face looked at him kindly for a moment, as she followed in the wake of her mamma.

"The mother's the woman for my money," I heard F. B. whisper to Warrington. "Splendid figure-head, Sir—magnificent build, Sir, from bows to stern—I like 'em of that sort. Thank you, Mr. Binnie, I will take a back-hander, as Clive don't seem to drink. The youth, Sir, has grown melancholy with his travels; I'm inclined to think some noble Roman has stolen the young man's heart. Why did you not send us over a picture of the charmer, Clive? Young Ridley, Mr. Binnie, you will be happy to hear, is bidding fair to take a distinguished place in the world of arts. His picture has been greatly admired; and my good friend Mrs. Ridley tells me that Lord Todmorden has sent him over an order to paint him a couple of pictures at a hundred guineas a-piece."

"I should think so. J. J.'s pictures will be worth five times a hundred guineas ere five years are over," says Clive.

"In that case it wouldn't be a bad speculation for our friend Sherrick," remarked F. B.; "to purchase a few of the young man's works. I would, only I haven't the capital to spare. Mine has been vested in an Odessa venture, Sir, in a large amount of wild oats, which up to the present moment make me no return. But it will always be a consolation to me to think that I have been the means—the humble means—of furthering that deserving young man's prospects in life."

"You, F. B. I and how?" we asked.

"By certain humble contributions of mine to the press," answered Bayham, majestically. "Mr. Warrington, the claret happens to stand with you; and exercise does it good, Sir. Yes, the articles, trifling as they may appear, have attracted notice," continued F. B., sipping his wine with great gusto. "They are noticed, Pendennis, give me leave to say, by parties who don't value so much the literary or even the political part of the 'Pall-Mall Gazette,' though both, I am told by those who read them, are conducted with considerable—consummate ability. John Ridley sent a hundred pounds over to his father, the other day, who funded it in his son's name. And Ridley told the story to Lord Todmorden, when the venerable nobleman congratulated him on having such a child. I wish F. B. had one of the same sort, Sir." In which sweet prayer we all of us joined with a laugh.

One of us had told Mrs. Mackenzie (let the criminal blush to own that quizzing his fellow-creatures used at one time to form part of his youthful amusement) that F. B. was the son of a gentleman of most ancient family and vast landed possessions, and as Bayham was particularly attentive to the widow, and grandiloquent in his remarks, she was greatly pleased by his politeness, and pronounced him a most distingué man—reminding her, indeed, of General Hop-kirk, who commanded in Canada. And she bade Rosey sing for Mr. Bayham, who was in a rapture at the young lady's performances, and said no wonder such an accomplished daughter came from such a mother, though how such a mother could have a daughter of such an age he, F.B., was at a loss to understand. Oh, Sir! Mrs. Mackenzie was charmed and overcome at this novel compliment. Meanwhile the little artless Rosey warbled on her pretty ditties.

"It is a wonder," growled out Mr. Warrington, "that that sweet girl can belong to such a woman. I don't understand much about women, but that one appears to me to be—hum!"

"What, George?" asked Warrington's friend.

"Well, an oggling, leering, scheming, artful old campaigner," grumbled the misogynist. "As for the little girl, I should like to have her to sing to me all night long. Depend upon it she would make a much better wife for Clive than that fashionable cousin of his he is hankering after. I heard him bellowing about her the other day in chambers, as I was dressing. What the deuce does the boy want with a wife at all?" And Rosey's song being by this time finished, Warrington went up with a blushing face and absolutely paid a compliment to Miss Mackenzie—an almost unheard-of effort on George's part.

"I wonder whether it is every young fellow's lot," quoth George, as we trudged home together, "to pawn his heart away to some girl that's not worth the winning? Psha! it's all mad rubbish this sentiment. The women ought not to be allowed to interfere with us: married if a man must be, a suitable wife should be portioned out to him, and there an end of it. Why doesn't the young man marry this girl, and get back to his business and paint his pictures? Because his father wishes it—and the old Nabob yonder, who seems a kindly-disposed, easy-going, old Heathen philosopher. Here's a pretty little girl: money I suppose in sufficiency—every thing satisfactory, except, I grant you, the campaigner. The lad might daub his canvases, christen a child a year, and be as happy as any young donkey that browses on this common of ours—but he must go and hee-haw after a zebra, forsooth! a laus nature is she! I never spoke to a woman of fashion, thank my stars—I don't know the nature of the beast; and since I went to our race-balls, as a boy, scarcely ever saw one; as I don't frequent operas and parties in London like you young flunkies of the aristocracy. I heard you talking about this one, I couldn't help it, as my door was open, and the young one was shouting like a madman. What! does he choose to hang on on sufferance and hope to be taken, provided Miss can get no better? Do you mean to say that is the genteel custom, and that women in your confounded society do such things every day? Rather than have such a creature I would take a savage woman, who should nurse my dusky brood; and rather than have a daughter brought up to the trade I would bring her down from the woods and sell her in Virginia."

With which burst of indignation our friend's anger ended for that night.

Though Mr. Clive had the felicity to meet his cousin Ethel at a party or two in the ensuing weeks of the season, every time he perused the features of Lady Kew's brass knocker in Queen Street, no result came of the visit. At one of their meetings in the world Ethel fairly told him that her grandmother would not receive him. "You know, Clive, I can't help myself: nor would it be proper to make you signs out of the window. But you must call for all that: grand-mamma may become more good-humored: or if, you don't come, she may suspect I told you not to come: and to do battle with her day after day is no pleasure, Sir, I assure you. Here is Lord Farintosh coming to take me to dance. You must not speak to me all the evening, mind that, Sir," and away goes the young lady in a waltz with the Marquis.

On the same evening—as he was biting his nails, or cursing his fate, or wishing to invite Lord Farintosh into the neighboring garden of Berkeley Square, whence the policeman might carry to the station-house the corpse of the survivor, Lady Kew would bow to him with perfect graciousness: on other nights her ladyship would pass and no more recognize him than the servant who opened the door.

If she was not to see him at her grandmother's house, and was not particularly unhappy at his exclusion, why did Miss Newcome encourage Mr. Clive so that he should try and see her? If Clive could not get into the little house in Queen Street, why was Lord Farintosh's enormous cab-horse looking daily into the first floor windows of that street? Why were little quiet dinners made for him, before the opera, before going to the play, upon a half dozen occasions, when some of the old, old Kew port was brought out of the cellar, where cobwebs had gathered round it ere Farintosh was born? The dining-room was so tiny that not more than five people could sit at the little round table, that is, not more than Lady Kew and her grand-daughter, Miss Crotchet, the late vicar's daughter, at Kewbury, one of the Miss Toadins, and Captain Walleye, or Tommy Henchman, Farintosh's kinsman and admirer, who were of no consequence, or old Fred Tiddler, whose wife was an invalid, and who was always ready at a moment's notice? Crackthorpe once went to one of these dinners, but that young soldier being a frank and high-spirited youth abused the entertainment and declined more of them. "I tell you what I was wanted for," the Captain told his mess and Clive at the Regent's Park Barracks afterward. "I was expected to go as Farintosh's Groom of the Stole, don't you know, to stand, or if I could sit, in the back seat of the box, while His Royal Highness made talk with the Beauty; to go out and fetch the carriage, and walk down stairs with that d— crooked old dowager, that looks as if she usually rode on a broomstick, by Jove, or else with that bony, old, painted, sheep-faced companion, who's raddled like an old bell-weather. I think, Newcome, you seem to be rather hit by the Belle Cousine—so was I last season; so were ever so many of the fellows. By Jove, Sir! there's nothing I know more comfortable or inspiritin' than a younger son's position, when a Marquis cuts in with fifteen thousand a year! We fancy we've been making running, and suddenly we find ourselves nowhere. Miss Mary, or Miss Lucy, or Miss Ethel, saving your presence, will no more look at us, than my dog will look at a bit of bread, when I offer her this cutlet. Will you—old woman? no, you old slut, that you won't!" (to Mag, an Isle of Skye terrier, who, in fact, prefers the cutlet, having snuffed disdainfully at the bread)—"that you won't, no more than any of your sex. Why, do you suppose if Jack's eldest brother had been dead—Barebones Belsize they used to call him (I don't believe he was a bad fellow, though he was fond of psalm-singing)—do you suppose that Lady Clara would have looked at that cock-tail, Barney Newcome? Beg your pardon, if he's your cousin—but a more odious little snob I never saw."

"I give you up, Barnes," said Clive, laughing; "any body may shy at him and I shan't interfere."

"I understand, but at nobody else of the family. Well, what I mean is, that that old woman is enough to spoil any young girl she takes in hand. She dries 'em up, and poisons 'em, Sir; and I was never more glad than when I heard that Kew had got out of her old clutches. Frank is a fellow that will always be led by some woman or another; and I'm only glad it should be a good one. They say his mother's serious, and that; but why shouldn't she be?" continues honest Crackthorpe, puffing his cigar with great energy. They say the old dowager doesn't believe in God nor devil: but she is in such a funk to be left in the dark that she howls and raises the doose's own delight if her candle goes out. Toppleton slept next room to her at Groningham, and heard her; didn't you, Top?"

"Heard her howling like an old cat on the tiles," says Toppleton—"thought she was at first. My man told me that she used to fling all sorts of things—boot-jacks and things, give you my honor—at her maid, and that the woman was all over black and blue."

"Capital head that is Newcome has done of Jack Belsize!" says Crackthorpe, from out of his cigar.

"And Kew's too—famous likeness! I say, Newcome, if you have 'em printed, the whole brigade 'll subscribe. Make your fortune, see if you won't," cries Toppleton.

"He's such a heavy swell; he don't want to make his fortune," ejaculates Butts.

"Butts, old boy, he'll paint you for nothing, and send you to the Exhibition, where some widow will fall in love with you; and you shall be put as frontispiece for the Book of Beauty, by Jove," cries another military satirist—to whom Butts—

"You hold your tongue, you old Saracen's Head; they're going to have you done on the bear's grease pots. I say, I suppose Jack's all right now. When did he write to you last, Cracky?"

"He wrote from Palermo—a most jolly letter from him and Kew. He hasn't touched a card for nine months; is going to give up play. So is Frank, too, grown quite a good boy. So will you, too, Butts, you old miscreant, repent of your sins, pay your debts, and do something handsome for that poor deluded milliner in Albany Street. Jack says Kew's mother has written over to Lord Highgate a beautiful letter—and the old boy's relenting, and they'll come together again—Jack's eldest son now, you know. Bore for lady Susan only having girls."

"Not a bore for Jack, though," cries another. And what a good fellow Jack was; and what a trump Kew is; and how famously he stuck by him: went to see him in prison and paid him out! and what good fellows we all are, in general, became the subject of the conversation, the latter part of which took place in the smoking-room of the Regent's Park Barracks, then occupied by that regiment of Life Guards of which Lord Kew and Mr. Belsize had been members. Both were still fondly remembered by their companions; and it was because Belsize had spoken very warmly of Clive's friendliness to him that Jack's friend, the gallant Crackthorpe, had been interested in our hero, and found an opportunity of making his acquaintance.

With these frank and pleasant young men Clive soon formed a considerable intimacy: and if any of his older and peaceful friends chanced to take their afternoon airing in the Park, and survey the horsemen there, we might have the pleasure of beholding Mr. Newcome in Rotten Row, riding side by side with other dandies, who had mustaches blonde or jet, who wore flowers in their buttons (themselves being flowers of spring), who rode magnificent thoroughbred horses, scarcely touching their stirrups with the tips of their varnished boots, and who kissed the most beautiful primrose-colored kid gloves to lovely ladies passing them in the Ride. Clive drew portraits of half the officers of the Life Guards Green; and was appointed painter in ordinary to that distinguished corps. His likeness of the Colonel would make you die with laughing: his picture of the Surgeon was voted a master-piece. He drew the men in the saddle, in the stable, in their flannel dresses, sweeping their flashing swords about, receiving lancers repelling infantry, nay, cutting a sheep in two, as some of the warriors are known to be able to do at one stroke. Detachments of Life Guardsmen made their appearance in Charlotte Street, which was not very distant from their barracks; the most splendid cabs were seen prancing before his door; and curly-whiskered youths, of aristocratic appearance, smoking cigars out of his painting-room window. How many times did Clive's next door neighbor, little Mr. Finch, the miniature painter, run to peep through his parlor blinds, hoping that a sitter was coming, and "a carriage-party" driving up! What wrath Mr. Scowler, A.R.A., was in, because a young hopo/mythumb dandy, who wore gold chains, and his collars turned down, should spoil the trade, and draw portraits for nothing. Why did none of the young men come to Scowler? Scowler was obliged to own that Mr. Newcome had considerable talent, and a good knack at catching a likeness. He could not paint a bit, to be sure, but his heads in black and white were really tolerable; his sketches of horses very vigorous and life-like. Mr. Gandish said if Clive would come for three or four years into his academy he could make something of him. Mr. Smee shook his head, and said he was afraid that kind of loose, desultory study, that keeping of aristocratic company, was any thing but favorable to a young artist—Smee, who would walk five miles to attend an evening party of ever so little a great man!

CHAPTER XLIV.

IN WHICH MR. CHARLES MONTYMAN APPEARS IN AN AM-ANGLE LIGHT.

MR. FREDERICK BAYHAM waited at Fitzroy Square while Clive was yet talking with his friends there, and favored that gentleman with his company home to the usual smoky refreshment. Clive always rejoiced in F. B.'s society, whether he was in a sportive mood, or, as now, in a solemn and didactic vein. F. B. had been more than ordinarily majestic all the evening. "I dare say you find me a good deal altered, Clive," he remarked; "I am a good deal altered. Since that good Samaritan, your kind father, had compassion on a poor fellow fallen among thieves (though I don't say, mind you, he was much better than his company), F. B. has mended some of his ways. I am trying a course of industry, Sir. Powers, perhaps naturally great, have been neglected over the wine cup and the die. I am beginning to feel my way; and my chiefs yonder, who have just walked home with their cigars in their mouths, and without as much as saying F. B., my boy, shall we go to the Haunt and have a cool lobster and a glass of table-beer—which they certainly do not consider themselves to be—I say, Sir, the Politician and the Literary Critic (there was a most sarcastic emphasis laid on these phrases, characterizing Messrs. Warrington and Pendenis) "may find there is a humble contributor to the 'Pall Mall Gazette,' whose name, maybe, the amateur shall one day reckon even higher than their own. Mr. Warrington I do not say so much—he is an able man, Sir, an able man; but there is that about your exceedingly self-satisfied friend, Mr. Arthur Pendenis, which—well, well—let time show. You did not get the—hem—paper at Rome and Naples, I suppose?"

"Forbidden by the Inquisition," says Clive, delighted; "and at Naples the king furious against it."

"I don't wonder they don't like it at Rome, Sir. There's serious matter in it which may set the prelates of a certain church rather in a tremor. You haven't read—the—ahem—the Pulpit Pencilings in the P. M. G.? Slight sketches, mental and corporeal, of our chief divines now in London—and signed Laud Latimer?"

"I don't do much in that way," said Clive.

"So much the worse for you, my friend. Not that I mean to judge any other fellow harshly—I mean any other fellow—sinner harshly—or that I mean that those Pulpit Pencilings would be likely to do you any great good. But, such as they are, they have been productive of benefit. Thank you, Mary, my dear, the tap is uncommonly good, and I drink to your future husband's good health. A glass of good sound bear refreshes after all that claret. Well, Sir, to return to the Pencilings, pardon my vanity in saying, that though Mr. Pendenis laughs at them, they have been of essential service to the paper. They give it a character, they rally round it the respectable classes. They create correspondence. I have received many interesting letters, chiefly from females, about the Pencilings. Some complain that their favorite preachers are slighted; others applaud because the clergymen they sit under are supported by F. B. I am Laud Latimer, Sir—though I have heard the letters attributed to the Rev. Mr. Bunker, and to a Member of Parliament eminent in the religious world."

"So you are the famous Laud Latimer?" cries Clive, who had, in fact, seen letters signed by those right reverend names in our paper.

"Famous is hardly the word. One who scoffs at every thing—I need not say I allude to Mr. Arthur Pendenis—would have had the letters signed—the Beadle of the Parish. He calls me the Venerable Beadle sometimes—it being, I grieve to say, his way to deride grave subjects. You wouldn't suppose now, my young Clive, that the same hand which pens the Art criticisms, occasionally, when his Highness Pendenis is lazy, takes a minor Theatre, or turns the sportive epigram, or the ephemeral paragraph, should adopt a grave theme on a Sunday, and chronicle the sermons of British Divines? For eighteen consecutive Sunday evenings, Clive, in Mrs. Ridley's front parlor, which I now occupy, vice Miss Cann promoted, I have written the Pencilings—scarcely allowing a drop of refreshment, except under extreme exhaustion, to pass my lips. Pendenis laughs at the Pencilings. He wants to stop them; and says they bore the public. I don't want to think a man is jealous, who was himself the cause of my engagement at the P. M. G.—perhaps my powers were not developed then."

"Pen thinks he writes better now than when he began," remarked Clive; "I have heard him say so."

"His opinion of his own writings is high, whatever their date. Mine, Sir, are only just coming into notice. They begin to know F. B., Sir, in the sacred edifices of this metropolitan city. I saw the Bishop of London looking at me last Sunday week, and am sure his Chaplain whispered him, 'It's Mr. Bayham, my lord, nephew of your lordship's right reverend brother, the Lord Bishop of Bullocksmithy. And last Sunday being at church—at Saint Mungo the Martyr's, Rev. S. Sawders—by Wednesday I got in a female hand—Mrs. Sawders's, no doubt—the biography of the Incumbent of St. Mungo; an account of his early virtues; a copy of his poems; and a hint that he was the gentleman destined for the vacant Deanery.'

"Ridley is not the only man I have helped in this world," F. B. continued. "Perhaps I should blush to own it—I do blush: but I feel the ties of early acquaintance, and I own that I have puffed your uncle, Charles Honeyman, most tremendously. It was partly for the sake of the Ridleys and the tick he owes 'em: partly for old times' sake. Sir, are you aware that things are greatly changed with Charles Honeyman, and that the poor F. B. has very likely made his fortune?"

"I am delighted to hear it," cried Clive, "and how, F. B., have you wrought this miracle?"

"By common sense and enterprise, lad—by a knowledge of the world and a benevolent disposition. You'll see Lady Whittlesea's Chapel bears a very different aspect now. That miscreant Sherrick owns that he owes me a turn, and has sent me a few dozen of wine—without any stamped paper on my part in return as an acknowledgment of my service. It chanced, Sir, soon after your departure for Italy, that going to his private residence respecting a little bill to which a heedless friend had put his hand, Sherrick invited me to partake of tea in the bosom of his family. I was thirsty—having walked in from Jack Straw's Castle at Hempstead, where poor Kiteley and I had been taking a chop—and accepted the proffered entertainment. The ladies of the family gave us music after the domestic muffin—and then, Sir, a great idea occurred to me. You know how magnificently Miss Sherrick and the mother sing? They sang Mozart, Sir. Why, I asked of Sherrick, should those ladies who sing Mozart to a piano, not sing Handel to an organ?"

"Dash it, you don't mean a hurdy-gurdy?"

"Sherrick," says I, "you are no better than a Heathen ignoramus. I mean, why shouldn't they sing Handel's Church Music, and Church Music in general, in Lady Whittlesea's Chapel? Behind the screen up in the organ loft, what's to prevent 'em? by Jingo! Your singing-boys have gone to the Cave of Harmony; you and your choir have split—why should not these ladies lead it? He caught at the idea. You never heard the chants more finely given—and they would be better still if the congregation would but hold their confounded tongues. It was an excellent though a harmless dodge, Sir: and drew immensely, to speak profanely. They dress the part, Sir, to admiration—a sort of nun-like costume they come in: Mrs. Sherrick has the soul of an artist still—by Jove, Sir, when they have once smelt the lamps, the love of the trade never leaves 'em. The ladies actually practiced by moonlight in the Chapel, and came over to Honeyman's to an oyster afterward. The thing took, Sir. People began to take box—seats I mean, again; and Charles Honeyman, easy in his mind through your noble father's generosity, perhaps inspirited by returning good fortune, has been preaching more eloquently than ever. He took some lessons of Husler, of the Haymarket, Sir. His sermons are old, I believe; but so to speak, he has got them up with new scenery, dresses, and effects, Sir. They have flowers, Sir, about the buildin'—pious ladies are supposed to provide 'em, but, entre nous, Sherrick contracts for them with Nathan, or some one in Covent Garden. And—don't tell this now, upon your honor!"

"Tell what, F. B.?" asks Clive.

"I got up a persecution against your uncle for Popish practices: summoned a meetin' at the Running Footman, in Bolingbroke Street. Billings, the buttermilk; Sharwood, the turner and blacking maker; and the Honorable Pheelim O'Curragh, Lord Scullabogue's son, made speeches. Two or three respectable families (your aunt, Mrs. What-d'you-call-'em Newcome, among the number) quitted the Chapel in disgust—I wrote an article of controversial biography in the P. M. G.; set the business going in the daily press; and the thing was done, Sir. That property is a paying one to the Incumbent, and to Sherrick over him. Charles's affairs are getting all right, Sir. He never had the pluck to owe much, and if it be a sin to have wiped his slate clean, satisfied his creditors, and made Charles easy—upon my conscience, I must confess that F. B. has done it. I hope I may never do any thing worse in this life, Clive. It ain't bad to see him doing the martyr, Sir: Sebastian riddled with paper pellets; Bartholomew on a cold gridiron. Here comes the lobster. Upon my word, Mary, a finer fish I've seldom seen."

Now surely this account of his uncle's affairs and prosperity was enough to send Clive to Lady Whittlesea's Chapel, and it was not because Miss Ethel had said that she and Lady Kew went there, that Clive was induced to go there too? He attended punctually on the next Sunday, and in the Incumbent's pew, whither the pew woman conducted him, sate Mr. Sherrick in great gravity, with large gold pins, who handed him at the anthem, a large, new, gilt hymn-book.

An odour of millefleurs rustled by them as Charles Honeyman, accompanied by his ecclesiastical valet, passed the pew from the vestry, and took his place at the desk. Formerly he used to wear a flaunting scarf over his surplice, which was very wide and full; and Clive remembered when as a boy he entered the sacred robing-room, how his uncle used to pat and puff out the scarf and the sleeves of his vestment, arrange the natty curl on his forehead, and take his place, a fine example of florid church decoration. Now the scarf was trimmed down to be as narrow as your neckcloth, and hung loose and straight over the back: the ephod was cut straight and as close and short as might be—I believe there was a little trimming of lace to the narrow sleeves, and a slight arabesque of tape, or other substance, round the edge of the surplice. As for the curl on the forehead, it was no more visible than the Maypole in the Strand, or the Cross at Charing. Honeyman's hair was parted down the middle, short in front, and curling delicately round his ears and the back of his head. He read the service in a swift manner, and with a gentle twang. When the music began, he stood with head on one side, and two slim fingers on the book, as composed as a statue in a mediæval niche. It was fine to hear Sherrick, who had an uncommonly good voice, join in the musical parts of the service. The produce of the market-gardener decorated the church here and there; and the impresario of the establishment, having picked up a Flemish painted window from old Moss in Wardour Street, had placed it in his chapel. Labels of faint green-and-gold, with long Gothic letters painted thereon, meandered over the organ-loft and galleries, and strove to give as mediæval a look to Lady Whittlesea's as the place was capable of assuming.

In the sermon Charles dropped the twang with the surplice, and the priest gave way to the preacher. He preached short, stirring discourses on the subjects of the day. It happened that a noble young Prince, the hope of a nation, and heir of a royal house, had just then died by a sudden accident. Absalom, the son of David, furnished Honeyman with a parallel. He drew a picture of the two deaths, of the grief of kings, of the fate that is superior to them. It was, indeed, a stirring discourse, and caused thrills through the crowd to whom Charles imparted it. "Famous, ain't it?" says Sherrick, giving Clive a hand when the rite was over. "How he's come out, hasn't he? Didn't think he had it in him." Sherrick seemed to have become of late impressed with the splendor of Charles's talents, and spoke of him—was it not disrespectful?—as a manager would of a successful tragedian. Let us pardon Sherrick: he had been in the theatrical way. "That Irishman was no go at all," he whispered to Mr. Newcome, "got rid of him—let's see, at Michaelmas."

On account of Clive's tender years and natural levity, a little inattention may be allowed to the youth, who certainly looked about him very eagerly during the service. The house was filled by the ornamental classes, the bonnets of the newest Parisian fashion. Away in a darkling corner, under the organ, sate a squad of footmen. Surely that powdered one in livery wore Lady Kew's colors? So Clive looked under all the bonnets, and presently spied old Lady Kew's face, as grim and yellow as her brass knocker, and by it Ethel's beauteous countenance. He dashed out of church when the congregation rose to depart. "Stop and see Honeyman, won't you?" asked Sherrick, surprised.

"Yes, yes; come back again," said Clive, and was gone.

He kept his word, and returned presently. The young Marquis and an elderly lady were in Lady Kew's company. Clive had passed close under Lady Kew's venerable Roman nose without causing that organ to bow in ever so slight a degree toward the ground. Ethel had recognized him with a smile and a nod. My lord was whispering one of his noble pleasantries in her ear. She laughed at the speech or the speaker. The steps of a fine belovenged carriage were let down with a bang. The Yellow One had jumped up behind it, by the side of his brother Giant Canary. Lady Kew's equipage had disappeared, and Mrs. Canterton's was stopping the way.

Clive returned to the chapel by the little door near to the Vestiarium. All the congregation had poured out by this time. Only two ladies were standing near the pulpit; and Sherrick, with his hands rattling his money in his pockets, was pacing up and down the aisle.

"Capital house, Mr. Newcome, wasn't it? I counted no less than fourteen nob. The Princess of Moncontour and her husband, I suppose, that chap with the beard, who yawns so during the sermon. I'm blessed, if I didn't think he'd have yawned his head off. Countess of Kew, and her daughter; Countess of Canterton, and the Honorable Miss Fetlock—no, Lady Fetlock. A Countess's daughter is a lady, I'm dashed if she ain't. Lady Glenlivet and her sons; the most noble the Marquis of Farintosh, and Lord Eury Roy; that makes seven—no, nine—with the Prince and Princess. Julia, my dear, you came out like a good un to-day. Never heard you in finer voice. Remember Mr. Clive Newcome?"

Mr. Clive made bows to the ladies, who acknowledged him by graceful courtesies. Miss Sherrick was always looking to the vestry-door.

"How's the old Colonel? The best feller—excuse my calling him a feller—but he is, and a good one too. I went to see Mr. Binnie, my other tenant. He looks a little yellow about the gills, Mr. Binnie. Very proud woman that is who lives with him—uncommon haughty. When will you come down and take your nut-ton in the Regent's Park, Mr. Clive. There's some tolerable good wine down there. Our reverend gent drops in and takes a glass, don't he, Missis?"

"We shall be most 'appy to see Mr. Newcome, I'm sure," says the handsome and good-natured Mrs. Sherrick. "Won't we, Julia?"

"Oh, certainly," says Julia, who seems rather absent. And behold at this moment the reverend gent enters from the vestry. Both the ladies run toward him, holding forth their hands.

"Oh, Mr. Honeyman! What a sermon! Me and Julia cried so up in the organ-loft; we thought you would have heard us. Didn't we, Julia?"

"Oh, yes," says Julia, whose hand the pastor is now pressing.

"When you described the young man, I thought of my poor boy, didn't I, Julia," cries the mother, with tears streaming down her face.

"We had a loss more than ten years ago," whispers Sherrick to Clive gravely. "And she's always thinking of it. Women are so."

Clive was touched and pleased by this exhibition of kind feeling.

"You know his mother was an Absolon," the good wife continues, pointing to her husband.

"Most respectable diamond merchants in—"

"Hold your tongue, Betsy, and leave my poor old mother alone; do now," says Mr. Sherrick, darkly. Clive is in his uncle's fond embrace by this time, who rebukes him for not having called in Walpole Street.

"Now, when will you two gents come up to my shop to 'ave a family dinner?" asks Sherrick.

"Ah, Mr. Newcome, do come," says Julia, in her deep rich voice, looking up to him with her great black eyes. And if Clive had been a vain fellow like some folks, who knows but he might have thought he had made an impression on the handsome Julia?

"Thursday, now make it Thursday, if Mr. H. is disengaged. Come along, girls, for the flies bites the ponies when they're a-standing still, and makes 'em mad this weather. Any thing you like for dinner? Cut of salmon and cucumber? No, pickled salmon's best this weather."

"Whatever you give me, you know I'm thankful," says Honeyman, in a sweet, sad voice, to the two ladies, who were standing looking at him, the mother's hand clasped in the daughter's.

"Should you like that Mendelssohn for the Sunday after next? Julia sings it splendid.

"No I don't, Ma."

"You do, dear! She's a good, good dear, Mr. H., that's what she is."

"You must not call—a—him, in that way. Don't say Mr. H., Ma," says Julia.

"Call me what you please!" says Charles, with the most heart-rending simplicity; and Mrs. Sherrick straightway kisses her daughter. Sherrick meanwhile has been pointing out the improvement of the chapel to Clive (which now has indeed a look of the Gothic Hall at Rosherville), and has confided to him the sum for which he screwed the painted window out of old Moss.

"When he come to see it up in this place, Sir, the old man was mad, I give you my word! His son ain't no good: says he knows you. He's such a screw, that chap, that he'll overreach himself, mark my words. At least, he'll never die rich. Did you ever hear of me screwing? No, I spend my money like a man. How those girls are a-goin' on about their music with Honeyman. I don't let 'em sing in the evening, or him do duty more than once a day; and you can calc'late how the music draws, because in the evenin' they're ain't half the number of people here. Rev. Mr. Journyman does the duty now—quiet Hoxford man—ill, I suppose, this morning. H. sits in his pew, where he was; and coughs, that's to say, I told him to cough. The women like a consumptive parson, Sir. Come, gals!"

Clive went to his uncle's lodgings, and was received by Mr. and Mrs. Ridley with great glee and kindness. Both of those good people had made it a point to pay their duty to Mr. Clive immediately on his return to England, and thank him over and over again for his kindness to John James. Never, never would they forget his goodness, and the Colonel's, they were sure. A cake, a heap of biscuits, a pyramid of jams, six frizzling hot mutton chops, and four kinds of wine, came bustling up to Mr. Honeyman's room twenty minutes after Clive had entered it—as a token of the Riddleys' affection for him.

Clive remarked, with a smile, the "Pall Mall Gazette" upon a side-table, and in the chimney-glass almost as many cards as in the time of Honeyman's early prosperity. That he and his uncle should be very intimate together, was impossible, from the nature of the two men; Clive being frank, clear-sighted, and imperious; Charles, timid, vain, and double-faced, conscious that he was a humbug, and that most people found him out, so that he would quiver and turn away, and be more afraid of young Clive and his direct straightforward way, than of many older men. Then there was the sense of the money transactions between him and the Colonel, which made Charles Honeyman doubly uneasy. In fine, they did not like each other; but as he is a connection of the most respectable Newcome family, surely he is entitled to a page or two in these their memoirs.

Thursday came, and with it Mr. Sherrick's entertainment, to which also Mr. Binnie and his party had been invited to meet Colonel Newcome's son. Uncle James and Rosey brought Clive in their carriage; Mrs. Mackenzie sent a headache as an apology. She chose to treat Uncle James's landlord with a great deal of hauteur, and to be angry with her brother for visiting such a person. "In fact, you see how fond I must be of dear little Rosey, Clive, that I put up with all mamma's tantrums for her sake," remarks Mr. Binnie.

"Oh, uncle!" says little Rosey, and the old gentleman stopped her remonstrances with a kiss.

"Yes," says he, "your mother does have tantrums, Miss; and though you never complain, there's no reason why I shouldn't. You will not tell on me" (it was "Oh, uncle!" again); "and Clive won't, I am sure. This little thing, Sir," James went on, holding Rosey's pretty little hand and looking fondly in her pretty little face, "is her old uncle's only comfort in life. I wish I had her out to India to me, and never come back to this great dreary town of yours. But I was tempted home by Tom Newcome; and I'm too old to go back, Sir. Where the stick falls let it lie. Rosey would have been whisked out of my house, in India, in a month after I had her there. Some young fellow would have taken her away from me; and now she has promised never to leave her old Uncle James, hasn't she?"

"No, never, uncle," said Rosey.

"We don't want to fall in love, do we, child? We don't want to be breaking our hearts like some young folks, and dancing attendance at balls night after night, and capering about in the Park to see if we can get a glimpse of the beloved object, eh, Rosey?"

Rosey blushed. It was evident that she and Uncle James both knew of Clive's love affair. In fact, the front seat and back seat of the carriage both blushed. And as for the secret, why Mrs. Mackenzie and Mrs. Hobson had talked it a hundred times over.

"This little Rosey, Sir, has promised to take care of me on this side of Styx," continued Uncle James; "and if she could but be left alone, and to do it without mamma—there, I won't say a word more against her—we should get on none the worse."

"Uncle James, I must make a picture of you, for Rosey," said Clive, good-humoredly. And Rosey said, "Oh, thank you, Clive," and held out that pretty little hand, and looked so sweet and kind and happy, that Clive could not but be charmed at the sight of so much innocence and candor.

"Quasty peecoly Rosiny," says James, in a fine Scotch Italian, "e la piu bella, la piu cara, ragazza ma la mawdry e il diav—"

"Don't, uncle!" cried Rosey, again; and Clive laughed at Uncle James's wonderful outbreak in a foreign tongue.

"Eh! I thought ye didn't know a word of the sweet language, Rosey! It's just the Len-guy Toscawny in Bocky Romawny that I thought to try in compliment to this young monkey who has seen the world." And by this time Saint John's Wood was reached; and Mr. Sherrick's handsome villa, at the door of which the three beheld the Reverend Charles Honeyman stepping out of a neat brougham.

The drawing-room contained several pictures of Mrs. Sherrick when she was in the theatrical line, Smee's portrait of her, which was never half handsome enough for my Betsy, Sherrick said indignantly, the print of her in Artaxerxes, with her signature as Elizabeth Folthorpe (not, in truth, a fine specimen of calligraphy), the testimonial presented to her on the conclusion of the triumphal season of 18—, at Drury Lane, by her ever-grateful friend, Adolphus Smacker, Lessee, who, of course, went to law with her next year, and other Thespian emblems. But Clive remarked, with not a little amusement, that the drawing-room tables were now covered with a number of those books which he had seen at Madame de Moncontour's, and many French and German ecclesiastical gimcracks, such as are familiar to numberless readers of mine. There were the lives of St. Botibol of Islington, and St. Willibald of Bareacres; with pictures of those confessors. Then there was the Legend of Margery Dawe, Virgin and Martyr, with a sweet double-frontispiece, representing (1) the sainted woman selling her feather-bed for the benefit of the poor; and (2) reclining upon straw, the leanest of invalids. There was Old Daddy Longlegs, and how he was brought to say his Prayers; a Tale for Children, by a Lady, with a preface dated St. Chad's Eve, and signed C. H. The Rev. Charles Honeyman's Sermons, delivered at Lady Whittlesea's Chapel. Poems of Early Days, by Charles Honeyman, A.M. The Life of good Dame Whittlesea, by do. do. Yes, Charles had come out in the literary line; and there in a basket was a strip of Berlin work, of the very same Gothic pattern which Madame de Moncontour was weaving, and which you afterward saw round the pulpit of Charles's chapel. Rosey was welcomed most kindly by the kind ladies; and as the gentlemen sat over their wine after dinner in the summer evening, Clive beheld Rosey and Julia pacing up and down the lawn, Miss Julia's arm round her little friend's waist: he thought they would make a pretty little picture.

"My girl ain't a bad one to look at, is she?" said the pleased father. "A fellow might look far enough, and see not prettier than them two."

Charles sighed out that there was a German print, the Two Leonoras, which put him in mind of their various styles of beauty.

"I wish I could paint them," said Clive.

"And why not, Sir?" asks his host. "Let me give you your first commission now, Mr. Clive; I would'n mind paying a good bit for a picture of my Julia. I forget how much Old Smee got for Betsy's, the old humbug!"

Clive said it was not the will, but the power that was deficient. He succeeded with men, but the ladies were too much for him as yet.

"Those you've done up at Albany Street Barracks are famous: I've seen 'em," said Mr. Sherrick; and remarking that his guest looked rather surprised at the idea of his being in such company, Sherrick said, "What, you think they are too great swells for me? Law bless you, I often go there. I've business with several of 'em; had with Captain Belsize, with the Earl of Kew, who's every inch the gentleman—one of nature's aristocracy, and paid up like a man. The Earl and me has had many dealings together."

Honeyman smiled faintly, and nobody complying with Mr. Sherrick's boisterous entreaties to drink more, the gentlemen quitted the dinner-table, which had been served in a style of prodigious splendor, and went to the drawing-room for a little music.

This was all of the gravest and best kind; so grave indeed, that James Binnie might be heard in a corner giving an accompaniment of little snores to the singers and the piano. But Rosey was delighted with the performance, and Sherrick remarked to Clive, "That's a good gal, that is; I like that gal; she ain't jealous of Julia cutting her out in the music, but listens as pleased as any one. She's a sweet little pipe of her own, too. Miss Mackenzie, if ever you like to go to the opera, send a word either to my West End or my City office. I've boxes every week, and you're welcome to any thing I can give you."

So all agreed that the evening had been a very pleasant one; and they of Fitzroy Square returned home talking in a most comfortable friendly way—that is, two of them, for Uncle James fell asleep again, taking possession of the back seat; and Clive and Rosey prattled together. He had offered to try and take all the young ladies' likenesses. "You know what a failure the last was, Rosey?"—he had very nearly said "dear Rosey."

"Yes, but Miss Sherrick is so handsome, that you will succeed better with her than with my round face, Mr. Newcome."

"Mr. What?" cries Clive.

"Well, Clive, then," says Rosey, in a little voice.

He sought for a little hand which was not very far away. "You know we are like brother and sister, dear Rosey?" he said this time.

"Yes," said she, and gave a little pressure of the hand. And then Uncle James woke up; and it seemed as if the whole drive didn't occupy a minute, and they shook hands very very kindly at the door of Fitzroy Square.

Clive made a famous likeness of Miss Sherrick, with which Mr. Sherrick was delighted, and so was Mr. Honeyman, who happened to call upon his nephew once or twice when the ladies happened to be sitting. When Clive proposed to the Rev. Charles Honeyman to take his head off; and made an excellent likeness in chalk of his uncle—that one in fact, from which the print was taken, which you may see any day at Hogarth's, in the Haymarket, along with a whole regiment of British divines. Charles became so friendly, that he was constantly coming to Charlotte Street, once or twice a week.

Mr. and Mrs. Sherrick came to look at the drawing, and were charmed with it; and when Rosey was sitting, they came to see her portrait, which again was not quite so successful. One Monday, the Sherricks and Honeyman too happened to call to see the picture of Rosey, who trotted over with her uncle to Clive's studio, and they all had a great laugh at a paragraph in the "Pall Mall Gazette," evidently from F. B.'s hand, to the following effect:

"CONVERSION IN HIGH LIFE.—A foreign nobleman of princely rank, who has married an English lady, and has resided among us for some time, is likely, we hear and trust, to join the English Church. The Prince de M—nc—nt—r has been a constant attendant at Lady Whittlesea's chapel, of which the Rev. C. Honeyman is the eloquent incumbent; and it is said this sound and talented divine has been the means of awakening the prince to a sense of the erroneous doctrines in which he has been bred. His ancestors were Protestant, and fought by the side of Henry IV. at Ivry. In Louis XIV.'s time they adopted the religion of that persecuting monarch. We sincerely trust that the present heir of the house of Ivry will see fit to return to the creed which his forefathers so unfortunately abjured."

The ladies received this news with perfect gravity; and Charles uttered a meek wish that it might prove true. As they went away, they offered more hospitalities to Clive and Mr. Binnie and his niece. They liked the music, would they not come and hear it again?

When they had departed with Mr. Honeyman, Clive could not help saying to Uncle James, "Why are those people always coming here; praising me; and asking me to dinner? Do you know, I can't help thinking that they rather want me as a pretender for Miss Sherrick?"

Binnie burst into a loud guffaw, and cried out, "O vanitas vanitatum!" Rosa laughed too.

"I don't think it any joke at all," said Clive.

"Why, you stupid lad, don't you see it is Charles Honeyman the girl's in love with?" cried Uncle James. "Rosey saw it in the very first instant we entered their drawing-room three weeks ago."

"Indeed, and how?" asked Clive.

"By—the way she looked at him," said little Rosey.

THE LADY'S REVENGE.

YOUNG, beautiful, accomplished, and even learned, was Miss Amaranth St. Quillotte, when she was deserted by her lover and affianced husband, Mr. Emerond, the celebrated philosopher and fort esprit of my young days. Above all, she was amazingly rich, her father having been a West Indian planter in the days when West Indian and wealth were terms synonymous. The young girl had been sent over to England by her guardians in her fourteenth year, soon after becoming an orphan; and at twenty-one, beautiful and an heiress, was worth, one would have supposed, the constancy of any man. Mr. Emerond thought differently, however; and after four years' assiduous courtship, took the liberty of changing his mind. He ran away with a silly young girl from a boarding-school, without a pocket-piece even to her fortune; and in a farewell letter to his deceived mistress, coolly told her he found that within his breast which forbade him to be the slave of any woman. And the worst of it was, he had taught Amarynth to love—and need I say what Love is, when he dwells in the heart of an ardent young West Indian? In truth, it is more fervent and fatal in its consequences than colder minds can well imagine. When this love was slighted, repulsed, returned on the hands of her who had bestowed her entire heart on the faithless Emerond, there was a storm of passion kindled not easily allayed nor brought within the limits of reason. "Am I so ugly, then?" soliloquized the discarded beauty, looking in her mirror. The image reflected might, it is true, have been more serene, but, in its own peculiar style, could scarce have been more rare in its loveliness. A smooth olive skin, beneath whose deep hue burned in the velvet cheeks crimson roses; eyes large, dark, soft, and yet glowing; hair long, flowing, silken, by the side of whose jetty luxuriance the raven's plumage would have looked brown; a form slight, elegant, and thorough-bred; a mixture of Spanish and quadroon gracefulness; teeth—but there, I have no more hackneyed smiles at hand; pearls will not suffice; ivory grows yellow in remembrance of those bright, regular, dazzling teeth, which lighted the full crimson mouth, as it were, with a sunbeam. "Am I ugly?" The mirror said No—and it was broken to pieces by the impetuous bereaved girl.

"Of what use is beauty, when a pale skin, yellow hair, and lack-lustre eyes has robbed me of all that life held most dear? Oh, Emerond! my girlhood's idol, my womanhood's pride; come back, yes, come back, I will forgive all, I will." And poor Miss St. Quillotte woke up from her frantic apostrophes to find herself alone, the mirror in shatters, the room in confusion, her brain excited almost to madness, her bosom overcharged with grief to danger of suffocation. Her maid proposed to send for a physician, and was threatened with discharge for the suggestion. "Expose my wretchedness," said Amarynth, "to the eyes of the prying world? Get me some opium and leave me." She was obeyed in her last command; and for the first, Mrs. Abigail mixed a weak solution calculated to soothe but not to destroy. Miss St. Quillotte, however, slept not, but passed the night in meditation. She must be revenged—that she had determined on; her Creole blood demanded it. But how? To visit the guilty man with poison or a dagger was not exactly the sort of revenge; to kill herself would be futile, inasmuch as she might not be able, in that case, to ascertain how he bore the blow. No, she must wring his heart living; she must prove how little she felt the stroke which in reality had crushed her ardent and haughty spirit to the ground. She would marry. True, Mr. Emerond's was the only offer she had ever received. For him she had spurned, trampled on all suitors, treated all mankind, for his sake, with such disdain, that her reported shrewishness became indeed "a scarecrow to her beauty;" but still she supposed that she could attract somebody, no matter who—at least her money would. Ah, there was indeed the rub. Give up liberty, wealth, liberty of thought even, perhaps, and all to a man whom, be he what he might, she must loathe—for the very name of man had suddenly become detestable. No, impossible! yet marry she must and would. To die Miss St. Quillotte, and bequeath her wealth to hospitals, parrots, and monkeys! There was no purer light shed on that rebellious soul, no thoughts of gentle ministrings, holy charities, pious sympathies, of drying the mourner's tears, or wiping the brow of sickness and pain. The frightful picture of an old maid, which flitted in the darkness of her overwrought imagination, was that of a splenetic being wallowing in cards and scandal, pampering overfed dogs and cats, sneered at by her acquaintance, reviled by her enemies. "I can never come to that," she resumed, as this horrible portrait rose before her eyes. "He shall not have that gratification. I will have a husband, but he shall be my tool, my slave; he shall be an image set up to sustain my dignity before the world, and he shall be obedient. Never, never can I love and honor any man after such treatment as I have experienced, never shall any man love me more—if man's love can indeed be any thing but mere pretense."

Now this kind of scheme was all very well in theory, but practically it was extremely difficult of execution, setting delicacy aside. If Amarynth really intended to reverse the general custom and propose to some gentleman, still the kind of proposal which only she would agree to, that of entire control over her husband's opinions and actions, was not likely to meet with acceptance. She paused as the many difficulties of her revenge rose in array before her; then suddenly flashed a thought. Was it feasible? Yes! it must, it should be!

Not far from Miss St. Quillotte's residence, which abutted on the Green Park, she remembered to have noticed a young man, whose occupation was—smile if you please, dear reader—a sweeper of the crossing. Amarynth, who frequently, attended by the faithless Emerond, or at times a single man-servant, promenaded in the park, which the garden of her house indeed overlooked, had noticed this person, partly because he looked superior to his menial occupation, and partly because, when she doled out her charity, he appeared to reverence the beautiful Creole as something more than human. It was toward this creature of her beauty that her thoughts were now directed, certain the man was good-looking enough to be made a gentleman of, to hand her to her carriage, carry her fan in public, attend her to Ranelagh, the opera, the play-house, and to be set up to the world as a lawful defender and protector, and to wring the heart of him, the false, the vile, with indignant envy. He was poor, too—a main point—because no rich or independent man could possibly be reduced to such a mere poodle's existence. She spent a day in consideration; and the next morning sent her woman to summon the sweeper, as yet innocent of the strange honors awaiting him. Much astonished was Mrs. Abigail, too, at her mistress's new whim; but her place was good; she was discreet, and made no remark, not even to her fellow-servants.

It was a bitter, piercing day in January, when Paul Meredith was ushered into the splendid mansion of Miss St. Quillotte. He was half frozen, and had been blowing his numbed fingers for the last half hour to keep them from congealing.

Amarynth was not far out in her conjecture. The poor young fellow had feasted his eyes so often on her loveliness, that passion had been nourished in the breast of that ill-fed, half-clothed, hopeless youth. Miss St. Quillotte had become his sun, and when he saw not that vision of haughtiness and beauty, the brightest summer's day was dark enough to him. But further than nourishing her lovely image in his outcast's breast, more than daring to dream of her when he laid his head on his miserable pallet in his garret, or of wondering at her dainty elegance and beauty, he had never aspired even in thought—it was not likely—the great and beautiful heiress, almost too precious for a poor fellow to speak to, save with downcast eyes and humility of tongue—to notice him, impossible. He knew, moreover, that the exquisitely-dressed gentleman who often attended was a favored suitor—so much common report had told the poor and humble road-sweeper; therefore, when he was shown into a noble room, replete with luxuries and elegance, he looked and wondered, and concluded he was about to become the object of one of those sudden and benevolent caprices with which fine ladies sometimes honor poor people. Little did he dream—but in the midst of his bewilderments and wanderings a bright vision appeared to him, alone—and oh, how glorious in its radiant and superb loveliness! The rich furniture, the perfumed air of the luxurious apartment, the beautiful and elegantly-dressed young woman who stood there before him, all combined to awe and abash the poor young man, who felt his unfitness to appear before wealth and refinement; and though, save for his soiled and coarse attire, scrupulously clean, his appearance was strangely out of character with all about him. Yet abashed though he might stand there, Miss St. Quillotte, on her part, felt no less so. She was about to violate all those nice proprieties which fence in and invest women with the sanctity of respect. She was about forever to annihilate her own self-esteem, and— She paused. At that minute it would have been easy to dismiss the wondering sweeper with an inquiry, a present, any excuse; but the memory of Emerond, his slights, her still deep love, her passionate regrets, her gnawing wish that he too should be made to feel repentance; and she braced up her singular resolution. She spoke; Paul started as the clear, cold, haughty accents fell on his astonished ear. Amarynth, who was easy enough to serve and live with, would not for worlds have spoken in such a tone to one of her humblest domestics.

"You are very poor," frowning as if she was denouncing a flagrant crime.

He raised his eyes—large, bright, and blue they were. Midst his poverty, this young man afforded the purest type of the Saxon race in the pride of manhood. A tall, well-knit frame, fair curly hair, a bright skin, and those clear eyes wherein you might, as in a mirror, behold every object near him reflected. He raised them to her. "I am poor, madam, very; but I am honest."

She curled her lip. Honesty, to her, was but a virtue of the most plebeian order—the saving grace of the very abject.

"I do not suppose you are going to rob me," she answered. A pause. "How would you like to be rich?"

"Madam!" He was so surprised at such a question, his face flushed, he thought the rich beauty had sent for him to mock him for her amusement. He turned, and bowing, prepared to go.

"Stay," said Miss St. Quillotte, reaching a chair, and sitting down, for she felt unequal to stand before that honest amazement and clear searching eyes any longer. "Stay; I have a great deal to say. I propose to bestow wealth on you—to make you rich—to make you, in short, a gentleman."

Bedreddin Hassan, when he was accused of making cream-tarts without pepper in them, was never so astonished as Paul.

"Madam!"

"Speak not—listen; I have things to say still more surprising: hear, but do not interrupt me. Do you comprehend, young man, how this wealth and station is to become yours? I will tell you; you must become—my husband."

It was fairly spoken now, and for some minutes a dead silence reigned throughout the spacious apartment. Neither could speak. Paul's face, which at the first receipt of this wonderful intelligence had lighted up with eagerness and joy, now subsided into gloom and doubt. Miss St. Quillotte's spirit rose.

"Perhaps," she said, haughtily, "I am rejected?"

"For the second time," whispered revenge.

"Madam," said the young man, "I am but poor fellow, earning a mere crust by the most degraded labor, but I have yet that in my keeping which is better in the eye of God"—he raised his eyes—those bright, unflinching eyes—reverently to heaven—"than wealth and rank without; I mean, madam, the honor of a man—a man who has never been debased, further than poverty can debase. I think I understand your ladyship"—here he blushed, stammered, hesitated: he was quite unskilled in the polite art of uttering disagreeable truths in an agreeable way. He continued—"My own poverty is irksome enough; I can not bear the burden of a fine lady's shame."

Amarynth started up; her Creole blood turned dark-red in her veins, and swept over her brow, face, and bosom. Here was a precious mistake indeed; the youth fancied her guilty of actual crime, and seeking to conceal her dishonor with the shelter of a husband's name. It was not an unnatural mistake, after all. She recovered. At least, here were noble qualities; stuff, which it is a pity is not oftener found in real, well-born gentlemen. She forced herself to explain. "You are very bold," she said, disdainfully, "but you are mistaken. Listen. He who sought my hand and fortune, and whom I have loved from girlhood, is false: by this time he has wedded another. My soul burns to be revenged, but the name and sight of man is hateful to me. In reality, I will never take on myself the duties or affections of a wife: it is for this I sent for you. You are poor; it will be something for you to be raised out of the mire of poverty and dirt." She sneered. "The ceremony of marriage will confer on you some advantages which wealth can give. In the eyes of the world you will be my husband; to me you must bind yourself by a solemn oath, a written bond, never to be more than you are at this moment, standing there, there, a beggar and an outcast." She glanced around her proudly, though to say truth, her pride at that minute was of the very basest kind—the pride of vulgar riches exulting in its power over honesty and virtue. Again there was a silence. Paul's head bent down on his breast, his eyes fixed on the polished oak floor. Miss St. Quillotte was exhausted; she rose up. "Remain here," she said, "for half an hour; deliberate on the advantages offered—an opportunity of fortune which few would reject in your circumstances. But make no mistake; you will be bound down strictly, and on the least attempt to alter the conditions of our contract, my wealth shall obtain a divorce, and you shall be cast forth to your original station. Remember, the title of my husband, the fortune of a gentleman, but from myself, only the consideration I afford to my other paid and fed lacqueys."

With this insolent speech, calculated indeed to crush the most humble, she left the room, and the young man mused on this singular adventure. At first, he was for starting off and leaving the rich lady—whose image, purer and fairer far than the reality, had filled his bosom, and unconsciously had elevated his thoughts far above his seeming station—to seek some tool better fitted for so humiliating a position; but there arose a picture which effectually chained him to that room, and held him down as it were with chains of lead. This picture presented a bed-ridden woman, whose tender love for her son had been, spite of their wretchedness and want, his saving angel—his guardian spirit. To bestow on her last few remaining days comforts and luxuries unknown—to obtain medical aid hitherto above their greatest hopes—all this constrained him to hesitate and doubt as to whether he should indeed throw by the golden chance fortune had so strangely offered him. Few in his rank and circumstances would have paused a moment, but Paul Meredith was one of those rare human plants which, grown and fostered in a wilderness of weeds, yet loses none of its original purity and fragrance in its forced contact with vile things. His father, a private soldier, had perished in the American war; and his mother, a delicate woman who had followed the camp, returned to England on the cessation of hostilities between that country and America, bearing with her her infant son, then between five and six years of age. On her arrival in London, Mrs. Meredith, who had her own and her child's living to gain, was seized with rheumatic fever, and on her recovery she found she had lost the use of her lower limbs. Henceforth, the poor widow was bed-ridden. With the fortitude and courage which the poor so often display, she sought, by the aid of a kind neighbor or two, for needlework, and for a time managed to support herself and little Paul in decency. At length this resource—precarious in that day as I hear it is said to be in later times—failed. Then she knitted articles for daily use, and the poor boy went about the streets of London vending them for their bread. During this time the poor widow, who as times went was a fair scholar, taught the boy to read and write, and to pray for their daily food: simple teachings, yet the seed was sown on good ground, and promised, in spite of its precocious and forced knowledge of the world around, to bear the fruits of faith, honesty, and love.

Time passed—the widow and her son grew poorer each day; often fasting for long hours—he the sole attendant of her sick and painful bed. The boy might, like his father, have entered the service of his country—but could he leave his mother? She, whose riches he was; whose only hope in this cold, bleak, and rugged world, was the youth's filial love—alone rendering supportable her trials and privations.

This mother, then, was the thought which hindered Paul from departing out of Miss St. Quillotte's house faster than he had entered it. While he thought, and wondered, and hesitated, a servant entered bearing a salver filled with rich viands and generous wines. Poor human nature! I may not paint thee better than thou really art. Hunger and poverty drag down to earth the brightest and most soaring spirit. Paul ate and drank—looked wistfully at the dainties, as he thought of the dear invalid in their poor garret, and, finally, made up his mind to accept the heiress on her own terms.

After all, do not think so meanly of him; he was but four-and-twenty, and perhaps there burned a latent hope within him that the object of his silent and humble passion might one day repent of her resolve.

She returned, and desired to know if his mind was settled. He, not without much embarrassment, for he was unversed in deceit, signified his acquiescence.

Amarynth's face brightened. After thus exposing her affairs to this creature, it would have been too dreadful to have been spurned by him. She placed a purse filled with gold in his hand, desired he would procure suitable attire, and return to her house at eight o'clock that evening, "when," she said, "I will have the contract between us prepared, and ready for signature. After that I will inform you when the marriage ceremony is to take place. Your name?" He blushed as he told it. He felt this mock-marriage was the only tarnish that honest name had known. She was pleased at its euphony. She had feared some terribly vulgar-sounding cognomen. "For the present," she said, with the air of a queen dismissing a courtier, "adieu. My woman will conduct you through the garden into the park. You will return to-night the same way: it is important that none of the servants should see you." And they separated, each with anxious thoughts: he to tell his mother this strange fortune; she to bribe and coax her lawyer, old Mr. Jeffries, whose aid was indispensable, into acquiescence with her strange whim.

Mr. Jeffries was an old solicitor, who had had the care of Miss St. Quillotte's affairs ever since her minority. He was a peculiar but not an unkindly old gentleman; and when Amarynth sent for him, and disclosing her forsaken plight, acquainted him also with her delectable plan of revenge, that sage counselor, first of all deliberately gazing at his client as she paced up and down her spacious library, which, being a savante, she used much as her usual sitting apartment, and then quietly decided she was very mad indeed. He soon found, however, that the form of her mental disease was that of obstinacy; and as it is certain that if all the obstinate people in the world were to be placed under surveillance, the population would thin too greatly, he next only deliberated how he might prevent the rash deed she meditated. I must, however, explain that Miss St. Quillotte kept silent as to the recent occupation of her intended spouse. Mr. Jeffries was led to suppose him respectable, though obscure. Never was there such a wearisome affair. It took two good hours to explain every circumstance to the old lawyer, and then he insisted, with the caution and circumspection of age, in going over every individual circumstance again. At last Amarynth fairly lost her temper. "Do as you please," she said; "either draw up the contract and settlements as I shall dictate, or I will withdraw my affairs from your hands entirely, and employ some stranger, who will neither question my will nor judgment." Then self-interest prompted Mr. Jeffries to sigh, shrug his shoulders, and to mutter, "Well, I wish you may not repent, my dear;" which being rightly interpreted, meant, "I hope you will." He then sent for his clerk, and, under the dictation of Miss St. Quillotte, a deed of contract and settlement was drawn up. It would, of course, be impossible for me to transcribe that deed: in a word, it contained a contract of marriage between Amarynth St. Quillotte and Paul Meredith on the terms she had proposed—that, in consideration of a settlement of three thousand pounds per annum to be settled on the said Paul, he should entirely forego and resign the authority of a husband; that he was to attend her in public—but in private, separate suites of rooms should entirely separate the pair from the companionship of domestic life, save at dinner, or on the occasion of visitors being present; this last clause dependent on the will of the said Amarynth St. Quillotte. In fine, the young husband, or rather partner, was so hemmed in with conditions, that Mr. Jeffries, who took on this occasion twice his accustomed quantity of snuff, muttered that the man must be a perfect fool who could sign such a deed. The divorce threat was likewise to be enforced on the failure of the slightest of these conditions. The deed was not half copied, when Mrs. Abigail entering the room, made a sign to her mistress. The young lady nodded, and quitting the apartment, the woman returned, ushering in a youth on whom Miss St. Quillotte gazed with unfeigned surprise. The tailor—the hairdresser—had indeed worked a miracle. Paul, the sweeper, stood there—converted, not into a bean, but a gentleman—little else to betray his origin but his hands, brown and horny with hard work. It was gratifying, but she took no further notice of the young man than to reflect it was a good thing he looked so well. Mr. Jeffries, however, looked from one to the other of these young people. He took a vast pinch of snuff, and stopping his clerk's arm, took him aside, and conferred with that functionary for awhile. Then writing a memorandum he handed it over to the clerk, who resumed his labors. The night was far advanced when they were finished. The deed, by Miss St. Quillotte's desire, concluded with a solemn form of oath, by which both parties bound themselves to observe the conditions inscribed therein. Mr. Jeffries read over the parchment, and the contractors signed it. It was not without some trepidation that Amarynth beheld Paul approach the table for this purpose; but to her relief he could write his name, and that in a bold round hand, which would not have disgraced a clerk. During all this time he never once looked at his affianced wife, who on her part regarded him as little. Business over, the bride-elect named two days thence for the ceremony, which was to be strictly private; then all parties separated, to meet no more till the wedding-day, when they were to be united at Mr. Jeffries's house by special licence.

That day came, and Paul Meredith, the cross-ing-sweeper, was united in marriage to Miss Amarynth St. Quillotte, the great West-Indian heiress. The remainder of his wedding-day was spent by the bridegroom in the apartment of his bed-ridden mother, for whom he had taken handsome rooms near the bride's house. That eccentric young lady spent hers in tears, sighs, and perpetual revertings to the man of her heart—now lost forever. A brilliant and a happy wedding it was truly.

Mrs. Meredith had no reason to fear her husband's intrusion—he never came, except when she summoned him to attend her abroad, and then it was, apparently, any thing but a pleasure to him. The marriage had been duly announced, and congratulations poured in from all Amarynth's friends. As for the bridegroom, he had never had any, except the penny pieman, who had, in the days of Paul's destitution, frequently given that young fellow a pie to take home to his mother. But the pieman knew naught of Paul's exaltation, and was therefore much mystified and astonished when a strange gentleman, who said he was Mr. Meredith's man of business, inducted him into a thriving trade in his own line, clogged only with the condition that he should never inquire into the name of his benefactor. I have heard Mr. Martin, the grandson of that pieman—who retired at eighty years of age, on a handsome fortune from the profits of the business—tell the story, and he mentioned how his grandfather learned the truth many years after from Mr. Meredith's own lips..... Paul engaged a gentleman to come daily and instruct him in various branches of knowledge, during the hours of leisure, when he was not in attendance on Mrs. Meredith or his bed-ridden mother. When the young man danced attendance on his haughty young wife, he could not avoid seeing how she was admired. Amarynth's marriage, indeed, seemed the signal for homage and adoration of all kinds from the other sex being lavished at her feet. When men no longer dreaded being entrapped into marriage, they were willing enough to admire. Some of these gallants strove to win the husband into intimacy, but that young gentleman, for so he now was in the eyes of the world, avoided all society, except that of his mother and his tutor. And time moved on.

Mrs. Meredith drank deeply of dissipation: wearisome were the balls, the ridottos, the fêtes, the parties at faro, she dragged her reluctant husband to. Paul soon wearied of fashionable life. People wondered at his quiet placidity, and passed on; it was nothing to the world, the distant terms that Mr. Meredith and his beautiful wife appeared on. Paul had soon satisfied himself that Amarynth's reputation was indeed intact. She flirted, it is true, and delighted in the thought that she sometimes with her wit, learning, and beauty, raised in some foolish heart a genuine flame, which she would encourage to the last, and then turn round and trample on the unfortunate as—she muttered—her heart had been trampled on. She little dreamed that of all the throngs who dwelt on her charms and delighted in her brilliant conversation, her husband was the most devoted and the most hopeless. How, indeed, could a man see that lovely creature in all the panoply of her beauty—all the retenue and finish of her fascinations, and not love her, even if he had not done so from the first. He loved her, indeed, differently from the time when she used to give him silver at the crossing; but not less passionately—far more so—increase of knowledge seldom lessens the passions.

Amarynth strove to keep within her heart the image of Emerond—for the sake of constancy, I grieve to say, that image grew daily fainter and fainter. It was, after all, but a waxen one, which the very heat of resentment and memory gradually melted. In spite of herself, his name no longer caused the blush, nor the throbbing of the heart, which used to follow on hearing of him. I verily believe his existence would have been entirely forgotten, but for the vast heap of his letters with which she fed the dying embers of her grande passion, and the lock of his hair, which she watered with her tears till the lachrymal fountain dried up, and refused to gush forth on any such occasion. Just about that time, too, Amarynth's interest was excited by elegant bouquets which were sent to her, accompanied with verses, which her really cultivated literary taste told her were far better than the bombast of the love lays of her day. Sonnets, mostly, the lines were in the form of—the versification not of the smoothest, perhaps, but the sentiments fresh, spontaneous, evidently from the heart. There was the fire of Ovid, without that bard's wantonness. Sometimes they imitated the verse of Horace and Virgil. It was much about that time, that Mr. Meredith had made such progress in Latin that he began to translate the Æneid. These verses dwelt greatly on the writer's ardent but hopeless love. She began with interest, and soon entertained an ardent curiosity to see her unknown adorer. She inquired respecting the messenger who brought these passionate effusions. No one knew. Every morning they were found on the marble table in the great hall passage; but no one, strange to say, could tell from whence the offerings emanated. Amarynth's thoughts wandered over her household; but there was no one in it with the least pretensions to reading or writing save old Dobbs, the house steward, and from him such things as flowers and verses were very unlikely. She was being handed to her coach one day by Mr. Meredith, when the mystery was solved. A small edition of Virgil dropped out of his vest while escorting his lady, and a paper in it floated to the feet of Amarynth. It was in the handwriting of the unknown. This, then, was the secret; quick as lightning it flashed on her; but she affected not to see, and as Paul, in some confusion, picked up the paper, she glanced at him. She could not but marvel at the polish of his appearance. A pure mind and a gentle spirit go far indeed toward creating a gentleman, and Paul was that now in form and manners, as well as in heart and soul. Mrs. Meredith was lost in thought all that evening. Next day, Mr. Meredith sent her a hurried message—his bed-ridden mother was dying; would she spare his services till all was over? She desired to speak with him. He came, all disorder and agitation. All her beauty could not for one moment now attract his notice. "She is all I have in the world to love," he said. How chill those words fell on Amarynth's heart. "Stay," she said, hesitating; "I will go with you." He bowed, but expressed neither joy nor rapture. The coach was called, and for the first time Mrs. Meredith beheld her mother-in-law. The poor woman was all but expiring when they arrived. Paul whispered to her as he supported her dying head; she raised her eyes to Amarynth. "Ah, madam," said she, "let me thank you for all your goodness; but oh, my boy! ah, you know not what a heart you have slighted!" The poor mother grew speechless soon after, and expired on her son's bosom. Amarynth fainted, and knew not how she was taken home. The lady and her husband did not meet till the funeral was over. He started to see her black attire. "You are too good, madam," he said. Did she wish he had said something more? After all, she must own, he observed the terms she had dictated somewhat too literally—her vanity, ever sensitive, began to be wounded. Things, however, went on much as usual; the flowers and the sonnets, though, had ceased to arrive, and Amarynth was fain to console herself with those she had. It was strange how they began to supersede Emerond's letters. I think it was a month or two after, that Mrs. Meredith looked into her own heart one day, and appalled at the discoveries she made there, rose up, went to her bureau, seized those famous letters, and burnt them every one, finishing the bonfire with the lock of hair, which fizzed off on the top, with a hiss of contempt and anger like the last revilings of a disappointed demon. Mrs. Abigail received a hint one day, accompanied by a new Paduasie sacque, and soon afterward a lock of sunny hair was suspended in a locket, and worn next Amarynth's heart. How the waiting-woman got it, was best known to herself; perhaps Mr. Peruke, who every day dressed Mr. Meredith's hair, could have informed the curious inquirer.

Who can date the growth of love? In the history of the passions, time is trampled on. We may experience that to-day, which yesterday we had deemed utterly impossible. The son of Venus, and the son of Nox and Erebus, were not more different than Amarynth's deceased passion, and the pure love which began so gradually to steal over her heart. The one had led to violence, anger, revenge—the other was exalted till it finally aspired to heaven itself, for there only might she love, or acknowledge her love. That fatal contract, that oath—the death of the happiness she might have known. She would have ceased almost entirely to go out, but that those occasions were the only ones on which she could feast herself with the contemplation of her soul's idol. Be sure, Mrs. Abigail, who was a very shrewd gentlewoman, soon found out the bent of her lady's mind; she, unbidden, related anecdotes of Mr. Meredith, his goodness, his charities, his self-denials. "We servants, madam, think he is an angel who has fallen among us;" and the tears stood in the woman's eyes. Amarynth would hear this till she could bear no more; she would send her maid away, and, burying her face among the cushions of a couch, sob her heart out. Oh, child, grieving for thy neglected and disdained toy! who can relieve or pity thee?

But one day she was startled by a request from her husband—how she loved that word now, and would roll it over her tongue, and mutter it, as something precious and consoling—to have a private audience. Mrs. Abigail brought the message—she had been weeping. "What is the matter?" said her mistress, a thousand fond fears fluttering at her breast. "The poor gentleman—my dear master—looks so ill—fear—die;" and Mrs. Abigail burst into a very Niagara of tears. Amarynth wept for sympathy. "Let him come," she said, "directly." O Heaven, he was altered! and yet there was an unwonted pride in his whole bearing. She felt, rich woman and beauty as she was, her inferiority. "Madam," he said, strongly but sternly agitated, "I have come to—to ask a favor, and to make a confession." She started. "Though I loved you long, long ere you took me, a poor wretch from the streets; yet my love is no longer to be borne. If I stay here, I must go mad or die. Oh, madam, that contract!—think you I would have signed it, but for the poor mother who bore me, and who was perishing in my sight when you raised me from the depths of poverty? Forgive my love; I can not help it. I have come to request you will do me one parting favor—purchase me a commission. I would be a soldier, madam; my father was one." She looked at him; she never inquired if he had had a father even. "Yes!" he pursued; "a brave, though a poor one; but I came not to trouble you with my family remembrances. I can live, madam, on my pay; your allowance I request permission to relinquish." "Wherefore?" Thus much, though choked, she contrived to say. "I can not longer subsist on your bounty. I have made much progress, madam, of late. Your wit and accomplishments stimulated me. I can not vie with your learning; but now I may pass unnoticed for ignorance. Forgive me, madam, and sometimes deign to cast a thought on him who adores you, silent and hopeless." Oh, how she longed to cast herself at his feet, to own her deep, her unalterable love—to bid him live for her—to the freeing thought of her oath—bring perjury on both their souls! Horror! She could not speak;

he mistook her silence for anger, and drooped his head. "Go," she murmured; "I will write to you." He said no more, and withdrew. The commission was purchased, and sent him with this note:

"Your wish is accomplished, but I beseech you retain the income, which you have a legal right to. I need not say be brave; but bravery exists when human hope perishes. Happy are you in the sex which gives you that resource.

"AMARYNTH."

He departed the day after he received this. Here is his final farewell:

"Madam—Ask me not to comply with your request, lest, it being yours, I weakly acquiesce. A legal right? Let me trample on that, as I have on dearer rights which the law itself bestowed on me, when I became your husband. Fear not, madam, my oath is inviolate.

"MEREDITH."

Oh! bitterness of bondage, in which the next two years passed by. She heard of him, though. In 1780 a war commenced against Holland. Paul signalized himself; he gained the most rapid promotion. At last she saw him gazetted—a colonelcy. Alas! what cause was there for exultation. Now he was free of her—independent. She had long since discontinued to go out into public. She felt daily growing weaker. At last the thought occurred that if she died, some one must inherit her wealth. Strange not to have thought of it before. She sent for Mr. Jeffries, and communicating to him her love and wretchedness, conjured him to make her will. The old lawyer asked many questions; he seemed actually to gloat over Mrs. Meredith's distress. "He is coming home," he said, "I saw the arrival of the transport announced."

"Home! what home had he?" she bitterly asked. "At any rate he might be in time to see her die."

"Pooh! pooh!" said Mr. Jeffries, in the most unfeeling manner; "you'll live long enough, I warrant, to make the man's heart ache worse than it does now."

Ten days after that will was made, Mr. Jeffries drove up to Amarynth's door. An officer was with him. The servants crowded round, for they had recognized their master. They entered the library; Amarynth started up. She, too, knew that beloved face, brown though it was, and scarred on the brow with a soldier's trophy. Oath, or no oath, her impulse was obeyed; her arms were round his neck; her tears wetted his manly cheeks; she called him—husband.

He pressed her to his heart; words failed them both, they were awakening after that indulgence of suppressed love, to the fatal knowledge of the vow which intervened between them.

"One farewell," cried Paul, "and I go."

"Fiddlestick!" said Mr. Jeffries, flinging his brown tie right into the middle of the floor, and capering about with a shiny bald head. "I, stupid prosy old lawyer though I be, foresaw this hour when I was manufacturing that rigmarole of a deed. You heard me read it once; hear it again. I just introduced a clause which will set all to rights." The oath was registered with a saving clause, that if both parties mutually agreed to hereafter renounce the conditions of the deed, and become man and wife actually, instead of a mere legal fiction, the said agreement was, by mutual consent, to be null and void.

Poor Mr. Jeffries, he was not heard to the end of his preamble. Locked in each other's arms, Paul and Amarynth, now lavishing on one another the dear titles of wife and husband, forgot any presence but their own, and, midst mutual forgiveness and confessions, and utterance of affection, Mr. Jeffries, quietly picking up his periwig, went down to announce to the assembled servants that their lady desired them to drink the colonel's health in a gallon bowl of punch.

It would have done you good to have heard the shout. They heard it not. Wrapped in one another's happiness, they asked none from the outer world. Theirs existed in their own exquisite contentment.

I have no more to relate. I have trespassed on my readers' patience too much as it is. They have long since been dust and ashes, but the son of their son, Paul Meredith, Esq., lives on his own estate in —shire, and perpetuates the virtues, the noble simplicity, the unostentatious charities of his progenitor.

MY SON, SIR!

WHEN first I laid eyes on James Caracole, Junior, he was veiled in a mist of the finest and whitest lace. Vapor seemed to have taken a pattern on purpose to enfold him; in a word, he was in his swaddling clothes. On that memorable occasion I bestowed upon him, in my sponsorial capacity, his name of James, adding thereto the more substantial gift of a richly-chased goblet of silver gilt, with his initials elaborately engraved on the bowl. Though it was the custom, and came in the common course of things, I often thought afterward that there was something fatally symbolical in this present of mine to my godson. A foreshadowing, as it were, of those twin cups which he was doomed to quaff to the very dregs—the cup of luxury and the cup of woe.

James Caracole, Junior, entered the world under the most favorable auspices. Life first shone upon him through lace curtains. His inert form first reposed in down and scented linen, and his earliest fall in life went no further than a velvet carpet of flowery design. He breathed the air of Fifth Avenue, and with it all the luxurious tastes secretly held in solution in the atmosphere of that enchanted region. He knew what it was to whirl through the town in a resplendent coach long before he was able to use the means of locomotion that nature had bestowed on him. He had ostrich plumes waving above his head at a time when his hairs could have been counted, and the story went—I know not with how much truth—that a French cook had been hired to make his pap.

The father of James Caracole, Junior—I allude to the gentleman thus because this paternity was his only distinction in life—was a merchant of fortune and repute. He had come up, years upon years ago, to the metropolis a poor friendless boy. Ran of errands in a wholesale store for a couple of years. Got promoted to a clerkship. Scraped money together, and then set up for himself in some extraordinary business or other—making the elastic insertions for ladies' boots, I think it was—and when his hair began to turn, had, by dint of boldness, perseverance, and good luck, made about a half a million of dollars. He then thought it was time to marry; but alas, he whose days had been spent in totting up columns of figures and raising moneys to meet notes, knew nothing of the art of wooing. Civilization, however, is prepared for all emergencies, and Mr. Peter Caracole found out very soon that a man with a half a million would find but little difficulty in purchasing a partner for life. In consideration, therefore, of a house in Fifth Avenue, two carriages, a place on the Hudson, and unlimited credit at Madame Larami's, Miss Agnes de Belus, with the consent of her parents—of her own, the less that is said the better—became Mrs. Peter Caracole. People did say, to be sure, that the wedding was a sad one. That Agnes came to the altar with a haggard face, quivering lips, and a wild look in the eyes. They said, too, that in a far corner of the church, with as pale a countenance and as wild a glance as hers, young Adolphus Penniman might have been seen watching the ceremony. But however that might be, there was a grand reception, and the bridal victim was presented to a thousand friends, and after a month of ambiguous bliss, spent at Niagara Falls, Agnes de Belus settled down in Fifth Avenue as Mrs. Peter Caracole.

Independent of unhappiness, the result of this fashionable marriage was Mr. James Caracole, Junior, and for the first time for years, Mrs. Caracole found that there was something to live for besides diamonds at Tiffany's and balls in her "set." Not that she ceased to purchase bracelets, or to waltz with Count Colocotroni. Oh! no. But there was many an idle hour which mayhap might have been worse employed, that she spent beside the little cradle, when the pure glances from her child's eyes seemed for the moment to make her a better woman.

Mr. Peter Caracole was indeed very proud of his son. I shall never forget that memorable ball which was given to commemorate Master James's twelfth birth-day. On that occasion the young gentleman, who was attired in an exquisite costume of the time of Louis Quatorze, looking, indeed, quite wicked enough to have been a sucking Fouqué or Lauzun, made his first entrée into fashionable life. On that occasion, too, Mr. Peter Caracole, who at his own parties was invariably the most insignificant and unnoticed person in the rooms—on that occasion, I say, he rose into momentary dignity as he presented Master James to the guests, and his old chest was visibly inflated as he proudly added, "My son, Sir!" Poor man, I pitied him from the bottom of my heart, when later in the evening the young mousquetaire was found dead drunk in the conservatory, with his mother weeping over him, and Adolphus Penniman trying to force a restorative between the lad's lips!

From that time forward I occasionally met my godson, and not always in his father's house. He used to go to school in the day-time, but his evenings were his own, and for a boy of his age he had strange haunts. I myself being an old bachelor in search of character, and fancying that I am studying human life like a philosopher, esteem it a portion of my privilege to go every where, so in the course of my rambles I frequently stumbled over Mr. James Caracole in places where I certainly did not expect to see him. Among other things the boy persuaded his father to send him to a dancing academy, but as the choice of the establishment rested with himself, he pitched upon one that was situated down town, where he certainly learned to take steps not included in any modern choreographic manual. I have seen him there, night after night, with his handsome young face flushed with wine, a cigar stuck between lips that yet bloomed with the roses of sixteen, whirling round some professional dancing girl in a redowa waltz, with the ease and dexterity of a practiced man of society. There, in company with a knot of young fellows of his own age, he passed many and many a night smoking, and drinking, and talking—well, 'tis no matter what they talked about, it was sad enough to have heard it.

I used to see Adolphus Penniman there sometimes too, with what seemed to me a very melancholy expression upon his face. I thought at the time, and found it afterward to be correct, that he came to look after the boy for the sake of the mother, and indeed I could not doubt it, when I saw him mingling freely with that youthful set, and trying in his quiet way to keep the youngster straight. Poor Penniman, he must have loved her very dearly to have taken so much trouble about the son of the man she had married!

Not long after this, as I was sitting one day in my office, cogitating over the late fall in the Crambambuli stock, James Caracole walked in, and the moment he entered I detected from the shadow on his face that something was wrong.

"James," said I, in as kindly a tone as I could, for I loved the young fellow in spite of his follies, "sit down, my boy, and tell me all about it?"

"What! have you heard it, then? he said hurriedly, growing very pale.

"I have heard nothing, James. But I see from your face that something is the matter, so let me hear it now."

He gave a great sigh of relief, and his handsome young face seemed to brighten up a little as I said this.

"Well, Mr. Troy," said he, the truth of the matter is, that I'm very hard up, and I came to ask you to lend me a little money."

"James," I answered, "it's well that it's no worse; but still, it seems to me a serious matter for a youth of your age, for you are barely seventeen, if I remember rightly—"

"And four months, Sir," he interposed, eagerly. "Seventeen and four months, on my honor."

"Well," I continued, smiling at his anxiety about the odd months, "let it be seventeen and four months. Even then, it is an improper age to get into debt at."

"You see, Sir," said James, with a half-penitent look, "'twas that infernal Equinox Club that did it. The fellows there are all about my own age, and have lots of tin. I'm sure I don't know what has come over my governor lately; whenever I ask him for any money, he looks as black as the ace of spades, and says he hasn't got it."

"But how is the Equinox Club to blame in this matter?"

"Why, you see, Sir, that the fellows there don't care how high they play, and it won't do to allow one's self to be bluffed off, you know. So—so—the fact is, that—the other night Jack Coopay let me in for two hundred and fifty at eucure; and if I don't pay my play-debts, I shall be posted, there's the deuce of it:" and having bolted this confession out rather hurriedly, Master James fumbled in a side-pocket and pulled out some cigars, one of which he offered me, I presume to cover his confusion.

I am the worst lecturer that was ever created. I can not for the life of me sit down opposite to a man, and gravely assert by implication that I am a much superior fellow to him. I never had any talent for those portentous "hems!" with which the lecturer prefaces his admonitions. I feel no pleasure in morally pitching into a fellow, when I know he can't return it; and though I would often gladly give advice, why the fear that it will slide into that confounded lecturing generally deters me. So, instead of squaring my elbows, knitting my brows, and crushing poor James with a lot of maxims out of Poor Richard, I went quietly to my desk and filled up a check for the two hundred and fifty.

"Now, my boy," said I, as I gave it to James, "I'm not going to give you any advice, for I hope the pain you have suffered about this debt will teach you something; but I will tell you one thing, which, if it does not make you feel your folly deeply, you must have a harder heart than I can imagine. You had much better be as economical as you can for the present, and on no account ask your father for any money, because he spoke the truth. He hasn't got it to give you."

Poor boy, what a change came over his face as I said this! He grew pale as death, and took a step backward, as if struck by a sudden blow.

"Good God! Mr. Troy, you don't mean surely that—"

"I do, indeed, James. Of course you can keep the secret, when I tell you that your father is on the verge of ruin, and has been so for the last four months. He may stave it off for a year or a year and a half longer; but the crash is inevitable: so, my dear boy, I beseech you not to add to his misfortunes by any imprudence of yours."

He seemed truly affected, wrung my hand warmly, and pledged himself with tearful eyes to be careful for the future. I believe sincerely that he was honest in his intentions at the time, but I saw, as he passed my window, that his step was different from that with which he quitted my office; more buoyant and elated, and I sighed involuntarily—for I foresaw that the tide of youth would run strong, and then farewell to good resolutions.

I did not see James Caracole again for about a month, though in the mean time I had heard about him. He had of late been seen walking a good deal with little Emily Breda, a pretty little puss of a thing, with blue eyes, a profusion of fair shining curls, and the most innocent, winning smile in the world; and not long after my interview with Master James, I was informed that they were engaged. 'Twas a good match, in point of means, for James, for Emily was wealthy—though I am quite sure that the boy loved her dearly—and her parents doubtless imagined that old Caracole's son was an excellent partie. I knew better.

Not long after I received this intelligence, I was walking up Broadway one night rather late, when who should I see standing on the steps of Harry Quatremain's gambling-house but James Caracole. His face was flushed even in the pale moonlight, and he was laughing loudly. He saw that I had perceived him, and came down of his own accord to speak to me.

"James! James!" I said, reproachfully; "is this the way you keep your promises? Shame upon you!"

"Now, don't scold me, Mr. Troy!" he cried, with one of his bright, winning looks. "See here!"—and diving into his pocket, he pulled out a huge roll of bank bills. "There! I've won all that. You never saw such luck. I went in with only fifty dollars, and I've got two thousand here. By the way, you must let me pay you that two hundred and fifty you lent me, and give you a thousand thanks at the same time."

"Not now, James; not now!" I answered, putting back the notes that he pressed so earnestly on me; "I would rather wait until you have earned the money in some other manner."

"Why, hang it!" he exclaimed, in a tone of surprise, "it's all fair! I've got a right to win Quatremain's money if I can. He does his best to win mine; and he has won a good deal of it before this," he added, in a gloomy tone.

"My dear boy," said I, earnestly, taking his arm and making him walk along with me, can't you see your danger? Where is the use of your winning a few thousands at faro, when you are certain to lose it all back again, and the chances are, a good deal more with it. You must know that in the long-run all the chances are in favor of the bank, otherwise how should gambling-houses thrive?"

"Oh! I know all that," he cried, with a joyous smile; "but I'm not such a fool as to try my luck again—at least until I can well afford to lose. You won't catch me at Quatremain's again for a long time I warrant you."

"I hope not, sincerely, James. It isn't the place for a young fellow situated as you are now."

"Ah! you have heard of my engagement, then?" he exclaimed, catching me by the hand and stopping. "Oh! Mr. Troy, Emily is the sweetest creature in the world! By heaven!" he continued, almost fiercely, "I would drown myself if I thought I could not make her happy!"

"It is in your own power to do so, James," I answered; "and remember, every thing depends on yourself. Your father may be ruined almost any day; then, if you really love Emily, you will try and establish yourself in some independent position before the crash comes."

"I am going to do so, Sir; indeed I am! I am going, as junior partner, into a business firm down-town; and it won't be my fault if I don't succeed."

"Energy and determination are all that you want, James, and resolution enough to keep out of such places as Harry Quatremain's."

"Never fear, Sir, you shall see me do it. But," he continued, breaking suddenly into his light, joyous tone, "there are some fellows yonder who are waiting for me to go to supper. Come with us, Mr. Troy, and we'll have a jolly time."

"It's too late, James; I must go home."

"Too late! why, it's only half past one. Nonsense! come along. They're capital fellows; and young Laissez Aller, who sings such a capital song, is there. I know you'll enjoy it, if you'll only come!"

It went against my heart to resist the young fellow's hearty invitation, for I confess I should have liked dearly to have had a pleasant carouse with so young and joyous a party; but I felt that I ought not to countenance the lad's dissipation, so I sternly refused. But I stood listening as James went along singing snatches from Lucrezia; and, as the party moved off to their rendezvous, I thought I saw Adolphus Penniman coming out of Quatremain's. Could it be that he was watching over the lad still?

From this time out, whenever I saw James Caracole, he was with Emily Breda. They were very soon to be married, and both looked very much in love, and very happy. They made as pretty a couple as could be seen sauntering down Broadway at three o'clock in the afternoon. Emily, on the strength of the engagement, had taken to leaning on James when they walked together; and she used to hang on his arm in such a bewitching way, and look up in his face with such a sunny, cloudless smile, that I could not help envying the dog the happiness that seemed in store for him. There was, I knew well, a cloud looming in the distance; but I had sanguine hopes that the young people would be wedded and settled before it burst. Matters had been hastened—probably by old Caracole, who saw the coming crisis as well as I did—and, after the usual preliminaries, the wedding was fixed to come off in the course of the ensuing month.

Just then, in spite of his approaching happiness, James seemed to me to be restless and uneasy. At times, when I met him in the street, his face wore a haggard expression—as if he had been up all night before—and he came frequently to my office to borrow money, but never again opened his heart to me, as he had done on the first occasion. In one such interview I ventured to sound him as to what he had been doing; but his eye grew sullen, and he evinced such a disinclination to enter on the subject, that I cut the matter short, and gave him what he wanted. After this, I saw him no more at my office.

All my visions of the security of the Caracole family were one day shattered suddenly. I received a hurried, and almost incoherent note from Mr. Caracole, begging me to come to his house without delay. A terrible presentiment of some evil having happened to James took possession of me; so flinging myself into a cab, I drove as fast as I could, to No. —, Fifth Avenue. I found Caracole pacing up and down his study without a coat, and looking the picture of despair.

"My dear friend!" said he, in a low voice, as I entered, "this is a sad business!"

"What has happened?" I cried. "Any thing wrong with James?"—for my thoughts almost instinctively reverted to the poor boy.

"No, thank God!" he said, with a tone of as deep gratitude as his anguish permitted; "but my wife! my wife!" and hiding his face in his hands he sobbed aloud.

"Mrs. Caracole!" I exclaimed in amazement, "is she ill?"

"My old friend," the poor man said, taking my hand and pressing it convulsively, "my old friend, she—she has fled!"

"Fled! left you! with whom? with Penniman?" I exclaimed almost involuntarily, recollecting their old attachment.

"No, no; Penniman has acted like a noble fellow. I found a letter on her table from him, warning her against the villain, and conjuring her, for the sake of her husband and her son, not to take this fatal step, which, it seems, he foresaw. No, it was not Penniman; it was Count Colocotroni."

He appeared utterly prostrated. I did not offer any consolation to him beyond alluding casually, now and then, to his son. Whenever

I mentioned his name, however, his face lighted up, and he seemed for a moment to forget his shame. He was now evidently his only hope on earth!

"Ah!" said he, "there's James, too. The blight will be over him, also! Misfortunes never come single, my friend. You know how long I have been endeavoring to stave off this inevitable failure of our house, simply for his sake. I was in hopes that he would have been happily married to Emily before ruin came upon us. But God has not willed it so," he continued, humbly; "to-morrow our paper will be protested, and all will be known. Then, of course, Emily's family will break off the match. My failure would have been sufficient, doubtless, to induce them to do so, if it came alone; but this additional disgrace heaped upon us by his mother renders all hope vain."

Just here, James came in, in a state of frantic excitement, followed by Adolphus Penniman. He had but just heard of the sad business, and was foaming with rage. He was going off that instant, he said, in search of the fugitives, and would never return until he had avenged the dishonor of the family. This we endeavored to dissuade him from, and Penniman, who appeared to have more influence over him than any one else, showed him that the best and wisest course to pursue was to let the matter rest forever. Even if he succeeded in inducing his mother to forsake the Count, which was highly improbable, where could she go? Society was closed against her forever, and her husband could not consent again to shield her with a name that she had dishonored.

"Let her go in peace," said Penniman, "and pray that Heaven be merciful to her for her fault."

After a time James calmed down, and Penniman and I left them—the grief of a father and son, mourning over a desolated hearth, seemed too sacred for us to invade it.

Well, the smash came next day. Caracole failed. There were nine days of wonder in Wall Street. The money articles of the various papers chronicled the break up, and then came Timmins's railway fraud on the tenth day, entirely swallowing up the recollection that such a merchant as Caracole ever existed.

But I did not forget it. For I had before me that pale, haggard face of poor James Caracole as he came up one evening to my house to tell me that his heart was broken. Of course I knew why. The Breda's had broken off the engagement, and Emily had been sent to Europe for a year. Poor, poor boy, how he must have suffered! His young cheeks were drawn down, and the roses had faded from his young lips. His hand shook, and that luxuriant curling hair, on which I used to look with such wonder and admiration when I had viewed my own bald pate in the glass, now hung matted and unkempt across his forehead. His dress was slovenly, too, he who used to be the admiration of tailors, and had driven half his companions to despair. I didn't wonder at it at all, for he told me himself that between his unhappy love, and his mother's elopement, and his father's failure, he was nearly desperate. I have no doubt but he was, for when he shook my hand in going away his breath smelled strongly of brandy, and I shuddered as I thought what a spectacle his youthful beauty might be reduced to in a few years. I suggested a variety of schemes for his advancement, but he scoffed at them all. He had nothing now to live for, he said, and did not care what became of him. I never saw such utter recklessness in any human being.

Well, the end was not long coming, though would to God I could by any sacrifice on my part have averted so terrible a dénouement.

Of course things were now changed with old Caracole. The old house in Fifth Avenue had to be given up, and the once wealthy merchant was living in a boarding-house. Living meanly enough too, for it seemed that the suddenness and number of his misfortunes had paralyzed all his energies, and his only occupation was to moan all day long over his abandonment by wife and child. It was too true, that his last stay in life had deserted him, not nominally because they lived together, but in truth, for James Caracole rarely if ever saw his father now. His life was spent at hotels, in clubs, and in gambling-houses, and many a time coming up Broadway, I heard his voice, thick with drunkenness, shouting hoarse songs through the silent streets.

One night late, just as I was about retiring to bed, I received a strange scrawl from old Caracole, entreating of me to meet him at the — Ward Station-house. Of course I obeyed, thinking that poor James had got into some midnight row and required bail; so putting some money in my purse I hastened off.

The place was somewhere in First Avenue, and I had considerable difficulty in finding it; but as I approached its neighborhood, a small crowd, restlessly moving about a doorway, indicated the locale. I put a hurried question to a sleepy policeman as I entered, but he did not answer, and merely nodding, showed me into the guard-room. There were a half a dozen or so policemen in the room—some on benches, some whispering in groups. A man in his shirt-sleeves, with sleepy eyes, was seated at a desk in one corner, taking down what seemed to be the deposition of a rowdy-looking fellow; while in the centre of the floor a dark form lay stretched, and an old man with white hair crouched over it sobbing!

I understood it at a glance. Poor James Caracole had been killed. It was a drunken row, down somewhere near the East River, the policeman told me. James had insulted some men, received an insolent retort, and struck one of them. The next moment a knife was thrust into his side, and the assassin had escaped.

I went to the poor old father, and tried to raise him up. He recognized me, but would not stir, but still crouched over the body of his murdered son.

"Oh!" he moaned to me as I stooped down to talk to him, "Why did this happen? why did they not choose some one else? why did they kill my beautiful boy?"

I might have told him why it happened. That it had happened because he, in common with hundreds of others in this city, brought up his son improperly. Let him loose upon society when he ought to have been at school. Allowed him money for cigars, and, it may be, for worse vices, when he should have given him nothing but marbles. That it happened because he had devoted his whole soul to the accumulation of money; and so long as he made successful operations, did not care to examine into his son's habits or associates. That it happened because he had set the youth a vicious example of luxury and extravagance himself. That it had happened because he mocked at God's law, and fancied that his child's principles and intellect could be sooner matured than was allowed in the universal course of nature. I might have told him all this and a great deal more when he moaned out that sorrowful question to me as he crouched upon the ground, but I was silent, for I too loved the boy, and sorrowed for him bitterly.

At last the poor old man rose up. He cast a long, sad look upon the pale, bloodless face of the corpse. Then lifting one of the stiff arms, he let it fall gently, saying, with a wistful look at me,

"This was my son, Sir!"

THE SINGER'S DREAM.

ONCE upon a time, there lived in the Rheinland a peasant boy, of whose lawful name it concerns me not to know or tell, seeing that all men called him the Singer. And that was a fit name, inasmuch as the child was unlike other children; not for his sad eyes, or his long yellow hair, but that he, always and ever, from his cradle on, had sung instead of speaking.

If a child's pains touched him, a low, minor cadence parted his lips; if a child's joyfulness bubbled up in his heart, he uttered it in some buoyant song, that floated higher than the lark's and made the dullest day bright. He sung often in his sleep wonderful hymns of praise, and the church echoed, at all hours of prayer, with such pure anthems that many went to hear the Singer who had not entered there for priest or mass.

But as the child grew toward manhood he seemed not to become old—no childish pleasure lost its freshness to his soul; still he found treasures in the glitter and tint of stones; loved the inimitable grace and recognized the distinct personality of flowers; the birds he fed daily at the window, and paved the brook with round, white pebbles. Even Gyna, the child he best loved, shot up into gracious girlhood, and became a woman before his eyes, still he was an unconscious child; and when the girl—herself loving, but yet a woman—would have roused the man to life and action by some acute sting of jealousy, the Singer only looked at her with wistful surprise, and turned away sighing very softly.

In time came a sadder change—strange languors and inabilities unstrung his frame—work became impossible to him. The peasant's son could not labor, he could only sing, daily, indeed, more exquisite harmonies, but they made neither bread nor salt; and the housewife that was in his dead mother's place reviled the boy, because he ate without toil. Sometimes he ceased singing, and addressed himself to the vineyard, but with little use, for the feeble hands trembled and the eyes filled too readily for such care-taking work; and I know not but he would have starved, had not the laborers who heard him sing agreed among themselves to feed him, if he would beguile the tediousness of their tasks with his music.

So he lived; but these songs were irksome, and he grew daily wearier and weaker, till one day he begged of the housewife a loaf of brown bread, and with an earthen cup in one hand went away to find life in another place.

Long did the child journey silently on; some saw and loved his tender childlike face, and fed him, not with bread alone, but with gentle words and loving looks; others were rougher, but none cruel; and his songs became, through his open heart, sweet and clear as never before. Yet with all these grew daily a shadow in his eyes; some pain and longing stirred incessantly and ached about his heart; and those who watched his sleep saw his thin hands stretched toward the stars, and heard broken words of eager, awful sadness fall like dying prayers from his dream-singing.

Summer, winter, and spring passed over him as the winds over an air-harp; but they passed again and again without quenching the fire in his eyes, or stilling the heart-pain that consumed him. Life staid by him as a spectre haunts its forgetful dwelling; he neither desired or dreaded its shivering tenure, that still hung tremblingly above him. At last, one day, he strayed into the deep forest—trees closed archwise above his path; the honey-bees sung on either hand their labor-anthem; the red and yellow blossoms swung their gay bells to call the deluding butterflies; birds dropped from bough to bough, sliding on their own songs; winds whispered strange mysteries to the nodding branches; the very rocks bore up lovingly crowds of tiny moss-cups, jeweled with scarlet; and vines tangled their delicate sprays and blood-flushed tendrils with fond insufficiency over and around the leaning tree-trunks.

No creature feared the Singer: squirrels eyed him from their knotty perches with soft, shy looks; the panting hare forgot to leave her form; and the wild dove cooed marmurously from an oak-bough as he passed; while a fearless doe and her fawn, pausing at a limpid spring to drink, drooped their erect ears, and bent their graceful heads again to the bright water, sure of safety from him. Out of the marshy spots myriads of blue violets looked at him innocently, and quaint, brown blossoms, with curiously-scented golden anthers swayed back and forth graciously on their lithe stems. Here and there a scarlet fly gleamed swiftly in the pine branches, or a crested kingfisher dashed aslant the drooping elms; while, far overhead, seen through interlaced leaves, sailed a calm eagle, regnant and self-poised.

All these the Singer beheld with a new strength gathering in his frame; his chilly veins burned and leaped with unwonted fire; his sorrowful eyes shone light and peace; and a tender rose-glow seemed to glitter and quiver all about him, in whose soft transfiguration he to Nature, and Nature to him, renewed severally their primeval type.

Lingeringly he glided onward till the vaulted branches grew lower and thinner, and the trees dwindled about his way; presently he gained a bare rock on whose summit clung a hemlock tree, so crushed inward by the rare air of the extreme height as scarce to seem a tree. Weary and faint, yet with nerve and brain tense as the expectant cord of a bow, the Singer leaned his head against the evergreen boughs and listened. He had climbed far above the mixed voices of earth, and their hushed murmur only heightened the invisible pressure that seemed to bind a heavy crown about his temples and weigh down his eyelids. Eternal silence was around him; miles away the black forests slept on the mountain sides, sweeping up the gradual slopes, and falling back from the brink of fierce crags; below them green hills, silvered by the breezes that ran along them with aerial feet, or adorned with goodly orchards borne up on their broad shoulders, stood everlastingly quiet and strong; and at their feet lay the leveled meadows, through whose golden-green expanse stole blue rivers, muffling the liquid bells that they had tinkled down the rocks from their native springs, as a child hushes its baby mirth in the new repose of youth and love.

As the Singer sat watching the wide, expressive face of earth, an old sadness trembled on his lips and darkened in his eyes. Here and there, ever through his life, he had caught floating accords of sound, of color, and of thought, that haunted him like glimpses of another being, and spelled out dimly to his soul some vast system of harmonies that it became the gradual hope and vision of his existence to discover. But where should he find a teacher? who should note and utter for him the divine chords whose echo pursued him like a fate? Here the universe sent up its silent pulses to his lips with a thrilling vibration that no sound destroyed; and as he sat and mused with painful delight on the possibilities of creation, a wind arose in the deep valley, and creeping over mountain and crag, stirred the hemlock against whose rugged boughs he leaned; the light murmur stole, song-like, over his brain, and as a baby, lulled by the half-conscious singing of the happy mother-heart against which it rests, sleeps with a smile, so the Singer closed his eyes over their last tears, and with drooped head fell into a vague slumber.

Still to himself he seemed awake, and gazing with wakeful earnestness at the heaps of pearl-white cloud that thronged the sky, above the furthest hill-tops, till, without a start or a glimmer of surprise, he saw them, one after another, take the shape of colossal angels, with serene glory on their brows, as if they saw the sun arising in strength, and with wings of such unearthly tints as never met the eye of man, or were named of his lips.

As the celestial creatures drew nearer, through the parting air, the Singer perceived that each clasped his arms over a harp of rough gold, strung for each with different gems. One flashed a diamond light: one was moonlit with pearls: another glowed in the hidden fire of mystic opals; and lucent rubies, cool emeralds, garnets of love-warm depth, clustered on the several strings of each seraphic instrument; and while gathering about the cliff whereon he sat, each drew from the folds of their trailing robes a written score, the Singer forgot the glory of their brows in the look of pale helplessness that seemed to seal their closed lips, and the piteous, trustful appeal that dimmed their searching eyes.

Some sixth sense lit his human soul; neither voice nor articulate sound peeled from angel to angel, but an emanation of meaning, like the mist a hidden river utters to the sun, interpreted the thoughts of those immortal essences to the perceptions of his mortal brain. He felt their intent gaze tremble through earth, and knew that each asked from Nature and each other the harmony of their several parts. One had the wandering resonances of air noted for the task of his diamonded strings; the countless sounds of inanimate earth—pathetic, languid, tranquil—were drawn out from the emerald chords; from the changeful embers of the opal came the heights and depths of human thought and feeling—now faint as dead ashes, now exultant as fire; plaintive water-sounds, waves that dash, weeping brooks, slow-rippling rivers, the drowsy fall of rain, the tiny laugh of boiling springs—these the pearls emitted from their gleaming rows; animate nature spoke imperative life from the warm garnets; light drew its shaded tones of color from the clear rubies. But though the seraphs, standing silently before the Singer, drew out with skillful hands the power of their several harps, they made angry discords with each other, or forced and monotonous unisons, that dimmed the brightness on their foreheads and wove a deeper shadow over their eyes, and the Singer knew, where it stood on their divine faces, the shadow of his own pain.

A few weak and hesitating notes only did the seraphs strike, and then, quieting their perplexed faces to patience, leaned on their harps and bent earthward.

Gradually the patience heightened into expectation, tremulous with joy; and, following the line of their irradiate eyes, the Singer saw, far below, the shape of a worn and solitary man climbing the mountain-side. Bent and sorrowful looked the classic head, with its fair waving locks; but the face he could not see. More and more earnest grew the expectant choir as up the painful steep the new-comer toiled; at length he stood among them, and with keen but submissive joy they gave into his hand the written scores they held, and waited breathlessly his voice: but there was no speech. Silently, in that silent choir, the man arranged the angelic harmony; and as he restored to each angel his part, and turned his face to the East, the Singer shuddered with an awful sweetness of recognition. The wan, noble face—the eyes of supernatural fire—the unstained forehead—the glittering hair—where had he seen them? But the seraph harps were strung; the vision looked adoringly heavenward; the birth-pang of a new life ran sharply through the sleeping Singer—he knew himself! and, borne upward on an unutterable harmony—full, resolute, triumphant—stronger than the gorgeous pinions of the six seraphs, he, the dominant seventh, ascended from earth to glory.

Beside his mortal garment stood Gyna, weary and weeping; faithfully her repentant longing had tracked his steps; and there he slept, not awake to greet her! She stooped, with shy tenderness, to awaken him with a kiss; but his calm lips chilled her to the soul. He was past Love, rapt into Immortality.

THE UNITED STATES.

CONGRESS met on the 4th of December, and the President's Message was communicated on the same day. Referring, at the outset, to the diminished crops and the visitations of pestilence which have marked the year, the President proceeds to say that, as a nation, we have been but slightly affected by the wars of Europe, and that it has been his earnest endeavor to maintain peace and friendly intercourse with all nations. Notwithstanding the course we have hitherto pursued of avoiding all entangling alliances, and our remoteness from Europe, some of its governments have manifested an increased disposition to influence, and in some respects direct, our Foreign policy. In plans for adjusting the balance of power among themselves, they have assumed to take us into account, and would constrain us to conform our conduct to their views; and one or another of them has from time to time undertaken to enforce arbitrary regulations, contrary, in many respects, to the established principles of international law. The United States, uniformly respecting and observing that law in their foreign intercourse, can not recognize any such interpolations therein as the temporary interests of others may suggest. Leaving the transatlantic nations to adjust their political system as they may think best, we may well assert the right to be exempt from all annoying interference on their part. Systematic abstinence from intimate political connection with distant foreign nations does not conflict with giving the widest range to our foreign commerce. The government of the United States stands prepared to repel invasion, and provides no permanent means of foreign aggression. The rapid expansion of our territory has been regarded with disquieting concern by some European powers, which ought not, considering their own conquests, to look with unfriendly sentiments upon the acquisitions of this country, which have been in every instance honorably obtained. Our foreign commerce has reached a magnitude nearly equal to that of England, and exceeding that of any other nation. Experience shows that when the principal powers of Europe are engaged in war the rights of neutral nations are endangered. This consideration has led at various times to the assertion of the principle that free ships make free goods; but it has never been generally recognized as a principle of international law. At the beginning of the present war Great Britain and France announced their purpose to observe it for the present—not as a recognized international right, but as a concession for the time being. This action on their part led our government to make a proposition for special conventions with the several powers of Europe, embracing the rule that free ships should make free goods; and also that neutral property, other than contraband, on board enemies' ships, should be exempt from confiscation. Russia acted promptly in the matter, and a convention was concluded between that country and the United States, providing for the observance of these principles, not only as between themselves, but also as between themselves and all other nations which shall enter into like stipulations. The King of the Two Sicilies has indicated his willingness to enter into such a convention. The King of Prussia entirely approves of the project of a treaty, but proposes an additional article, providing for the renunciation of privateering. This was declined by the United States, from obvious considerations. The navy of England is at least ten times as large as that of the United States. In case of war the latter, without the means of resort to its mercantile marine, would be at a great disadvantage; and in a war with any of the secondary naval powers, the greater extent of our commerce would expose us to equal danger. If the leading powers of Europe would agree in exempting private property from seizure upon the ocean by armed cruisers as well as by privateers, the United States would readily meet them upon that ground.—The Reciprocity Treaty with Great Britain has gone into effect. There is a difference of opinion between the two governments as to the boundary line of Washington Territory; the President recommends the appointment of a Commission for its adjustment. He advises also the extinguishment, upon just terms, of certain rights guaranteed by the treaty of 1846 to the Hudson's Bay Company, embracing the right to navigate the Columbia river, which have already led to serious disputes. Difficulties have recently arisen with France, which, though they threatened to be serious, have been satisfactorily adjusted. M. Soult, our Minister to Spain, was recently excluded from France by order of the government; but as subsequent explanations show that it was not the right of transit, but only the right of residence that was denied him, he has since passed through France to his post at Madrid. Our relations with Spain have suffered no change. Since the revolution in that country no favorable opportunity has been presented for the adjustment of the serious questions between Spain and the United States; there is reason to believe that the new Ministry is more disposed than the old one was to concede our just demands. Negotiations are pending with Denmark to discontinue the practice of levying tolls on our vessels and their cargoes passing through the Sound. The practice is sanctioned not by international law but by special treaty; the President recommends the discontinuance of the treaty by which we have recognized the right. A treaty for commerce and navigation has been concluded with Japan, and only awaits the exchange of ratifications to be effective. Numerous claims upon Mexico for wrongs and injuries to our citizens remain unadjusted, in spite of all our endeavors to secure a favorable consideration for them. Our government has done all in its power to prevent aggressions upon Mexico, though it has not fully succeeded in every case. By treaties with the Argentine Confederation we have secured the free navigation of the La Plata and some of its larger tributaries; negotiations, hitherto unsuccessful, are still pending with Brazil, for the free navigation of the Amazon. Misunderstandings have arisen with Great Britain concerning the provisions of the treaty of 1850 in regard to Central America; our Minister in London is pressing negotiations to bring them to a close. The President vindicates the destruction of Greytown by the sloop of war Cyane, on the ground that its inhabitants had been guilty of flagrant outrages upon the rights and property of Americans, and that there was no recognized authority to which we could look for redress. The transaction has been the subject of complaint on the part of some foreign powers, and has been characterized with more of harshness than of justice. The President thinks it would not be hard to find repeated instances in the history of other states, which would fully justify the chastisement of Greytown.—Passing from foreign to domestic affairs, the financial condition of the country first engages attention. At the end of last year there was a balance in the Treasury of $21,942,892; the receipts of the year have been $78,549,705—making the total of available resources $96,492,597. The expenditures of the year have been $51,018,249; the payments on the public debt have reached $24,336,880; and there is a balance in the Treasury of $20,187,967. The public debt remaining unpaid is $44,975,456, redeemable at different periods within fourteen years. As it is quite certain that the revenue of the next year, though probably less than that of last, will still be greater than the expenditures, a reduction of duties upon imports is recommended. Further legislation is needed for the security of government papers and account-books, which in some cases are claimed by government officers as their own private property. An increase of the military force to be employed in the Indian territory is recommended as imperatively necessary; four new regiments, two of infantry and two of mounted men, it is believed will be sufficient. A revision of the laws concerning the organization of the army is also recommended. An increase of the naval force is also required, for the defense of our coast and the protection of our commerce. Further legislation is also urged for the government and discipline of our commercial marine, with a view to greater security, and also for the punishment of insubordination, cowardice, or other misconduct, on the part of officers and mariners, producing injury or death to passengers on the high seas.—In the Post-office Department the expenditures of the year amount to $8,710,907; the receipts being $6,955,586—showing a deficiency of $1,755,321—which, however, is $361,756 less than the deficiency of the year before. The revenue has increased $970,399. No increase is anticipated for the coming year. The cost of mail transportation has been $495,074 greater this year than it was the year before.—The number of acres of the public lands sold during the year was 7,085,735, for which $9,285,583 was received. The whole quantity surveyed was 11,070,935 acres, and 8,190,017 acres have been brought into market. The President renews suggestions previously made concerning donations of lands to aid in the construction of railroads, the policy of internal improvements, and the need of reorganizing the judicial system of the United States.

The Report of the Hon. James Guthrie, the Secretary of the Treasury, sets forth the detailed receipts and expenditures of the year, the aggregates of which are given in the President's Message, and presents estimates of the receipts and expenditures for the next year. The receipts from customs have not fallen off from the pressure in the money market, as it was feared they would; the increased exportations, and a more uniform and better valuation of goods, are assigned as the reasons for this result. The Reciprocity Treaty with Great Britain, which introduces free trade with the British colonies, and the short crop, will diminish the receipts from customs for the remainder of the present year. There has been an increase of 895,892 tons in the tonnage of our foreign and coastwise commerce during the year. The imports are $26,821,817 in excess over our exports—the latter including $38,000,000 of specie and bullion. The Secretary recommends a reduction of the revenue from customs, in accordance with the recommendation of last year—which proposed having only five schedules of duty; the first of 100, the second of 20, the third of 15, the fourth of 10, and the fifth of 5 per cent.; and also to extend the free list very considerably. He proposes to remove the duty from the raw materials used in several articles of manufactures, as is already done by other countries. There has been, during the year, a large increase of articles of domestic manufacture, and it is believed that this increase during the coming year will be still greater. The revenue from duties on articles which are to be admitted free of duty by the Reciprocity Treaty was $1,524,457; so that the revenue will be diminished to that extent. A repeal of the fishing bounties is recommended.—The system of monthly settlements with the Collectors of Customs has been carried out, except on the Pacific, and has been found to work well. The condition of the various offices subordinate to the Treasury department is very satisfactory. There has been $16,152,170 of silver coined during the year, and furnished for circulation; but the full benefits of the silver coinage can not be realized while small bank notes are encouraged under bank charters, and made current by the patronage of the community. The amount of gold and silver coin in the country is estimated at $241,000,000; of which, $80,000,000 is in the banks, $20,000,000 in the independent treasury, and the rest in circulation.

It is in the power of the States, by prohibiting the banks from issuing small notes for circulation, and by making the specie currency the basis of their own receipts and expenditures, to give the predominance to specie. The disorder now felt in money matters is attributed by the Secretary to the failure of many banks, to the large imports, and to the want of confidence between the borrower and the lender: he says it can not properly be attributed to the shipment of gold and silver, which is only a consequence of the other causes. The work on the Coast Survey makes good progress, and if supported a few years longer by Congress, will give us a complete knowledge of our coast and harbors, to the great advantage of commerce. Further action is recommended in order to provide the means of rescuing human life, in case of shipwreck, along our coast. The Secretary recommends additional provision for the public welfare upon several points of minor interest, to which it is not important to make more specific reference in this place.

The Report of Jefferson Davis, Secretary of War, states the authorized strength of the army at 14,216 officers and men, while its actual strength is only 10,745. This difference is gradually disappearing under the operation of the law to encourage enlistments by increasing the pay. But little success has attended the efforts to remove the Indians from the Southern part of Florida, in accordance with their treaty stipulations: more vigorous efforts are in progress, which promise better results. In the other departments the Indians have repeatedly come into collision with our troops, and depredations upon frontier residents and upon emigrants are of frequent occurrence. In the West hostilities have occurred with the Sioux, the most powerful and warlike tribe of the West. In Texas the aid of volunteers has been frequently invoked. In New Mexico serious hostilities have been repressed by the prompt and energetic action of the troops employed there; but depredations upon the inhabitants are still of frequent occurrence, and in the department of the Pacific outrages of the most revolting character have been perpetrated upon families of emigrants to California and Oregon. The troops have been actively engaged in the effort to punish these aggressions. On the 16th of August, Lieutenant Grattan, of the Sixth Infantry, was sent with thirty men, by the Commander of Fort Laramie, to punish a band of the Sioux from which emigrants to the Pacific had suffered very severely. The entire detachment was massacred by about 1500 Indians, who formed and executed a deliberate plan for that purpose. It has not hitherto been found possible to concentrate the troops sufficiently to prevent these outrages without too great an exposure of the frontier settlements. Our entire loss, in the several actions with the Indians during the year, has been four officers and sixty-three men killed, and four officers and forty-two men wounded. For military purposes, the territory of the United States is divided into five commands: (1.) The Department of the East, embracing the whole country east of the Mississippi, having 2800 miles of seaboard, 1800 miles of foreign, and 200 miles of Indian frontier, has only eleven of its fifty garrisons furnished with men—leaving the remainder exposed to attack from any naval power. The total force in this department is 1574 officers and men, of which 500 are employed on the Indian frontier of Florida. (2.) The Department of the West, including all the country between the Mississippi and the Rocky Mountains, has a seaboard foreign and Indian frontier of 2400 miles, 2000 miles of routes traversed by emigrants, and an Indian population of 180,000, a large portion of which are hostile to us: the force in this department is 1855 officers and men. (3.) The Department of Texas, with a seaboard of 400 miles, a foreign and Indian frontier of nearly 2000, communications of 1200 miles through an Indian population of 80,000, has a force of 2886. (4.) The Department of New Mexico has an Indian and foreign frontier of 1500 miles, Indian communications of over 1000, an Indian population of 50,000, and a military force of 1654. (5.) The Department of the Pacific has a seaboard frontier of over 1500 miles, an Indian frontier of 1600, more than 2000 miles of communication through an Indian country, an Indian population of 184,000, who are becoming formidable from concentration, a knowledge of fire-arms, and experience in their use, and a military force of only 1805 officers and men. The Secretary urges that this force in the several departments is entirely inadequate to the service required of it, and recommends such an increase as shall give greater security to our frontiers against Indian hostilities. The extension of our boundaries into the Indian territories, renders it quite likely that the ensuing years will be marked by still more numerous and more serious outrages than have been experienced hitherto. The Secretary insists that it is much more economical to maintain a regular army sufficient to suppress these outrages, than to rely upon militia force. During the past twenty-two years over thirty millions of dollars have been expended in the repression of Indian hostilities, to say nothing of the immense sums lost by the destruction of private property, etc. Much of this might have been saved, if the regular force had been sufficient to prevent the outbreaks which it was afterward necessary to suppress. The estimates for the support of the army during the coming year are $681,688 more than those of the last year. This increase is caused by the law of last session fixing higher rates of payment for the rank and file of the army. An increase in the pay of officers is also recommended; the present rates having been fixed more than forty years ago, when money had a much higher value as compared with the price of food. Additional legislation is needed to settle questions of rank, to equalize the rates of payment, and to remedy other inconveniences in the department. Among other amendments it is proposed to give effect to brevet rank only when the President may see fit to authorize it. The organization of the staff is discussed at length, and a new system is recommended. It is proposed that there shall be nine Brigadier-Generals, instead of five, as at present, so that there may be one for each of the five departments, one for Quartermaster-General, one for Adjutant-General, and two for Inspectors-General. Various details are suggested in reference to the other departments, as well as to various branches of the general service. Improvements of an important character have been made in the academy at West Point, and experiments continue to be made to test the utility of various new inventions in fire-arms. The survey of the northern and northwestern lakes has made steady progress, and steps have been taken to secure the construction of roads in our new territories authorized by law.

The Report of Mr. Campbell, the Postmaster-

General, states that the number of post-offices in the United States on the 1st of December was 28,925; and the total annual transportation of the mails was 63,387,005, at a cost of $4,630,676. As compared with the service of the preceding year, there was an increase of 1,494,463 miles, or two and a half per cent. in service, and of $184,708 in cost, or about three per cent. The increase of railroad service is nineteen per cent. in transportation, and not quite one per cent. in cost: in steamboat service there has been a reduction of 15½ per cent., at a reduced cost of 29 7-10 per cent. Great difficulty is still experienced in fixing the rates of compensation for mail service on railroads, and Mr. Campbell expresses the opinion that more is now paid for that service than it is worth. The expenditures of the department for the year have been $8,577,424, of which $5,401,382 was for transportation of the mails, and $1,707,708 compensation to postmasters. The gross revenue of the department was $6,955,586, of which $3,277,110 was from letter postage, $2,146,476 from postage stamps sold, and $606,148 from newspapers. This shows a deficiency of $1,621,837, to which are to be added $133,483 for balances due to foreign offices, making the total deficiency for the year $1,755,321, which is $361,756 less than the deficiency of the previous year. The increase in the revenue of the department over the previous year is $970,399, principally in letter postage and the sale of postage stamps. The expenditures of next year are estimated at $9,841,921, and the receipts at $148,028 more. Special attention has been directed to the loss of letters containing money, which is already very great, and seems to be increasing. In order to secure greater safety, the Postmaster-General recommends the adoption of a system of registration, by which a receipt shall be given for any letter containing money, and its address registered at the office from which it is sent. By this means a missing letter can always be traced. The expense of such a system will be considerable, and it is proposed to meet it by an extra charge of five cents for registration, and that postage on all registered letters be prepaid. It is not proposed to make the registration of valuable letters compulsory, nor to make the department liable for their contents. The cost of the mail service for the last year on the several United States mail steamship lines has been as follows—

| New York to Liverpool, Collins's Line, 26 trips. | $358,000 |
| New York to Bremen, 11 trips. | 183,333 |

The Postmaster-General makes a variety of recommendations in regard to the several branches of this service.

The Report of Mr. Dobbin, the Secretary of the Navy, gives an account of the operations of the various vessels belonging to the service during the year. The Home Squadron has cruised principally among the West India islands and along the coasts of the Caribbean Sea and the Gulf of Mexico. Lieutenant Strain, after a perilous and difficult survey of the proposed route for a ship canal across the Isthmus of Darien, has reported it to be impracticable. The Brazil Squadron has been efficiently engaged in protecting our interests in that quarter. The African Squadron has been occupied in taking measures to check the African slave trade. The Mediterranean Squadron has been efficient in protecting American interests there. The East India Squadron has had frequent calls upon it for the protection of American interests in consequence of the civil war in China. A treaty has been concluded with Japan, by which two ports are opened to foreign vessels, and shipwrecked American mariners are guaranteed protection and kind treatment.—The Secretary is earnestly in favor of increasing the Navy. Even with the addition of the six steam frigates in process of construction, our naval force will not exceed fifty vessels in condition for service. He enforces his views in favor of an increase at considerable length—urging that the money spent in building ships will be expended among our own mechanics, and that we ought to have the material of a Navy sufficient for all emergencies. The six frigates authorized by law are to be constructed in the navy yards at Boston, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Washington, and Norfolk—five of them by private contract. The Secretary renews his recommendation of a retired list, on reduced pay, for faithful officers who have become infirm—the discharge of the inefficient who have no claim on the government for services rendered—promotion regulated by capacity and merit, and not solely by seniority—and pay, to some extent controlled by sea service. He urges a better discipline in the service, not by restoring flogging—which he does not think desirable—but by a system of rewards for merit and of punishment by confinement, etc. He intends to adopt the apprentice system, for the introduction of a better class of seamen into the service. We have eight navy yards besides the one in process of construction in California. The yard at Memphis has been surrendered to the city, and abandoned by the Government. The Naval Academy is prosperous and efficient. The Naval Observatory demonstrates constantly the utility of its establishment. Lieutenant Maury's efforts are highly commended. The estimates for the Navy during the next year are $16,241,931; the total expenditures of the past year have been $10,801,845.

Various other documents accompanied the President's Message, of which it is not necessary to make special mention in this Record. The proceedings of Congress thus far have been merely formal.

The election for State officers in New York, which took place on the 7th of November, resulted in the success of the Whig ticket, and in the choice of 82 Whigs out of 128 Members of the Assembly. The aggregate vote for State officers was as follows:

| Governor. | | Lieutenant-Governor. | |
|---------------------|---------|-------------------------|---------|
| Clark. | 156,804 | Raymond. | 157,166 |
| Seymour. | 156,495 | Ludlow. | 128,633 |
| Ulmann. | 122,282 | Scroggs. | 121,057 |
| Bronson. | 33,850 | Ford. | 42,074 |
| Canal Commissioner. | | State Prison Inspector. | |
| Fitzhugh. | 161,006 | Bowne. | 153,467 |
| Clark. | 125,210 | Andrews. | 124,735 |
| Williams. | 58,244 | Saunders. | 120,747 |
| Burnham. | 118,968 | Vernam. | 41,978 |

From California we have intelligence to the 16th of November. Various projects for works of internal improvement were actively canvassed.—Colonel Devereux J. Woodlief was killed on the 8th in a duel with Achilles Kewen. The difficulty grew out of a casual conversation, in which the latter was wrong, and the former obstinate in refusing an explanation. They fought with rifles, and Woodlief was killed at the first fire.—The recently arrived overland emigrants report farther difficulties with the Indians, who have attacked several companies and destroyed a great deal of property with some lives.—The United States steam frigate Susquehanna arrived at San Francisco, on the 11th, from Hong Kong, having paid a visit on her way to Japan and the Sandwich Islands. The harbor of Simoda, which was thrown open to foreign commerce by the treaty with Commodore Perry, is represented to be small and much less convenient than was at first supposed. The surrounding country is highly cultivated, though but small supplies of provisions can be obtained at that port. The morals of the Japanese are represented as being in a low state.

From the Sandwich Islands we have information of the negotiation of a treaty of annexation between Mr. Gregg, the United States Commissioner, and the King of the Sandwich Islands. Its details are not yet known, but it is said to be extremely favorable to the United States. A pension is reported to have been provided by its terms for the members of the present Government, who will lose their positions by annexation. The English Consul, Mr. Miller, in a speech to the king, has made a very earnest and emphatic protest against annexation—representing that it would reduce the natives of the Islands to a state of slavery, and be ruinous to the morals of the country.

GREAT BRITAIN.

Public interest is painfully excited by the intelligence from the seat of war, and by the unexpectedly stubborn resistance of the Russians. Although in every engagement the Allies have been victorious, they have suffered very heavy losses, and the ability of the enemy for fresh resistance seems to have been but slightly impaired. The whole number of British troops originally sent to the Crimea was about 28,000; but the losses from war and disease have so reduced the numbers that on the 1st of November they did not exceed 15,500. The news of the wasting attacks of the Russians, of their constant supply of fresh troops from the interior, and of the speedy approach of winter, which would put an end to the active operations of the siege, had stimulated the British government to the greatest energy in sending reinforcements to the Crimea. Two of the Cunard line of steamers between Liverpool and New York had been withdrawn for that service, and other steamers were also in requisition. Recruiting was proceeding with all practicable rapidity, being stimulated by a large increase in the bounty. General enthusiasm in regard to the war continued to prevail. Mr. Bright, however, in spite of this, has published a letter condemning the war in the most emphatic language, declaring that it was caused by the needless interference of the English government in the dispute between Turkey and Russia, and by its culpable neglect to terminate the difficulty when the Czar accepted the Vienna note. That note was prepared by the friends of Turkey, who urged its acceptance on the Russian cabinet. It was accepted—but as some difficulty arose about its terms, Russia proposed that it should be explained by the arbitrators at Vienna. Turkey, however, for whom England was acting, rejected it; and then England also abandoned it, and suffered herself to be dragged into war. Mr. Bright thus throws upon England the whole responsibility for a war which he pronounces highly criminal and injurious to the interests of the country. The letter is very severely criticised, as unsound in argument and unpatriotic in its influence. Parliament had been summoned to meet on the 12th of December. The business to be submitted is said to be a proposition permitting the militia to be sent out for colonial service, in order to permit sending larger reinforcements of regulars to the seat of war. The financial embarrassments of the war will of necessity engage attention.

THE CONTINENT.

In Germany negotiations are said to have been resumed, with a view either to the restoration of peace, or to render it necessary for Austria and Prussia to take some decided part in the prosecution of the war. It is stated that Prussia has declared her willingness to present in the German Diet, for its action, a motion embracing the following points: 1. The German Diet, in accord with Austria and Prussia, recognizes the four points of the Vienna note as the basis of the future treaty of peace. 2. The Germanic Confederation approves the occupation of the Danubian Principalities by the Austrian troops. 3. After the four conditions have been accepted by Russia, Austria will make no other demands on that power. 4. Austria shall pledge herself not to take any further steps in the Eastern question, without having previously come to an agreement on the subject with Prussia and the Federation. 5. Austria, Prussia, and the Confederation shall address a collective summons to Russia, on the subject of the four conditions. 6. Should Russia not reply favorably to this summons, the military Committee of the Diet will immediately take all necessary measures to put the contingents of the Federal States on a war footing. 7. All future resolutions respecting the Eastern question shall be taken by the Diet. 8. Prussia and the Diet declare that they will give Austria their full support in her own territories, and in the Principalities, if she should be exposed to an attack from Russia. The result of this offer is not accurately known; but the probability was that it would be in substance accepted. The Russian ambassador at Vienna has also signified to the government the readiness of the Czar to negotiate for peace on the basis of the Vienna note. A Frankfort paper states that the French and English ministers had informed the Austrian secretary that the operations against Sebastopol would not be suspended, and that the Vienna note could no longer be recognized as a basis of negotiation.

In Sweden the King has obtained from the two Court Chambers a further grant of two and a half millions of dollars, demanded as a means of preserving neutrality. No definite explanations of the objects of the grant were made, but intimations were given that Sweden could not take ground against the Western Powers, and that any hostility must be toward Russia. In the House of Nobles the grant was carried by a vote of 122 to 19; in the House of Priests the vote was unanimous. In the House of Burghers there was considerable debate, and the vote stood 89 to 15.

In Spain a trial of party strength took place on the election of Provisional President of the Constituent Cortes. The candidate of the Moderate Progressistas was chosen, receiving 112 votes against 88 for the candidate of the Exaltados. The result created a dissension in the Cabinet, which led to the tender by General Espartero of his resignation.

In a speech to the Cortes he disavowed ambition of every kind, and said he should retire from the Ministry, leaving his colleagues in office. The Queen had declined to accept his resignation, so that at the latest dates the government remained unchanged. A good deal of disaffection is felt in political circles, but nothing at all threatening to the monarchy.

THE EASTERN WAR.

The war in the Crimea is still continued, but, up to the time of closing this Record, without any decisive result. After the battle of the Alma, narrated last month, the allied armies advanced toward Sebastopol; the Russians withdrawing in good order from the Alma, and being reinforced by a strong body of troops under General Liprandi. The Allies took possession of the port of Balaklava and the narrow road which connects it with Sebastopol, both being essential to the operations of the siege. The road ran through a gorge in the heights, which constituted the rear of the position which the English troops had taken up. Lord Raglan, the Commander-in-chief, had prepared the defense by placing heavy guns on the heights, and below them the 98d Highlanders, under Sir Colin Campbell, who barred the road leading to the village. A plain extended from the heights northward toward the Tchernaya, which was intersected by a low irregular ridge about two miles and a half from the village. This ridge was defended by four redoubts, which Turkish troops had been directed to hold in front of the centre of the English position. Prince Menschikoff sent General Liprandi to the Tchernaya with some 80,000 troops, to attack the Allies of this point; his object being to assail them in rear, to turn the right and seize Balaklava. In carrying out this plan General Liprandi, on the morning of the 25th of October, divided his forces and commenced the attack, part advancing by the military road, and the rest by the village of Kamara, in front of which the English had erected a strong defensive work. This, as well as the redoubts held by the Turks, was carried by the Russians, who then advanced their cavalry, which was rapidly followed and supported by artillery. The smaller portion of them assailed the front and right flank of the 98d, but were repulsed by a steady and well-directed fire. The larger mass went toward the British cavalry, which met them with a heavy charge, and effectually broke them up. The Russians, though repulsed, still retained the guns they had taken in the redoubts, and had re-formed upon their own ground, with artillery in front and on their flanks. Lord Raglan sent an order to the Earl of Lucan to advance and prevent the removal of the guns. The Earl understood the order to be a pre-emptory one to attack, and accordingly ordered the Earl of Cardigan to advance with the Light Brigade. The order was obeyed with great spirit. Lord Cardigan charged upon the very centre of the Russian position, but being assailed by a murderous fire from batteries on both flanks and by volleys of musketry, besides being met by a superior cavalry force, was forced back with very great loss. He was somewhat protected in his retreat by a diversion effected by the French. The engagement was then suspended for the day, Lord Raglan resolving to contract his line of defense to the immediate vicinity of Balaklava and the heights in the rear of the British army. Next day the Russians sallied forth from Sebastopol, seven or eight thousand strong, and attacked the right of the English division under Sir De Lacy Evans, who repulsed them, however, with promptitude, being sustained by fresh detachments of both French and English troops. The losses in these engagements were very heavy on both sides, the Russians suffering most.

A still more formidable attack was made by the Russians on the 5th of November. They had received still farther reinforcements from Asia and from the Danube, and their whole force, including the garrison, was estimated at 60,000 men. On the morning of the 5th, strong columns of their troops came upon the advanced pickets covering the right of the English position before Sebastopol. The Second Division, under Major General Pannefather, with the Light Division, under General Brown, were immediately brought forward, together with several others, to resist the advance of the Russians, who had, under cover of skirmishers, brought up numerous heavy batteries, their guns amounting in all to over ninety. The English were once or twice driven back, until they were finally supported by two battalions of French infantry, when the Russians were repulsed. The engagement continued for some time, and resulted in the maintenance of their ground by the Allies, and in the defeat of the Russian attempt, but with very great loss on both sides. The Russians finally withdrew, leaving an immense number of their dead upon the field. While this attack upon the English right was going on, a sortie from the garrison was also made against the French on the left, but without success. This is the last battle known to have taken place. Reports received through Russian channels state that the fire of the besiegers had greatly slackened. The losses in these successive engagements have been very great. On the 5th, the loss of the English was 459 killed, 1988 wounded, 198 missing—that of the French was 1726 killed and wounded. The Russian loss is stated at 2961 killed and 5791 wounded. Among the English officers killed were Lieutenant-General Sir George Cathcart and Brigadier-Generals Strangways and Goldie. Reinforcements for the Allies had begun to arrive, and preparations were being made for a winter prosecution of hostilities. Upon the receipt of General Canrobert's dispatch concerning the battle of the 5th, the Emperor wrote him a letter, expressing his entire satisfaction with the conduct of the army, and his sympathy with the losses it had sustained and the fatigues it had endured. He had hoped that the victories of the Alma would have seriously weakened the force of the Russians, and that Sebastopol would have more speedily fallen. The obstinate defense of that town and the reinforcements of the enemy had for a time checked the success of the Allies. The Emperor adds that considerable reinforcements are already on the way—that this increase would soon double the allied force, and enable it to resume the offensive—that a powerful diversion is soon to be made in Bessarabia—and that in foreign countries public opinion becomes more and more favorable. "If Europe," he says, "should have seen, without alarm, our eagles, so long banished, displayed with so much déclat, it is because Europe knows that we are only fighting for its independence. If France has resumed the position to which she is entitled, and if victory has again attended upon her banners, it is—I declare it with pride—to the patriotism and indomitable bravery of the army that I owe it."

Editor's Table.

WHAT AWAITS OUR COUNTRY? Our country has an area of nearly three millions of square miles. Compared with the greatest empires of antiquity, it is equal in extent to the dominion of Alexander or Rome in the days of their grandeur. Within fifty years it has increased more than three-fold. Our territorial additions have chiefly been made along the Gulf of Mexico, and in regions tributary to it; while in the remote West we have acquired an immense domain on the Pacific. If, at first, our national possessions were mainly connected with the Atlantic and a portion of the Gulf, they now have a shore-line of over twelve thousand statute miles along the coasts of the three large bodies of water that wash the North American continent.

The position of a country, considered in a geographical view, exerts a powerful influence over its civilization. Its history, if not written beforehand, is indicated by the physical circumstances that belong to its peculiar location. There is, at least, a sort of symbolism—a prophecy in soil, rivers, atmosphere, and ocean—that points out its line of action. Nature has formed the earth for man's abode; but she has distributed its advantages with an unequal hand. If we except the primary laws of matter, the different sections of the globe may be practically regarded as a series of habitations for the members of the human family. Would it be thought poetic if we were to speak of it as an E Pluribus Unum world? And yet, if not in structure, it is such in its divisions. Climate runs through a scale of vast variety. We have the zero, where the existence of our race is barely possible; and, advancing from that limit, we pass through all modes of physical life to the highest range of adaptation. Utility and pleasure, power and progress, means and ends, are constantly measured out in such degrees as may best subserve the wise purposes of creative skill. The earth has not been given to all to be used alike. It is a home, a sphere, a discipline, for every one; but not in the same unvarying method. Providence has no general plan that does not embrace many minor plans; and hence the material relations of men are so ordained as that dissimilar processes of education and development may contribute to a complete system. The sunshine, the rain, the dew, are the same agents every where; but what a contrast between the grain, the fruits that they cause to grow! What a breadth between the flower-harvest of Persia and the corn-harvest of England—between the olives of Sardinia, the grapes of Italy, the tea of China, and the wheat of New York—the rice of Carolina, and the cotton of Alabama! By these peculiarities of physical law man is trained; to him they are an organic providence; and from them he derives those lessons of experience which fit him to practice the duties of industry and self-reliance. Nations are taught in the same manner. A part of the earth is apportioned to them for sustenance and support. Whatever can be produced beyond their own immediate necessities may be converted into articles of commerce. The interests of the world are thus united, and each fulfilling its distinct relations to nature, and accomplishing its work, becomes tributary to the other.

Our original territory, sloping from the Alleghany range to the Atlantic, and looking eastwardly to the old world, was admirably suited to the incipient forms of colonization. It was not only sufficient for our early trade and commerce, but it afforded the best field for us to serve out a faithful apprenticeship in acquiring the art of settling a continent. Our leading ports were near the ocean, and our most productive lands—so far as then occupied—were convenient to tide-water. Every thing that we needed in laying the foundations of empire was provided there; and especially for the successful issue of the War of Independence, it was the most advantageous location that we could have possessed. Whether we contemplate the facilities for home or foreign intercourse, the opportunities for combining our strength, the subjugation of the Indian tribes, or the establishment of a commercial basis, the Atlantic seaboard was the region for us first to redeem from the wilderness and make the seat of civilization. The colonists were from commercial nations, and hence would naturally seek such proximity to the sea as accorded with their tastes and business. But, apart from this, it was the true training-ground for our countrymen. Its physical arrangements were exceedingly serviceable in constituting American society, and in qualifying us to found new States. It has enabled us to transplant our experience with our institutions, and to preserve that singular continuity of growth which has marked the extension of State authority and Federal jurisdiction over the immense territories of the West and the Southwest.

Our present position is one of striking interest. The frontier-line of the United States, on the British Possessions, is over three thousand miles in length; the shore-line of the Gulf of Mexico about three thousand five hundred; the Atlantic coast nearly seven thousand; and the Pacific over two thousand miles. Allowing for nearly fifteen hundred miles that border on Mexico, we have, within these boundaries, a territory that is five-sixths the size of Europe, and more than one-third of the whole area of the North American continent. Each great subdivision of the country enjoys ample natural advantages, or is capable of perfecting them by means of artificial improvements. On the north, the chain of Lakes; on the south, the Gulf; on the east, the Atlantic; on the west, the Pacific; large rivers draining interior regions, and offering easy outlets to the thoroughfares of commerce; mountains stretching across the entire scope of the land so as to modify climate and promote the interests of agriculture; each territorial section favored in its physical geography, and yet intimately connected with the others: all combine to furnish every facility for intercourse, trade, and enterprise that the most extensive system of civilization can require. Our shore-line averages one mile of coast to every two hundred and forty-one miles of surface, and the inland portions of the country are so situated as to be within reach of the avenues of transportation. Looking at the mere fact of location, one of the most important considerations in the settlement of a people, our national territory presents a most fortunate provision both for diffusion and concentration. A diagram, drawn with reference to the arts of life, would show that no part of the world is better fitted to independent pursuits, to the successful prosecution of individual business, to the various elements of industry, to the organization of the whole in the relations of commerce. Whether domestic or foreign connections are estimated, our position, as mapped out by nature, indicates that we may command every instrument of prosperity and power. Nor is this all. A country, if its capacity for civilization is to be measured, must be viewed in its social and governmental aspects. The law of society is opinion; the law of government is its written constitution. The vastness of our territory suggests some interesting thoughts on this subject. American society has been greatly aided by the form of our colonization. The inter-emigration from the planting States, and to a considerable extent from New England and the Middle States, has been a movement of families. All the institutions and habits of the household have been carried with it; and hence society has started in the new regions from an advanced point. A nucleus for a correct public sentiment has existed in the elementary stages of the new States, and consequently the conditions of moral growth had not to be supplied. But taking opinion in its wider range, as the conservative force of society, the broad scope of our national domain is calculated to promote its salutary action. The various means that educate its judgment, discipline its taste, and direct its expression, have been brought to bear upon it. And at the same time, physical circumstances have tended to restrain its undue sway. The tyranny of public opinion is not a fiction; it is a reality, that may produce a tremendous amount of mischief; and hence it is exceedingly desirable to protect society against its ravages. In this respect our position is auspicious. Public opinion is diffused over too large a surface to threaten any serious danger. It has the cares of home, neighborhood, and State to engross its anxieties and occupy its efforts; it has a thousand vents through which it may act; it meets with checks and correctives in every local interest; and consequently there is not the exposure to its evils that would exist if it were directed to one absorbing object. And the same train of reasoning applies to our confederated Republic. The size of our country renders a simple, limited government necessary. If the provisions of our Constitution are considered with reference to this fact, it would seem that nothing could exceed the wisdom of their adaptations. By confining the Federal Government to a general supervision; by ordaining such duties as are essential to the public welfare; by resigning all matters of universal concern to its hands, and investing it with sufficient power to execute its offices; by making it an authority over the whole, so far as the security and happiness of the whole demanded; by what is granted and by what has been withheld, it is just such a system as admits of extension over an immense territory. The fable of antiquity, that men sprung from the soil, amuses the scholar; but with what truth of imagination may it be said that the Constitution of the United States is its physical geography in another shape—the images of natural grandeur embodied in principles of corresponding magnificence!

A glance at the map of the globe will enable any one to see that we possess unequalled advantages for enjoying trade and commerce with the world. Tropical latitudes are within easy reach. The vast regions of South America, that offer so many prospective inducements to enterprise, are convenient to us. Our Pacific slope will soon give us command of the wealth of Asia; while our position on the Atlantic furnishes ready access to the central ocean of civilization. The interior of our country—its Mississippi basin—forming an area of more than one million of square miles, and favored with the finest soil in either hemisphere, has a geographical situation that makes it a supplying reservoir for all the other sections of the North American continent. Its productions, seeking the natural or artificial channels that may convey them to the Atlantic, the Gulf, or the Pacific, will be concentrated in the commercial depots of our national territory, and afford employment to millions of human beings. If our agriculture is laid out on such a scale, the collateral branches of industry must follow. Manufacturing and mining occupations, devoting their numerous arts to useful service, or employing their skill and taste in ministering to the demands of an insatiate luxury, will find ample scope for capital and activity. The main point of interest, however, lies in the fact that our country is so new, so facile, so energetic, that it can accommodate itself to the commercial wants of the age, and embrace any openings for enterprise that may be presented. A necessity in another nation becomes a positive gain to us. If the starving population of England require the abolition of corn laws, we are instantly able to supply the increased want of provisions. The semi-civilized empires of Asia enter into treaty with us, and we are ready to transport our commodities to their ports. And hence the different causes that are so efficiently at work to create an intercommercial system for the whole world, are directly tributary to our advancement. For it must not be forgotten that youth gives pliancy, and prepares a people to avail itself of any auxiliary that may facilitate its progress. Had our trade been the offspring of national policy, or had it been the slow result of accumulated centuries, it is easy to see that we might have been reduced to a commercial régime which would interfere with the successful use of circumstances. But as it is, the commerce of the country is determined by its own laws. Like the country, it is the creature of a fresh and vigorous era, awakening to the quick perception of wonders around it, and confident of its own power to turn them to substantial profit. Our position, therefore, confers vast advantages. It is a position for general action. It is a position from which we can radiate freely in any direction. And especially, it is a position that makes our commerce a preferred candidate for the great prizes of the day. The spirit of exclusiveness, which has so long governed the nations of Asia, is fast yielding, and no people are as well situated as ourselves to realize its benefits. With our maritime strength on the Pacific, and the means of intercourse between the eastern and western sections of the Union that a few years must bring, there is nothing to hinder the commercial ascendancy of the United States over all the world.

But what awaits us abroad must be measured by what awaits us at home. Let us begin with population. If we compute its increase till 1890 at 85.87 per cent. (the rate of advance from 1840 to 1850), and estimate the remaining ten years of the present century at the ratio of the last decade, exclusive of foreigners, it will give us a population of one hundred millions for 1900. The distribution of this population, if the present proportion of town and country be maintained, will give about twenty-five millions to cities, towns, and villages, and the remaining three-fourths to rural life. There will be more than ten millions of farmers, whose agricultural products may be estimated by the value of 1850 at over $6,000,000,000. Our foreign and home commerce may be supposed to reach over $7,000,000,000; exports of domestic goods, $800,000,000; value of real and personal estate over $28,000,000,000; real estate holders at about 6,000,000. If our churches should bear the same ratio as now, there would be over 160,000, and more than 125,000 clergymen in regular or occasional service. The teachers may be estimated at about the same number, and 16,000,000 of children will be at school. Over 900 colleges, theological, law, and medical schools will be in operation. If New York city should then have a population in the same proportion to the aggregate people of the country as it had in 1850, it will number over two millions of inhabitants. Supposing that this degree of prosperity is experienced, the density of the country would not be equal to more than four fifths of the present density of New England. Nor would over one third of our territorial area then be improved by agriculture. There would still be ample room for twenty millions of additional farmers. If, indeed, the density of the United States were to become the same as Massachusetts, it would embrace four hundred and twenty millions; and if as great as Belgium (three hundred and eighty-five to the square mile), it would be adequate to accommodate all the present population of the globe. The intelligent reader need not be informed that these estimates are conjectural, but nevertheless, they are warranted fully by existing data. It is probable that they fall short of the approaching reality; for our prosperity, so far, has surpassed the calculations even of enthusiastic statisticians.

The power necessary to obtain a most unexampled growth is secured to our country. And we speak in this tone of confidence because the power itself dwells in the mind and character of the people. It is not derived from external circumstances. It is not adventitious. Whatever aid may be drawn from outward fortune, the great secret of strength is in the resources of our individual and social nature. The motives that stimulate, and the objects that reward, are common property; and hence the intellect and enterprise of all classes, free from every false restraint and quickened into the utmost intensity, must be adequate to these magnificent results. If this grandeur is realized, it will place a gigantic sceptre in our hands. Such a spectacle as the near future is opening its portals to disclose has never charmed the vision of the world. It will be the miracle of modern life. The heirs of such an inheritance must look forward to its responsibilities; and consequently, nothing is more rational than a profound solicitude to watch those signs which the course of events gives as forecastings of popular preparation for it. A thousand contingencies always attend the advent of humanity into a new sphere; but the laws of human action are permanent; they carry their own prophecy within themselves; they write their own history; and hence, where they have the unrestricted scope that belongs to them on the soil of American freedom, it ought to be possible for us to arrive at just conclusions about our approaching condition.

First, then, it may be said, that no danger is to be expected from the Government. Our Federal system is so constructed as to be incapable of those enormous excesses which involve nations in ruin. It can not become hopelessly corrupt or recklessly extravagant. If, at any time, it forget its representative office; if it stretch its power and oppress the people; if it violate the sanctity of its high trust and convert it to unhallowed ends—how far could it abuse its prerogatives? The license of a day might be enjoyed, but vengeance would soon reach it. The eyes of its subjects are constantly on it; and whenever they detect the least deviation from the line of official integrity, they have the remedy to apply. It can not pass beyond their reach; it can not annul their sovereignty; it can not deprive them of the means of controlling its operations; and consequently, it can never be made the instrument of their overthrow. With us, Government has no separate and independent interests. It is not a person or a caste, but the simple agent of the people. Outside of the people, it has no meaning—no purpose—no aim; and therefore, united as it is to the people, pledged to their protection, ordained for their welfare, it must fulfill its task in obedience to their sentiments. The theory of our Government in this respect is a matter of increasing consciousness with its citizens. There is a growing disposition to exercise a strict watchfulness over its men and its measures. Not that there is a morbid suspicion on the part of the people, or any tendency to embarrass its legitimate movements; but their relation to its administrative and legislative acts is assuming the form of a practical habit. The progress of popular influence in the history of our country is distinctly marked, and its effects are seen in nothing more strikingly than in the decline of great statesmanship in Congress. American mind now speaks through the press. It speaks its own will in its own language. It is heard every day, on all subjects, and on all occasions; and hence it has not to embody its utterance, as formerly, in the thoughts and eloquence of leading men. The future of our statesmanship is in other fields than those in which Clay, Calhoun, and Webster won so large a portion of their splendid renown. It is in diplomacy—in all those offices that demand mature wisdom and accomplished skill—in foreign policy and international law. The domestic statesman has been partially superseded. The people have advanced to occupy his ground. Once he was the interpreter of their thoughts, and not seldom the originator of them; once they waited on his guidance, and leaned on his arm; but now a change has come: the opinions of the people are anticipative; and, through the direct medium of the daily newspaper, they are freely and forcibly expressed. We can attribute this to nothing but the progressive education of the masses. No additional prerogatives have been conferred upon them; in no degree has their vested power been enhanced; and yet, in practice, they certainly exert a much larger share of political influence than at any previous period in our existence. Common schools—discussions of national affairs—fuller intercourse—and other agencies of instruction have qualified them to act more immediately on the Government. The practical attitude of the people is not yet in perfect harmony with the ideal of the Constitution; for, taken as a whole, they are not as enlightened in judgment and disciplined in virtue as its acknowledgment of sovereignty requires. But the movement is in the right direction. It is on the true line of American progress. It is in the footprints of noble examples. And therefore, its impression on the Government must be salutary; and just in the proportion that it advances, if subordinated as hitherto to the decisions of justice and the instincts of patriotism, will it strengthen our hopes and confirm our trust.

It may be observed, in the next place, that the relations between the people and their respective States are becoming more close and intimate. The doctrine of State sovereignty, if not now the absorbing topic of dispute, is rapidly gaining ground in its practical results. Nor is this at all surprising. Our different States have such control over their local policy, and touch at so many points all the current interests of trade and the general welfare of society, that this effect is inevitable. Individual wealth can not be augmented; business can not extend and prosper; social connections can not multiply, without the State entering into nearer union with its citizens. The more that its resources are developed, the greater is the stake at issue. Every year that adds to its population and swells the aggregate of its property, makes the watchful oversight of the State more necessary. The growth of the country, therefore, not only increases the political importance of the States, but it strengthens the ties that bind them and their subjects together. And hence the institutions of civilized life must advance by the force of State reasons. Every internal improvement, every form of industry, every dollar contributed to revenue, educates the States and their citizens to appreciate their duties. A two-fold provision thus exists for the discipline of American character. State authority and Federal jurisdiction combine to form intelligence and virtue. Side by side, with one spirit and aim, they blend their influence and train the mind of the people to enjoy the blessings of rational liberty.

The real problem of free government is to be solved by the States themselves. A new element has been introduced into the calculation. The extensive empire which we now possess has changed the formula. Men are apprehensive, statesmen are concerned lest we have too ponderous a machinery. But gravitation can govern an ocean as easily as a dew-drop. Magnitude is only minuteness in another shape. If the confederated States, each for itself, will perform their office, we can occupy all our territory without the slightest risk to our organization. The vital duties of government devolve on them. If they wisely regulate their domestic affairs, educate their citizens, and maintain a well-ordered economy, the interests of national freedom will not be likely to suffer. That our States are growing in this conviction can not be doubted; and hence the indications of the day are highly favorable to the permanency of our institutions.

Apart from these facts, the constant tendency of American society is to re-create its energies by allowing the free action of all classes on one another. The entire absence of hereditary privileges and titled orders has a most important effect on public sentiment and national intellect, as well as on civil relations. The apprentices of twenty-five years since, are now, in numerous instances, men of wealth and influence. Mechanics in all our cities have risen to the front ranks of life. Tact and talent, if supported by virtue, ascend to commanding stations, and not infrequently give law to public opinion. The rapidity of these social changes is significant, but their most encouraging aspect is presented in the effect which is produced on the acting forces of the country. It is really equivalent to the introduction of a new vitality into the social system, pouring a current of fresh healthful blood on the thinking brain, and through the beating heart of the land. Position is power. But among us the power is vastly enhanced by having the foremost men and women of every generation to impart tone to our influential society. Here is one who makes an honorable fortune in business. Here is another who seizes a lucky thought, and converts it into something that is needed to supply a want. Here is a third who invents a piece of machinery, and secures a prominent niche in the industrial temple of the national Patent Office. Here is a fourth who maps out the once blank ocean, and turns over the winds to the custody of commerce. Here is a fifth who is a successful explorer; a sixth who writes a great book. They render a most praiseworthy service to the country by exercising their genius, and in the single view of practical utility, increase its strength and security. But is this all? Is it not, indeed, the secondary interest of their history? They acquire character. They take the seats of private dignity. And now, the fine endowments that made them masters of nature and art—the clear open eye that caught the sunbeam in its glancing, and retained the picture which came in its ray—the listening ear, sensitive to the faintest whisper of a divine truth—the telegraphic nerves, along which the mystic messages of the universe were ever passing—the strong soul that patiently awaited the hour of knowledge, or kept itself girded for the hour of action; all these come forth to their rightful place, and give their virtue, intelligence, and fame to the moral power of the country. Count their votes; you have not counted them. Number them in the census; they belong to a higher reckoning. What counterpoises they, in the midst of disturbing causes! What serene ministries, gliding through the life of the land, and hallowing it for a nobler destiny!

The conservative forces of our country are increasing. If we take wealth, it is not only growing with unexampled rapidity, but diffusing itself throughout all classes and sections. Our new cities (such as Rochester) show a remarkably large average of property-holders in comparison with the population. Whether we look at the results of discovering gold in California, or at the ordinary fruits of industry, the general tendency is to multiply the number of persons in good circumstances. Our agricultural products, which in 1840 were estimated at $600,000,000, transcended $1,000,000,000 in 1850; one third more wheat, and double as much corn were raised. In 1834 we manufactured 216,000 bales of cotton; in 1852 over 600,000 bales. The annual value of our labor in manufactures, mining, and the mechanic arts, is computed at $1,013,386,463, yielding 43 per cent. profit on the whole investment; while the ratio of increase in our tonnage is twice as great as that of Great Britain. The number of real-estate holders is about 1,500,000, which is nearly one person to every three free males over twenty-one years of age. Other facts are also encouraging. The proportion of newspapers to white population has doubled in forty years. If the native inhabitants of the United States be considered, the interests of education have advanced—for in 1840 the proportion for the Union, of pupils at school, was 13.89, and in 1850 it was 20.14 per cent.

Nor have church accommodations been at all neglected. They are now probably equal to 60 per cent. of the inhabitants, as large a ratio as is ordinarily required to be provided for in the means of religious worship. From these statistics we are warranted in the conclusion, that in the ostensible agencies of conservative influence we have grown in strength and security.

Had we to drop our train of reflection at this point, we confess that a profound solicitude would prey upon us. The science of numbers can not figure us into real greatness, nor can the noble labors of statisticians determine our future grandeur. There is that in the human soul which rises above all earthly computations, and asserts its brotherhood with the infinite and eternal. There is a divine principle here, struggling to recover its lost supremacy over the universe, and awaiting that hour of princely coronation, when every myriad shape that utility, beauty, and magnificence have assumed, shall be sanctified by its service and exalted by its presence. Does the sun shine only? Does the broad firmament bend above us as a mere pageantry? Sad would it be to think that all this expenditure of wisdom and skill were a gorgeous mechanism and nothing more; and sadder still to think, that amidst the secret bonds that unite its mighty orbs, there were no ties between the spirit and God. Nations, no less than men, are parts of a moral and spiritual economy, called and chosen to obey its laws and fulfill its ends. Heaven has always accomplished a large portion of its earthly work by means of them; individuals act through their massive strength; eloquence thrills and heroism moves them; and thus, whatever other agencies are employed, they concentrate their quickening forces at last in the bosom of nations, and find therein a perfected life.

Not, then, without thankful joy do we remember that, from the days of Jamestown and Plymouth Rock until this hour, our countrymen have cherished a deep-seated conviction that we were executing a divine purpose. There is a feeling in our breasts that Providence is administering here a vast scheme for the melioration of humanity. Men have sometimes used this argument for evil. It has been a plea for tyranny, an apology for crime, a pretext for licentiousness. But that does not affect its truth to us. The sunshine that adorns the landscape and gilds the sky penetrates the marsh and sets free the poisonous miasma, but evermore, the sunshine is the same pure and beautiful thing. Such men as hold this sentiment within their hearts, and keep over it the vigils of unwearied love; philanthropists and patriots; prophets, who have laid off the sackcloth and put on the vestments of hope; poets, laureates of a higher realm, with harps that are tuneful only to the breath of God; such men, what are their impulses but thoughts in another and a more celestial guise, waiting the era of advent, the gift of a language that shall utter, and an imagery that shall grace the rapture of their pure communion with perfect truth! A feeling—none may tell how much of Heaven is in a feeling. None may measure the wondrous inspiration so often awakened there, for feeling is the whisper-voice of the coming Christ. If to this sentiment we yield the devotion of our life; its law, our love; its faith, our strength; what a glory will the dawn of the next century bring to ONE HUNDRED MILLIONS OF FREEMEN—TO THEIR HOME, THEIR ALTAR, AND THEIR JOY!

Editor's Easy Chair.

IT is now just about a year since we rescued our Easy Chair from the falling timbers and the general wreck of our great fire. On the 10th of December, 1853, the great pile of building where the great work of a great business was carried on, and which was the result of long years of steady industry, enterprise, and success, crumbled in a few hours, and lay at sunset a chaos of ruin. For a moment it seemed impossible that any business could surmount such a disaster—so sudden and so complete. But it was scarcely a moment, for the wires that trembled with the news of the accident toward every point of the country, also bore the orders that indicated the resolution not to falter but to conquer. Nor can this Easy Chair ever forget how along those same wires came thrilling a thousand messages of cheerful encouragement, of prompt offers of aid, and of the most generous sympathy. It seemed quite worth while to have suffered such a blow in order to prove the extent and quality of friendliness. Among the manifold and various experiences of a long-continued and large business, there is nothing that is so unusual and so sweet as this proof of hearty interest, because it is the real sympathy of men with men, and not the formal or forced expression of an interested concern. Trials prove friends. Not more surely do the dry leaves blow from the trees when the summer is gone, than false friends from the companions over whom a tempest has swept. When our Chair tottered in the sway of that terrible confusion, a hundred hands of help, unsuspected before, were thrust forward to uphold it. It was not the moment then, when we so much required that kindness, to say how much we valued it. Gratitude, in the moment of succor, seems a matter of course. But now from our new Easy Chair, which seems rather a throne than any lesser seat, firmly, and as we do not doubt, finally planted upon the old spot, we wish to say to all our friends every where, who so encouraged and cheered us in those dark days, that their words are not, and are not to be, forgotten—that their ready offers of assistance showed securely that there is no necessary searing of feelings in the whirl of affairs, and that their generous sympathy is among our sweetest recollections. Many a time, as we sit musing in our Chair, those fearful hours of a year ago return; once more we hear the stern alarm-bell, summoning a city to see and to assist our misfortune. Once more we see the building that we had reared with so much pride, and with pride so pardonable, consumed by inexorable flames. We watch the wild confusion—we hear the crash—we behold the smouldering and smoking ruins; but more clearly than the crash we hear once more the sound of friendly voices, and more plainly than the wreck we see faces lit with kindness.

We are sure you will pardon so much gossiping remembrance to a garrulous old Easy Chair, which has not encountered so much sincerity in life that it can afford to be silent when it recalls last year.

But not only is our Easy Chair planted again, but a great part of the building in which it stands is restored. The same old square between Cliff Street and Pearl Street will be occupied by the new structure. The part which lies upon Cliff Street is already completed and occupied, and the rest will be ready by March. No pains have been spared, no skill, and no expense, to erect the most perfect and the largest, the safest, and the best book-making establishment in the world; for the necessities of the business to be done in it required nothing less. The building now completed is entirely fire-proof. The walls are brick; the doors and window-frames are iron; the cross-pieces are iron; the floors are laid in cement over brick arching. The communication between the different floors is a circular fire-proof stairway, in a tower built just outside the outer wall, and there is no hatchway or staircase in the building.

The building is distributed in six stories besides the basement, in which is placed the steam-engine. The boilers and furnace are in the open court in the centre of the block. A vault is excavated under the street for the storing of stereotype plates. This vault is well ventilated, and preserves the plates from every kind of injury. Upon the successive floors are the press-room, drying-room, bindery, composing-room, and electrotyping-room. Each floor is furnished with every convenience. They are airy, bright, and well-ventilated, and a general aspect of cheerfulness reigns over all. We hope some day to devote some space of our gossip in the Easy Chair, or even, possibly, in the grave pages of the body of the Magazine, to tell our readers and friends the whole story of our new buildings and of our business, in detail.

These things have not been done—such a business has not been built up—without sacrifice, and the long devotion and industry of many lives and many brains. Mercantile success, in this country of immense and untiring opposition, is a matter of just pride. Yet it is also matter of real regret that there should be fatal differences and misunderstandings, and that bodies marching under the same banner toward the same general end, should find themselves, almost unavoidably, bickering by the way. We have had very many hard things said to us as we sit in our Chair—very many things which the speakers will one day regret having said. If there must be differences, it is a pity they should rankle into disputes and hostility; it is a great pity that men can not agree to differ.

But when a man is assaulted anonymously, or when purely ex parte statements are put forth, and statements entirely devoid of truth, as he may have in his hands the means of showing, what part remains for a self-respecting man but to be silent and trust to his good name? It is easy to wage a newspaper war. It is easy to criminate, to recriminate, and to rejoin. But to what end, and for whose benefit? The world cares nothing for the quarrels of individuals; on the contrary, it soon despises those who easily invoke its sympathy. The public has no preference in pictures, but for those which please it. It does not pause to ask about the artist. It may be an interesting inquiry, but it is secondary. The painter paints a picture, which, if it does not of its own merit command the world's admiration, will never secure it by any appeal to sympathy. The public may be persuaded to give alms to an unsuccessful artist, but it will not give admiration. It is much wiser, therefore, to suffer aspersion of a certain kind and to a certain degree, than to rush into print and try to catch the public by the button. What is reputation worth if it is not able to stand a sneer or a question without turning pale and hurrying out the proofs of its integrity? Is character only a wall of Jericho, to fall at the blast of every ram's horn?

Besides this, every man who has some little acquaintance with men and affairs, knows how entirely one side has the right until the other is heard. Consequently, when one side speaks out, however loudly, he knows that there is another; and if he does not hear it, his mind rests quietly, but quite uncommitted to the first eager statement. If we have sometimes been a little restive in our Easy Chair, as we have heard the calumnious stories which are so easily told of every man and body of men, we have presently composed ourselves by remembering that our friends would not believe the whisper of an enemy sooner than the uniform conduct of a friend: and that those who did not know us were yet quite wise enough, by their own experience, to know that we probably had our side and our view of the question. We have preferred to sit quietly and abide the result, confident that if any man were seriously concerned to know the truth, he would come where he could ascertain it, and, at least, would not condemn without a hearing.

Moreover, how can a man reply to advertisements and anonymous attacks without involving himself in an endless and fruitless series of publications? If our tailor posts us as a reprobate old Easy Chair that does not pay for the paint put upon it, it is hardly worth while for us to announce in print that we do. With so many people to talk with, and so many affairs to mind, we could not fairly get our proper business done if we were to keep running from our Chair to hallo stop thief, after all the vagrants who try to steal a bit of our good character. We must sit as quietly as we can, and attend to our affairs as closely as possible, and let the malicious whispers, and the mean innuendoes, and the anonymous aspersions drift unanswered to oblivion. But if any man will come to us and ask us if it is really true, as he heard yesterday in the temple of Rumor, that the legs of our Chair are not oak, but pasteboard, and that we ourselves are not a gray old spectator of morals and manners, but a gay young Mephistophiles with a tail coiled snugly under the skirts of his coat, and with feet in two parts—we will promise to turn up our Chair and let him feel the legs for himself; or we will kindly apply them to his head, that he may prove by the best of tests whether they are pasteboard or oak; and we will lift our wig that he may see if we have horns, and our skirts that he may satisfy himself farther.

And as he turns away, we shall beg him hereafter to remember that there may be a fine show of sincerity where there is little enough truth; and that it is easy to roar through the newspapers without necessarily saying any thing; and particularly we shall request him to remark, that if an honest man has an honest and hearty objection to any thing, he is not, first of all, anxious to drag the difficulty before the public eye; but if he has seriously and privately considered all that has been seriously and privately said, he does not invoke the attention of the world without wholly, fairly, and unreservedly stating his opponent's side, that the world may be in possession of the facts, so that its judgment may be a verdict, and not a partisan and interested opinion.

THERE is a subject, strictly connected with the foregoing, upon which we are compelled to offer a great deal of advice; which is sometimes, but not always, perfectly well received. When the young Narcissus recently consulted us about his literary portrait of Perdita, we gave him our opinion with the frankness becoming an Easy Chair; and we mean to do the same with young Blank, who came yesterday with a face in keeping with his name, and railing vehemently against his publishers.

"Swindling scoundrels!" said the impetuous Blank, "they've tried to cheat me out of all the profits; there's my book advertised every where; praised in all the papers; complimented by my friends in private letters; which has sold immensely, and been noticed in London, and even in the Revue des deux Mondes in Paris; and now the beggarly fellows tell me there is hardly a balance of a hundred dollars to my credit. It's too much for human patience. Oh, Easy Chair, why do we unhappy authors always go to the wall?"

The young man was lost in a tumult of wounded vanity and disappointed desire. Every word of newspaper praise had been at least a doubloon in his fancy, and he thought it would be two in his purse. The private letter of some distant friend seemed to him the chorus of a vast region—the voice of the West—the psalm of the South. You may imagine how many such youths there are about an Easy Chair situated as ours is.

"My dear Blank," said we gravely, "this is one of those matters in which experience is wiser than theory. Have we not, in other years, pursued the same bright phantom which you follow? Have we not been slowly taught to discover success within and not without ourselves?"

"Consider the number of manuscripts which are yearly produced. Think of the small proportion of these that ever come into the hands of a publisher. Think how few of those are ever even examined. Of those which are examined, what an immense majority are necessarily rejected! and of the few which are accepted, how very, very few sell, or are ever heard of after the advertisement is withdrawn from the newspapers! And of those which sell, and are heard of, calculate the number which afford any thing like an income, or even a large compensation to the authors, and you will gradually perceive that the prizes of pecuniary success in literature are painfully few, and you may, according to your modesty, reckon your chance of drawing a large one.

"Let us suppose that your manuscript is accepted. After long and inexplicable delays it is published. To you it seems a perfectly easy thing to publish a book as soon as it can be printed. But, Blank, you are not a publisher, or you would understand the waitings for times and seasons, and the thousand details unknown to all but the initiated, which affect the publishing as they do all other business, each in its way. The moment your book is published you acquire an honorable importance in your own eyes. You are the maker of a book; in that, at least, you are like Shakespeare. You belong to the literary guild; in that you are with Voltaire, Johnson, and Goldsmith. You are an author; in that you are like Joel Barlow and Mr. Cornelius Matthews. Your book is announced with due flourish—"A new work by Benoni Blank, Esq." The whole newspaper seems to have been printed to say that one thing. Your eye constantly slips aside from the editorial column, which blazes so brilliantly with Sebastopolic speculations, to that large type in which your small name figures. You can not but wonder if every body sees how remarkably apparent your name is upon the page.

"There is another bliss. It is when you see the shop-posters, and step in, and find fresh copies of your volume upon the counter. There are some noble booksellers, who step forward, blandly smiling, and offer you your own book, saying that 'This is a very popular new work.' You say that you have read it, and found it very entertaining. That, of course, is merely to put the noble shopman off the scent.

"Then come the newspaper notices. You are delighted with the discrimination that discovers the rare merit of this new book, which is destined to a great success, and argues so happily for the career of the author. You think, already, as you lay down the paper, of hobnobbing with Dickens, and calling Bulwer brother. What style of autograph will you adopt, for now it will be in demand? The mail brings you a hundred responses from friends to whom you have dispatched your book, 'with the regards of the author.' They were always sure you would do this thing; they knew that your talents would, etc., and must, etc.; and they congratulate so gracefully that you drop a few pious tears, and wonder how you were such a very clever fellow and had not known it. You had fancied yourself not at all deficient, possibly, but you had not thought of the extraordinary powers you possessed.

"It is not all over with one newspaper, nor with one mail. Fresh notices, fresh letters, fall like dew upon your nascent fame and self-importance. It is natural, it is certainly pardonable, that you should believe the voice of so much newspaper praise, and so many enthusiastic letters, to be the award of fame, and to imply a universal public acquaintance with your great work. How equally natural and pardonable is your consequent indignation at the very limited balance to your credit upon the publishers' books!

"You indignantly demand explanations, and they are graciously given. The newspapers swallowed up at least a hundred copies as material for that fine fulmination in print which has so exhilarated you; a hundred more, presented to your friends 'with the regards,' etc., explain the private psalms. Item; two hundred copies at—apiece, which do not figure upon the credit side of your account. For the rest, ask of the next hundred men you meet how many have read your book; and of those who have read it, ascertain how many have bought it. You will slowly and sadly come to see that you may be an author of repute, and yet have nothing to draw upon at your publisher's. You may be an eminent literary name, and yet find no eminent publisher willing to undertake your work.

"Consider what a book is to a publisher. It is so much pork, cotton, and corn. If your book is the best poetry that has been written in the century, it will not pay you nor the publisher to print it. It is simply a case of red and white blankets. If the demand is for red, you may go hang your whites upon the willows. The publisher is a dealer in certain commodities. It is his business and his instinct to expose for sale what is wanted, and therefore only to buy such. And you will often hear an intelligent publisher say, 'Your book may be the best in the world, but our knowledge of our trade and its demands compels us to decline accepting it; for we do not publish for the sake of literature, but for our own livelihood, just as you write the book. If you have made an economical mistake, in writing a book for which there is no call, and in which there is no possible interest, why should we make the same one by publishing it? You must excuse us; but really our hands are so full just now. If you could make it convenient to call a year from next June?

"Beside all this, dear Blank, remember that it is not so easy to swindle you in a large establishment, as in your soreness you naturally believe. Every item connected with a book is noted by many different hands, and unless you suppose a grand conspiracy of principals and clerks, to do you out of a few hundreds, and themselves out of their bread and butter and good name, you must relinquish the swindling theory.

"Don't suppose that this Easy Chair has not the liveliest sympathy with you, friend Blank. It has long ago renounced the writing of books, not because it disbelieved the honesty of publishers, but because it saw too plainly the dismal chances of a book-making career. A man who lives by his pen must make up his mind to compromise, and submit, and suffer, as in all other pursuits. If his love of letters is so strong that it can survive the weary wear of book-work, he will be happy, for the muses do indeed bless those that serve them with such devotion. But if vanity, or indolence, or any meaner motive, leads him to literature, it were better for him that a ledger were tied about his neck and he were cast into a counting-house.

"Believe, dear Blank, a voracious old Easy Chair that hath had losses. Be reader to doubt your own power of interesting the public, than to question the integrity of others. Be very sure that your wrath is a sublime anger for the sake of outraged art and letters, and not a very small gust of wounded vanity. If you are a man of letters, and seriously devoted to such pursuits, you are upon the losing side in respect of wealth and ease. But you should not be a man of letters if you do not feel such loss to be your gain. If your object is money-making, don't make books; but go and begin as a small clerk, and then you may gradually grow into a sure and steady, if small, income. We, whose lot is cast in this Easy Chair, have also cast in with Apollo. The smile of the muse is sunnier than the glitter of eagles, and the song of the fauns in the forest sweeter than the clink of silver. The moment it ceases to be so, we will desert the groves and the piping. Oh, Blank! it is less the praise of newspapers than the content of your own heart that is worth craving."

He listened with reluctant ears. Yet his brow relaxed and his voice grew milder.

"I have no right to doubt you," he said; "but it is hard to believe. You who sit in this Easy Chair, and see so much more than I can see of the detail and skeleton of the thing, must be right. I will try to believe it, and be less ready to credit every hard story I hear of every publisher."

Blank went gently away, and we wish his friend Dash would consider these things, and be less loud in his sweeping assertions, and his general condemnation of things he does not understand.

THE kindly season of gifts and compliments has come round again. Lights are put in the windows, and hearts are lighter and eyes brighter. There is loud laughter of children in the early morning as they peep into, and feel of the stockings hanging by the chimney. There is quieter pleasure later around the ample table, heaped with presents, and a fairy gayety at evening about the sparkling Christmas-tree. Every body must smile in these pleasant days; and even those whose hearts are heavily bowed since the last holidays, have a sad satisfaction in remembering the past. How tenderly Tennyson has touched the theme in the greatest of English poems since Paradise Lost. In Memoriam is the true Paradise Regained. But the singer of Paradise Lost, has also the most majestic and appropriate tone for this sacred season. His hymn on the morning of Christ's nativity is a solemn peal of the organ. It has a cathedral grandeur, and might well be intoned in every Christian church on Christmas-day as a fitting service. The poet's learning graces the triumph of Christ with the most costly pagan spoils. No hymns that sing the glory of Peor, and Baalim, and mooned Aah-taroth, make them half so musical or fair as this psalm of their overthrow. The very measure seems to have caught the lofty music of the wail that swept along the Syrian coast, and died far out at sea—"Great Pan is dead." In all literature there is no poem more majestic—

"The lonely mountains o'er,
And the resounding shore,
A voice of weeping heard, and loud lament;
From haunted spring and dale,
Edg'd with poplar pale,
The parting Genius is with sighing sent;
With flower-inwoven tresses torn,
The nymphs in twilight shade of tangled thickets mourn."

It is pleasant that the most precious festivals carry us back again to the most precious poetry. It is not to be denied that in a day of such universal printing and reading, the attention of readers is seduced from the books they would gladly know more intimately. The last novelist displaces Milton and Dryden; the new satirist overshadows Pope. Happily no new dramatist as yet supplants Shakespeare. Gradually many great names will be known only as names. Some scholar of centuries hence may wonder what kind of poetry Byron wrote; for the Byrons of his own, and the greater poets of all other times, will monopolize his attention and knowledge. Literature extends so that it is becoming impossible for any man who is not devoted to letters to be generally conversant with foreign authors as well as with those of his own tongue. A man may now be a very pretty scholar and not know German, and only taste Italian diluted in thin translation. Charles Lamb knew no German, and never went to Paris. But by such and similar abstinence he purchased the profoundest intimacy with the great authors of his own language—a language which he has enriched.

It was Charles Lamb who said that a solemn organ service should be performed before reading Milton. But Milton is his own organ. The music of his measure sounds like an anthem along his pages. And as the winter winds blow again, which are "not so unkind as man's ingratitude," and the long evenings and the cheerful fireside invite to domestic repose and enjoyment, take down Milton; with him invoke Sabrina, and mourn for Lycidas; and with his lofty hymn prolong the sweet solemnity of Christmas through all the winter.

LAST month we chatted in our easy way about Leutze's Washington at Monmouth. It was one of the topics of town gossip, and yet, although so fine a work, and of a man so venerated, and by an artist of such reputation, is has attracted less attention and remark than the Twins, by Landseer, which has been on exhibition at Williams and Stevens.

Nothing in the growth of New York is more surprising than the increase of taste for works of art. It is not many years since Colman's window, in Broadway, sufficed for the staring and amusement of the passengers who cared for pictures. But now there are noble establishments in which every man may see the best engravings of the best pictures, the finest photographs, and a multitude of original paintings. In the larger warehouses of the fine arts there is a room especially devoted to the exhibition of original works which are to be engraved. We understand that not less than $30,000 were received in subscriptions to the print of Scott and his Friends; a picture so delightful to hang upon the walls of a library whose shelves are filled with their works. At this moment, in two of these establishments, original works of one of the most distinguished living English artists, and of one of the very first of the Frenchmen, are to be seen for the trouble of stepping in from the street.

We learn that it is by the express desire of Landseer that we have had the chance of seeing the Twins. The picture was painted for Mr. Robert Stephenson, the distinguished engineer, to whom it was presented by the directors of a railway company in England, and it was at the especial request of the artist that the work was trusted so far. If the story be true, it is a pleasant indication of the natural and inevitable turning of art to the West for sympathy and encouragement. The hosts of pilgrims we have sent to the great galleries have at length made an impression upon the consciousness of art. It is discovered that in a land like ours there may well be no limit to the career of a great artist, as there can be none to the ultimate sway of true art. The artist, instead of waiting for us to come and see his picture, now sends it to us to be seen. Here is a straw. While Sebastopol engages the Allies—while Spain lies in ominous paralysis—while Germany leans toward the Danube and listens, aghast, for the distant thunder of war—the servants of the arts which demand peace and perish in war, turn their looks to us, and appeal to us as patrons.

Landseer's picture is, in color, one of his best. It is exhibited by gas-light, which gives an unnatural brilliancy, but there is great vividness and softness, and general truth. The composition is simple enough. Two shepherd dogs lie upon a Scotch plaid, upon a hillside, in company with, rather than guarding, an ewe and two lambs. The landscape of the picture is locally interesting, and the fine heather blossom in the corner does not cut up the composition, but rather deepens the general and characteristic effect. Nothing can surpass the quality of the sheep's wool and of the dogs' hair. It is hair and wool, and not possibly any thing else, and, although so perfect, it was undoubtedly the result of a few easy strokes of the artist's pencil. But consider how many years of pains go to that moment of ease. Think of the countless hours of hard practice which have given the pianist that facility which so surprises and fascinates.

There is very little material in this picture, but a great deal of interest. The interest, however, is mainly derived from the accurate imitation of the particular objects, and from the association; and has less of that peculiar interest of sentiment which usually characterizes Landseer's pictures. It is objected to him that, after all, he is only a painter of animals, and that his works can not properly be considered high art. But there is certainly a great difference between Snyders and Landseer, and a greater between Herring and Landseer. There may be less actual reproduction of the bestial nature in Landseer's pictures of animals than there is in Snyders. But there is a development of those instincts in which animals approach humanity, and of which Snyders never dreamed, nor could have perceived. Herring, on the other hand, without the spirit of Snyders, or the sentiment of Landseer, is a smooth imitator of obvious nature. In fact, he is only one of the many imitators whom Landseer has inspired.

Now it does not seem a poor thing to perceive and so cunningly to present this human relation between men and animals, or its possibility. It was an easy thing for a skillful painter to make a portrait of Lady Blessington's Dog. An accurate eye and a delicate hand seem to be all that was required. The animal might have been correctly portrayed sitting, standing, or running, and all the friends of Lady Blessington might have been able instantly to recognize it. Snyders would have given the pure dog—the unmitigated canine characteristics. But Landseer places the dog at the foot of a flight of steps, with eyes and ears erect, attentive to the expected footstep of the mistress. Instantly you perceive that it is a dog from the highest point of view, in his relation to man. That a painter seizes this point, and presents it, is the evidence of his greatness in that department; and if to deal with the display of the passions and powers of man be the highest race of art, this form claims some consideration, inasmuch as it reveals human sympathy in the brutes.

Remember what the poets have said of this thing; and reflect that what they say so well in one way, Landseer says in another.

"The dog alone of all brute animals has a storge, or affection upward to man," says Coleridge. And Otway, in Venice Preserved—

"A friend to dogs, for they are honest creatures
And ne'er betray their masters; never fawn
On any that they love not."

But, best of all, Goldsmith at the close of the thirteenth essay:

"Of all the beasts that graze the down or hunt the forest, a dog is the only animal that, leaving his fellows, attempts to cultivate the friendship of man; to man he looks, in all his necessities, with a speaking eye, for assistance; exerts for him all the little service in his power with cheerfulness and pleasure; for him bears famine and fatigue with patience and resignation; no injuries can abate his fidelity; no distress induce him to forsake his benefactor; studious to please, and fearing to offend, he is still an humble, steadfast dependent; and in him alone fawning is no flattery."

Remember this when you see a Landseer, and determine whether pictures that so faithfully and fully represent all that is said in it are not worthy a high rank among all paintings.

Nearly across the way, at Goupil's, is Ary Scheffer's Temptation. This is a work strictly in the style which aims to monopolize that vague term, High Art. It is a striking representation of the Scriptural event, almost bald in its simplicity, but still far from really imposing or sublime.

A man familiar with Scheffer's works, would not be surprised if he failed to satisfy in the treatment of such a subject. His chief excellence is a dreamy grace, a shadowy sentiment, which has its best expression in the Francesca da Rimini and the Dante and Beatrice. His more popular and well-known pictures of Christus Consolator and Christus Remunerator are much too mannered and sentimental to please a manly Christian. But in the two we have mentioned from Dante, there is an ineffable purity, and tenderness, and grace, which are the individuality of Scheffer. There is, also, in the Luxembourg gallery at Paris, an earlier picture of his, illustrating a German ballad, of an old knight who steals into his tent, after the victory is won, and while the soldiers carouse and rejoice without, he kneels, and weeps, and prays over the dead body of his young son, whose clustering fair locks are sadly eloquent of the youth and beauty which the quick hand of battle has forever blighted. The picture has the sweet pathos of the ballad. It is one of the purest poems among all those pictures.

But when the ballad-singer essays an epic, then we may be disappointed without disparagement of his peculiar excellence—with regret, only, that he has deserted his field of success. In the Temptation, Christ stands upon the summit of a desolate mountain pointing upward. Just below him, upon his left, stands, in shadow, Satan with outspread hands, pointing below. It is not the vulgar Satan of hoofs and claws, although he has the unnecessary batwings. It is a head of Mephistophilean character, but more humanly sympathetic than Mephistophiles. Unfortunately for the point of the picture, the chief interest concentrates in Satan. The Christ is a dull, unmeaning, unmanly figure, that appeals to the eye by no charm of grace or beauty, and to the heart by no persuasion of manifest Divinity. He is always the great failure of art. The ambitious attempt to represent something more than man or essentially different from him, must necessarily fail. But Ary Scheffer in Paris in 1854 seems to be no wiser in that respect than any of the old Italians in 1554.

But the presence of these two pictures among us marks an era. In such ways New York begins to be a metropolis. We begin to feel that we need not cross the sea always, or that our children need not, to know what is rife in the World of Art. Such works are the advance-guards and outposts of the coming Muses. They persuade us that we may be not only rich, but may worthily use riches. They give a greater cheerfulness to the gay holiday season, and a heartier tone to the happy New Year which our Easy Chair wishes to all its friends.

As we gather around our warm fires in the long winter evenings, it is impossible not to remember those who have no fires at which to warm themselves, and who, doing hard battle with the "stings and arrows of outrageous fortune," falter, and fail, and fall. At this general season let us remember them with more than usual sympathy. No man is worse for a kind thought. It is not hard to give a smile and a gentle word. That is a charity possible to every poor man, and there is none sweeter.

This sentiment, however, we are glad to see, takes a broader range, and not content with feeling the sorrows which we do not share, it aims not only to alleviate, but to prevent. There never was a time of more universal interest in humane movements than the present. There were never more rich men who justly regarded themselves as almoners of God's bounty, than those who live around our Chair. It is a grateful thing to notice and commemorate. The papers are full of accounts of wise, and ample, and well-directed charities. The festival of Thanksgiving was rightly named for a myriad of the forlorn and unhappy, who only a few years since could regard such a day as but a melancholy mockery of their lot. Let us rejoice that these things are, and that they improve. Let us perceive that there must be no "let nor hindrance" to our constant exertion. If much has been done, much remains to do. However good the world may become, it will hardly outgrow vice. And, therefore, let us be all the braver, that our children may be encouraged.

These things occurred to us as we lately received an invitation to assist at the inauguration of the new building for the House of Refuge on Randall's Island. It was a beautiful occasion, both in its spirit and in its details. It was graced by the presence and the eloquence of men who have earned that best praise in a Republic, of being good citizens. A citizen is not only a tax-payer, and an orderly person who makes no rows in the street, and who refrains from blowing penny whistles in church. He is the man who aims to lessen the burden of taxation by removing temptation to crime, and so diminishing the number of criminals. Of all the various similar celebrations which we have attended, there was none superior to this in interest and significance. Governor Seymour was there, and Robert Kelly, and Hugh Maxwell, and many others whose names we would gladly record as men who knew their duties and delighted to do them. There were speeches good to hear. There was a noble, spacious, and convenient building; and there were four hundred children, whom a generous humanity seizes as they are slipping into sin, and by gentle and gracious treatment aims to restore to society as sound and industrious men.

Who does not gladly hear of this, and rejoice that there are so many other philanthropic movements, which no satirical figure of Mrs. Jellyby can ridicule, and no cold skepticism discourage? We have no excuse for not doing. We can not say that we have no time to consider nor investigate. There are plenty who will do that. There are enough capable and trusty men who will be the stewards of your charity. Let every man bear his part. As the bright days of Christmas-tide and the New Year lengthen toward the spring, let them be fuller than ever of good thoughts and good deeds. The remembrance of a charitable act is sweeter at night, and secures dreams more delightful than "a night-cap" of the mountain-dew, hot, with sugar. Begin with the year, if you have not yet begun. Help these good works by sympathy and consideration, if you can do no more. Then shall you have a right to sing with the poet:

"Ring out, wild bells, to the wild sky,
The flying cloud, the frosty light;
The year is dying in the night;
Ring out, wild bells, and let him die.

"Ring in the valiant man and free,
The larger heart, the kindlier hand;
Ring out the dark'ners of the land;
Ring in the Christ that is to be."

OUR FOREIGN GOSSIP.

WHEN, a year ago, we talked of the rumors of war which overshadowed Europe, and which quickened the hammer-strokes in all the arsenals of England and of France, we did it with a selfish feeling of complacency, in the recollection of which our face tingles even now with red reproaches. It seemed to us that our lusty young country, standing aloof—busy with its myriad-shaped industry—watching hopefully its great granaries of the West—pushing its iron roads through farther forests—launching its mammoth clippers—forgetting its sectional jealousies in the general prosperity, and knowing nothing of the year's desolation save only by the over-ocean reports, would grow more lusty and joyous in its strength than ever before.

But, by a strange Providence (for which we are more than half accountable ourselves), the knell of the old year, which to-day is ended, has been as bitter-toned and as mournful for us as for the Cossacks of the Crimea or the peasant homes of England.

We know it is an ungrateful task to recite our griefs; but, whether dark or light colored, we always dip our pen in the times, and our record shows shadows or sunbeams, as the times are clouded or bright.

First of all, and before the mourning clothes of the New Orleans plague had been cast away, came the dullness and the doubts of blighted trade, with its concealed griefs, throwing gloom on many a household; but it was a measurable trouble, and one against which the American heart, so elastic in its courage, knows how to bear up stoutly, and would have borne up stoutly, if conspicuous crime—in the very quarter where crime was least looked for—had not dampened energy, and covered one of our best colonial names with scorn.

Great conflagrations, too, in the very opening of the year, had lighted up, and lighted away millions of slowly-accumulated property in our Prince of Cities; and the smoke of them had hardly gone by when ships, fetid with disease, brought the cholera to a new revel all along our great water-courses, leaving mourning voices that were heard over the din of Niagara.

Then came the blasting sun, with a scorching air, crisping the meadows of the Genesee, and burning brown all the high lands, and making the broad maize leaves wilt every where, and rustle with a dry sound in August, as they should in late October.

After this set in the Atlantic gales, hurtling the fishermen's fleets on the rocks by Cape Ann, and desolating, far to the southward, the shore towns with a wreck of broken trees, swamped grain-fields, and unroofed houses. All this, too, came when a fever was raging such as had not been known for fifty years—driving people to tents, and thousands besides to the tomb.

And when autumn seemed to breathe coolly again over the burnt-up country to the northward, and Erie even had recovered from the summer's slough, there came—like the roar of a shotted cannon fired upon peaceful homes—the tidings of the lost Arctic!

People read, as if they were reading romance, how the cowardly men and officers fled away from the sinking ship; and how the women and the men, grouped on the quarter-deck with Luce and his crippled boy, looked death very calmly in the face, and using such last effort as they could, and with only one last cry, which despair called out, went down with the foundering vessel. Then there were the stories of the saved ones—cautiously told by those who left in the first boats, as if put on their defense (as they were, and are), but thrilling and natural altogether in the mouths of those who kept by to the last—nervously working with unsteady hands at the raft—seeing the waters rise fearfully—the great hulk reeling—hearing the howl of the wind as the waters gurgled over the iron chimney—and seeing, at the last, the drift of men, children, and women, tossing on the broken bit of sea, when at last they all, or nearly all, went down.

Do not these things match Silistria, Alma, and Sebastopol? The Europeans may indeed hold the advantage in the number of the slain, perhaps also in the number of desolated homes. Indeed we yield them this. But for variety of grief and of anxiety, and for that double woe which comes from calamities unattended by pomp and circumstance, we think our country may well bear the palm.

While our thought leans, as we write, to that fearful scene of the sinking ship off the Newfoundland shores, let us drop a caution to those who, in the coolness of after-dinner thought, and the easy security of sunshine upon land, presume to say how proper energy of management might have averted half the fatality of the event. We confess to a very great distrust of those who are always seeing "how things might have been done better." We have been sadly pestered by the gossip of those around our Chair, "who would have ordered things differently." Even old sea-captains, wearing the infallible air which belongs to a life-long series of escapes from all hazards, venture upon narrow criticisms of an action which, from its very nature, is beyond the ordinary rules of comparison. Let them rather bless God reverentially who has spared them such trials as might have put the bravest heart in a tremor.

But from that dark spot upon the sea, where now no vestige floats of the wrecked ones, let us carry our view further seaward, until it rests on the shores of the Old World, where the din of war-times has hardly given time for a sigh over the fate of the lost ship.

Even in the gay capital, as they read in chance columns of the loss of a young Duke de Grammont, the streets were clouded with a heavier mourning; and muffled drums, in deep, processional beat, were sounding the requiem of a marshal of France.

They say he was a harsh man, with not much of the geniality in him which ties friends closely, or which makes tearful followers at a bier; but yet he was the type of all those losses among the gallant fellows of the army, who had wasted their lives under the fever skies of Varna or the bullets of the Crimea, and the women and the children who flocked to see the state ceremonial which honored the burial of St. Arnaud, bethought them bitterly, in sight of the sable plumes, of the husbands, or sons, or fathers, who, in a humbler way, had been thrust into foreign burial pits, with no token of love or reverence around them but the musket-volley of their comrades, or the locket they wore on their bosoms.

Nor does it add to the hope or the confidence of those who have as yet seen no near name of kindred on the dead-lists, to find new ships going to the war country, day by day, with fresh freight to fill up the gaps which are made before Sebastopol. It would seem that the Emperor himself cherishes a brooding anxiety for the result, not showing himself now, as in the early season, to the street-world of Paris, nor venturing upon his hunting frolics at Compeigne or Fontainebleau, but keeping quietly immured in the shades of St. Cloud, long after the leaves have fallen, and the winter festivities begun.

The Queen, too, in her stately castle of Windsor, making the rooms ready for her Imperial guest, Eugenie, is subdued to the boding thought of the nation; she has grown quieter in her royal entertainments, not knowing but her stalwart cousin of Cambridge, who danced so gayly at the Elysées Bourbon a season ago, is now shot down by one of those balls which cut through a ribbon of the Garter as easy as a private's coat.

However this may be, there will be mourning in many English houses in the winter that has opened; and the adventurous Miss Nightingale, with her company of nurses, will have sad work on their hands in the barrack-rooms of Scutari. Our American journals have had their accounts current of the battles and the siege, and our readers know their general history; yet we have snatched from the British papers one or two war paragraphs which are worth preserving, as giving rough and real glances at the slashing work they have been doing in the neighborhood of Sebastopol.

Our first war-waif—of which we shall continue a series of characteristic fragments—is the story of a wounded private, writing from his hospital-bed, under the heights of Scutari. He says:

"I have been severely wounded in three places, which is as follows—A musket shot through the right arm, which I received about an hour after we commenced the action, but being determined to pay them for making a hole through my jacket and fleshy part of my arm above the elbow, I would not fall to the rear, but made my comrade tie a handkerchief round it, and fought through the action, which lasted three hours after; but just as we thought the action was over, for the Imperial Russian army was routed, and we had gained the entrenchments and forts, they halted and wheeled round, and made another stand, which did not last long, for General Sir G. Brown, or Lord Raglan (I do not know which of them), ordered us, the Royal Welsh Fusiliers, Scots Fusilier Guards, Grenadier Guards, and the 88d Regiment of the Line, to form up for the charge, which we did directly; and now came the grand charge, and away they went after a few moments, but not before they had left me a bayonet wound in the left thigh and a ball through the left breast, which passed through the breast-bone and left lung, going out under my shoulder-blade. My other wounds are trifling to compare with the latter, for they are nearly healed up. The wound through my breast is closing up quite fast outside, but it will be months, the doctor tells me, before it will be healed up inside, and that I will always have to take great care of myself, for any convulsive or quick movement will be dangerous to me. They seem to think it quite a miracle that I should live, for they have agreed that the ball passed between the leading-strings of the heart, and about half an inch from the heart. Yet I am better, and live in hopes to live better a long time, although I shall never have much power in my left arm, nor shall I ever be upright; at least I can hardly expect it—but I must hope for the best. I shall be home in England in December, and be discharged in May, so you must have a corner berth ready for me. The bit of hair that you sent me, and another bit that a person you know sent me, I wore in a little bag round my neck. It was shot straight through the middle of the bag, and most of the bag and hair went into my breast, and every morning the doctor takes some of it out."

The next war glance we give is but a fragment from the letter of an English naval officer to a friend at home. It will be a relief almost to the reader to know that the "poor Lord Chewton," of whom so dismal mention is made, is since dead:

"I volunteered to accompany the party to assist in carrying down and embarking the wounded. Immense numbers of boats from all the ships were sent out, and I landed at six o'clock in the morning. The first poor fellow who came down was a 41st man, who was carried past me by two of his comrades, on a stretcher saturated with blood from an amputated leg. Then came a young officer (a perfect boy) of the 55th, with his right arm shattered, led down to the boat by a fine old French soldier. I then proceeded to the temporary hospitals, about three miles distant, and, O God! the sight! There was one train, extending nearly the whole distance, of wounded men; numbers with arms and legs shot off, indeed every description of fearful wounds, the motion often causing the blood to spout out and cover the ground, and at all times the stretchers were saturated. Every few minutes the poor fellows had to be laid down, their agonies being so intense. Many being covered over were remarked as being so easy, when on lifting up the blanket they were found to be dead. On I went, with, I confess, a sickness at heart that I could not shake off; the nearer I approached the scene of the frightful struggle, the more appalling it became. Besides all this dreadful suffering, the plain was strewn with dead men and horses indiscriminately. Some poor fellows with their heads blown off, others cut in two; in one spot, certainly not larger than fifty yards, were seventy bodies awfully mutilated. A short time after this I was told that there were some officers of the Scots Fusilier Guards in a hovel, all very badly wounded, and praying to be removed. I took a party up, and on entering this wretched place saw stretched upon the ground five officers, three of whom I knew intimately. They were all wounded very badly. I certainly then did feel proud of my countrymen, for in all their sufferings their gentleness, patience, and quiet resignation was beautiful. I immediately devoted myself and all my party to remove them. While making arrangements, a brother officer of poor Lord Chewton (one of the worst cases, he had no less than five wounds and a compound fracture of his right hip, left leg broken, a musket-ball still in his back, his head severely bruised, and three fingers broken, which had to be amputated) came in and at once recognized poor Chewton. They were very old friends; their interview was one of the most affecting you could possibly imagine. This fine manly young fellow—whose name I forget—was perfectly speechless, and after vainly struggling to overcome his feelings at the thrilling spectacle, put his hands to his face, and I saw the tears stream through his fingers. Poor Lord C. called him, and I heard him say, 'We have known each other for twenty years; if you go, tell my poor wife—not another word did I hear, for I could stand it no longer.'"

Still another dismal paragraph is from the private letter of an Irish corporal. He gives an account of his visit to the battle-ground on the day after Alma:

"The day before I laughed and talked of the splendid manner we handled the Russians. Now, I was horrified at bodies without heads, some without legs or arms, bowels torn out, brains oozing through shell or musket-wounds, blood bursting from ears, eyes, mouth, and nose—dead horses in one place, human heads in another—arms here, legs there, and death every where. The French ground was strewn with hundreds—in fact, all that can be painted, played, written, or read, falls far short of the description. The fighting is delightful—the following day horrifying. We are here within cannon-range of Sebastopol batteries—at this moment a shell has burst about three hundred yards off where I am writing. We expect to open five every day—we are landing our siege-guns—we laugh, sing, and talk as merrily as at home. There are supposed to be 80,000 men in the town: we wish we had them outside, and we'd make quick work of them; we beat about 60,000 from a splendid position, under the great disadvantage of crossing a river, a burning village, and climbing up hills steeper than Patrick's hill going to Cork. I am in good health; hope you are the same—kiss Kate for me. I had no pay this month (September). I can not tell when I can send any. When I do—which will be as soon as possible—I will direct to Miss G. For God's sake, send me a sheet of paper and envelop. I was offered 4s. 2d. for a sheet, and would not give it. Tobacco is offered any money for, and can not be had. We have no tents; we wrap our blankets round us and lie on the ground; the days are hot and the nights very cold and dewy. I can not promise to write again; if I live, of course I will."

Yet one other "amateur" view we give, of the camp-life before the siege-batteries had opened fire. The writer has almost a smack of the Eothen drollery:

"I have slept eleven nights under my little tent, of which you see the portrait in the foreground. I have eaten much fried ham, cheese, figs, pickles, biscuit, and ketchup sauce. My great leather bottle of brandy was drunk out by marauders in my absence. I have lost my twelve-and-sixpenny pony, who gave me a great deal of trouble, picketing in distant valleys for a little grass, losing him overnight, and hunting him in the morning. My health is neither better nor worse. We have had beautiful weather, with the exception of the night before last and all yesterday, which was as terribly bleak, drizzly, grizzly, leaden-colored, gusty, blustery weather as could be, threatening snow, which seemed to be slowly moving down upon us in heavy bolsters from the mountains. It gave us a most bitter foretaste of what the winter will be when it comes, as it may now any day, and make us all the more thankful now our fine warm sun has returned this morning. I am sitting in my tent in (flannel) shirt-sleeves, rather too hot than otherwise, and quite jolly and comfortable. When you read in the columns of 'own correspondents' about his writing under fire, with shot and shell dropping around, and the screech of winged messengers of death in his ears, think nothing at all of his valor, for practically, these distant sprinklings of spent balls and sputtering shell do not kill more than a man or two in a fortnight, and are so constantly whizzing, and popping to so little purpose, that the mind gets weary of being alarmed. When one comes very near, it excites a little emotion, which, in these dull days, passes for amusement, and makes us more cheerful. Last Sunday, as I was making my coffee at Sir G. Brown's fire, there was a very loud pop, out of which came (as light comes out of a cloud) a very long screech, which grew louder and louder, till a great round shot whistled about five yards over my head, and fell about five-and-twenty yards from my tent. This is the nearest that has happened to me in the course of ten to twelve days passed within range. At church, while all the light division were drawn up in a hollow square, waiting for the clergyman, shot and shell fell about us so close that it was thought advisable to move a few hundred yards backward. A stout, well-fed priest in flowing robes appeared, and read through the service, with his back turned to Sebastopol, with a full, sonorous voice that never changed or faltered as the long screech approached, which, as long as it lasts, may be bringing destruction. The service, under such circumstances, was very impressive. We expected the fighting was to begin on the morrow, and the feeling that it was the last service many of us might hear—nay, that an extra pinch of powder might send a shell to kill fifty or sixty of us on the spot—gave great weight to any allusions to the uncertainty of life. The sermon was very poor. It professed to be extempore, and had not a single metaphorical allusion to the shells, which our plucky pastor had not courage to fashion an unpremeditated mention of, however little he might wince at their actual approach. 'Give peace in our time, O Lord!' sounded remarkable with a congregation of some thousands in the trappings of war, many of them never to see any more peace in this world."

TURNING now from those darker matters which have engaged almost the whole thought of Europe in the month last past, let us see if there be any newspaper-token of things gay, or things new, or things curious, with which we may point our periods and stuff our Chair.

First of all, our eye lights upon a sample chapter of a new book upon our American homes and habits, at the hands of an adventurous French lady, who signs herself Marie Fontenay, and who proclaims as the title to her forthcoming volume Fleurs Américaines.

What could have tempted Madame Marie Fontenay to tear herself away from Provencal cookery, with its delicate flavor of garlic—from fricasées of rabbit, à la sauce blanche—from her coppery oysters and chablis, for a visit to the barbarous America, where she appears to have traveled, we can not imagine.

We say where "she appears to have traveled;" since her book does not so much promise a legitimate record of a visit, as imaginative sketches of American scenes, lighted up with cursory observations on manners and character, and pointed with lively conceits.

Her initiatory chapter—her first "American Floweret"—bears the euphonious title of "Sarah Cardwell, the New-Yorkaise." She is presented to the reader as taking a familiar lunch at Taylor's saloon, with a bank clerk of Wall Street: she falls under the observation of a spirituel young Frenchman, reared in the Provencal kitchens, who admires excessively her tournure, and urges his companion (a French dry-goods trader) to present him. The French man of business complies at once, and a rosy acquaintance is opened in Taylor's saloon with the dashing Sarah Cardwell, who is represented as a type of the better class of New York society.

She invites the spirituel stranger to her father's house—waltzes with him energetically—flirts with him incontinently—confounds him with her boldness—charms him with her curls and complexion—bewitches him with her show of tenderness—and stultifies him in the end, by marrying a millionaire both ugly and old.

The impression conveyed to the fifty thousand readers of the Presse (where the initiatory chapter appears) would naturally be—that young ladies of respectable connections in New York society amuse themselves chiefly by eating immense quantities of crude apple-tarts, at Taylor's or otherwheres, in company with bank clerks—that they accept voraciously the advances of any adventurous young Frenchman—that they waltz with exceedingly bare shoulders—that their education is limited to French and Bloomerism—that they are rarely seen or attended by their parents—that they coquette much more violently and indecently than the grisettes of Paris—and finally, that they are destitute of all real affection, and fling themselves away in the end for a carriage and velvets.

The lady authoress relieves this general aim of her touching American drama by some very bitter observations upon the American style of cooking. The only quarter in New York where any thing really eatable is to be found, is in a retired restaurant of Grand Street, presided over by a gentleman from Provence. Ham, tobacco, and apple-tarts, according to Madame Fontenay, make up chiefly the American cuisine. From New Orleans to Albany nothing is to be found but meagre, insipid dishes—warmed over!

Think of it—says Madame Marie Fontenay—a people who breakfast at seven, and who dine at three in the afternoon; who know no soups but oyster soup; who eat with the end of their knives; who break eggs in a wine-glass; who prefer ham to truffled partridges, and whisky to Bordeaux wine! who never take supper; and who, for delicacies, have only apple-tarts!

This is almost equal to Mr. Daniel's late diplomatic account of the people of Turin.

But Madame Marie Fontenay is not only incensed about the kitchens—notwithstanding the largest part of her souvenirs appear to reside in the stomach.

The Americans have no ear or taste for music: at the Opera she observed that the audience was chiefly composed of cultivated French people. New Yorkers did, indeed, once throng to the concerts of Jenny Lind—chiefly, however, out of regard to Mr. Barnum, who was the manager, and partly from the pride they took in paying extravagant prices.

The most enterprising and fervent Americans are, in her view, the Frenchmen who have expatriated themselves. All others lead a miscellaneous and depraved existence between oysters, apple-tarts, and ham—chiefly the tarts.

The ladies, she admits, are pretty up to the age of five-and-twenty, after which they are insufferably ugly. (Il ne reste plus qu'une laideur à peine supportable.)

Their conversation impresses her even more unfavorably than their countenances. Finding herself one day in a very elegant American saloon (hardly that of the restaurateur in Grand Street, we suppose), she observed two richly-dressed ladies conversing with great animation. She tried to overhear the subject of so cheerful a talk. (J'essayai d'écouter leur conversation.)

"It's very warm to-day, Emma," said one, laughing.

"Oh, very warm indeed!" returned the other, overcome with merriment.

Upon this, our French lady retired, having gained an interesting incident for her Fleurs Américaines.

In the course of her narrative our authoress introduces us further to an evening "meeting" of ladies and gentlemen, who represent the advanced social tendencies of America. It appears that the coquettish Miss Sarah Cardwell—whether from the exigencies of the story, or her own inclination—is an habitué at these gatherings, and conducts thither the adventurous young gentleman of Provence.

The speaking at this extraordinary soirée is variously diverted to Bloomerism, Slavery, Mr. Greeley, Temperance, Seduction, Peace, and the Fourth of July. On another occasion the parties to the drama attend a lecture from the "Rev. B——" upon the horrors of slavery, upon the eve of which we are entertained by a pretty scenic interview between the philanthropic young New-Yorkaise and her French lover; in which the first is represented as reposing upon the shoulder of the young man, and murmuring honeyed words in his ear.

Of course it was spirituel on his part; something better than "It's very warm to-day, Emma."

We have thrust our pen through this bit of foolery belonging to Madame Fontenay—first, to show the overgrown conceit, as well as ignorance, of very many French travelers among us; and next, to hint that if New York ladies wish to keep the reputation of their daughters intact, they should watch more closely than they do the names and the nationality of their associates.

MADAME FONTENAY'S drama—of which we have sketched the outline—is redolent of garlic and of kitchen fumes generally: the odor reminds us of the late changes which have come over the Restaurant-world of Paris. Time was, and not long ago, when every stranger was annoyed by the multiplicity of dishes from which he was compelled to make sudden choice. Nothing, indeed, could be more perplexing to a newly-arrived foreigner, with only a modicum of French, than to have placed under his eye a Carte du Jour covering some thirty closely-printed pages, and to be compelled in the heat of his hunger, and under the eye of an inquisitive garçon, to make out his tale of a dinner.

The matter is now regulated to his hand, at least by the newly-established restaurateurs. Every day at two, a huge board is posted at their doors, giving the list of the dinner for the day. There is a soup, a fish, a boiled dish, two plates of vegetables (with their cognate English names), a dish of roast, a salad, and dessert. The price is named, and the hour at which they can be served: the faneur has only to note them, consider them, and, strolling on, to compare them with the affiche of a brother restaurateur, and so make choice at his leisure.

Still another novelty belongs to the great eating-place of the "World's Exhibition"—already installed in advance in magnificent saloons of the Rue Lafitte. It is under the control of a joint-stock company, regularly incorporated, and shares in which are issued at twenty dollars each.

Every shareholder, besides being entitled to his proportion of the yearly profits, has liberty to dine at a minimum price (affixed for stockholders only); and furthermore, can at any time consume the amount of his capital invested, at par, in five franc dinners.

Rumor says the company is in an exceedingly flourishing condition, and has shareholders in every department in France.

FROM table to lodgings the slip of our pen is easy; the furor of lodging-house keepers, which infected the London world when the Hyde Park Exhibition was promised, has now, they tell us, found its way to Paris, and the rental of Boulevard or Rivoli has run up to a fabulous sum. It may even happen that the ugly character of the Crimea advances, and the continued shipments of men from the ports of Toulon and Marseilles, may have their effect in reducing rates; if not, the Exposition will prove a dear one to the stranger as well as to the Government.

Meantime, however, the great Hotel of Europe, which flanks the palace of the Louvre, is being pushed forward with an Aladdin-like rapidity; and there is promise that, by the first of May, the great waste-ground which, in mid-July, showed no sign of material of construction, will be covered with a vast block containing no less than twelve hundred rooms for strangers.

And it will give a feeling of security to the lodger, even upon the sixth floor, to know that not a particle of wood is used in the construction, saving only for the doors and the window-fittings. When shall we be able to say as much of a New York hotel, and not be frightened with the thought of the yellow pine beams, which are every year baking for some future illumination?

LIGHTER Paris gossip is sadly in arrears for the month last past; we can not read of a single piquant scandal; and the anxious holding of the breath, which belongs to the expectation of war-news, seems to have palsied the tongues and the pens of all the gossip-mongers of the capital.

In this dearth we seize eagerly upon a bit of street-talk, which belonged, a fortnight ago, to a bridal array at the Church of the Madeleine.

The bride was pretty and piquant, with a robe from the best modistes, and in a blaze of diamonds. The husband had three-fold her years, and wore a wig, which concealed imperfectly enough the ravages of a long and a loose life.

It was not a contrast, however, to surprise a French circle of friends, or greatly to disturb them; nor would the street-talk have warned itself into inquiry, if there had not been dropped a hint, from some injudicious acquaintance of the parties, of a piquant drama which belonged to the story of the marriage.

Mademoiselle V— (a good letter to point a blank with) was pretty, as we said, and piquant. She was well connected, but was not blessed with a rich parentage, and could have little hope of a heavy dot.

But her face and grace brought admirers; among them a certain Monsieur T—, young, hopeful, and weak enough, as the story goes, to form a serious attachment for a pretty woman of one-and-twenty, who had neither fortune nor expectations. Mademoiselle V—, who was the subject of this attachment, had grown blindly and injudiciously into a reciprocation of this feeling; and between themselves, their engagement was counted secured.

Neither could boast of fortune; but both had youth; and a rational affection seemed to cement the tie.

It is true, the young lover had his misgivings about his ability to supply the wants of a household, or the demands of a young girl whose air was always elegant, and whose mise (the only English word is, "getting up") were always the trace of the daintiest hands of the daintiest modistes of Paris.

But the love, or the what-not, kept him and kept her, long-while, to their plighted faith. At length, on an evil day (he counted them very gleeful), the lover learned that an old bachelor uncle of his own, who had long lived quietly in the metropolis, in very humble quarters, had suddenly become possessed, by his ventures at the Bourse, of a vast fortune. He was his only heir; and, from the kindly way in which he had been always met by the new-made millionaire, could have no doubt that his inheritance was secured.

This security made him ponder sagely—a fortune in Paris opens brilliant expectations, both matrimonial and otherwise. The pretty girl he had loved could boast no coronet in her name; coronets were matters of purchase, specially by a young man of amiable feeling and a full purse.

In short, quietly and gradually the young Monsieur T— discontinued his visits; he purchased a dashing equipage; he was seen in the beau-monde; he wrote an exculpatory line to his fiancée—concealing, indeed, the change in his moneyed prospects—lamenting that they were both without resources; fearing their marriage might prove a sad one to her; proposing, in gentle terms, the common relinquishment of their promises until better times should dawn.

Mademoiselle V—, with something of a woman's softness perhaps, had a French finesse, and felt very vengefully, as a French woman will, her wounded pride. Her reply was collected even to gayety; she recognized fully the justice of his conclusions, admired the candor of his action, and released him from his promise.

Never was Mademoiselle V— more gay and lively than the summer past; never was her dress so soignée; never her smiles more abundant. Most of all, her attractiveness of manner was lavished upon an old gentleman of sixty odd years, who wore a wig that but illy concealed the furrows in his face. A bachelor, and newly admitted into the coveted regions of the Chausée d'Autin, he was bewitched by the naïveté and the beauty of the pretty Mademoiselle V—, who honored him with such marked regard.

In short, she won her way to the heart of the old millionaire, and in such triumphal way that she made her own terms of conquest—secured the settlement of his whole fortune (in case of his death) upon herself; and, in this way, had the satisfaction of taking a womanly vengeance upon her former lover, who, by her marriage in the Madeleine, had become the penniless dependent upon his uncle—her husband.

And this was what made the side-chat of those who looked on at the ceremonial. The story is unquestionably true, since the parties are said to be living on the second floor of the house which stands at the corner of the Rue de la Chausée d'Autin and the Boulevard, where they can be seen any day in the week by those who know them.

YET another feathery bit of gossip we catch on our pen point and fasten to paper:

Young Amedée, a poor and almost friendless student of medicine, came to Paris at the close of the autumn vacations, to finish his provincial education by following Chomel and Velpeau in the metropolitan wards.

He brought a single letter of introduction to an old lady-connection of his father's, living a solitary and dismal life in an old house of the Place Royale. The lady received her raw kinsman in a stately way, and gave him formal invitation to come to her lodgings on a given evening of every week, at which time, and which time only, she would be happy to receive him.

The province student, too poor not to be grateful for even the slightest favor, came on the appointed evening to her house, where he met two or three quaintly-dressed old gentlemen, and as many old ladies, who appeared to make up the circle of the hostess's acquaintance.

"Do you play whist?" said one of these old-time people to the student.

The provincial was compelled to say, awkwardly, that he did not. The avowal seemed to produce an unpleasant effect upon the company; most of all upon the hostess, who made no effort to relieve the embarrassment of her young kinsman, or to relieve the tedium of an evening whiled away over the play of his respectable entertainers.

As he arranged his cloak in the ante-room, however, an old gentleman of the party, who was also making ready for his departure, said to the poor student.

"Do you wish a bit of sound advice, young man?"

"I should be very glad of it," returned the provincial.

"Very well," continued the old man, seriously, "learn to play whist!"

With this bit of advice, and this only, to regale himself with after his evening's entertainment, the young man reflected, that considering his friendless condition, and the resources which even a dull game might offer once in a week, he would learn whist.

He learned whist; and at his next presentation in the mouldy apartment of his kinswoman, was able to take a hand at the table. The old lady was evidently softened toward him. Upon a succeeding evening, however, when a storm had prevented all the guests from arriving, and a full table was lacking, he was obliged to avow his ignorance of piquet, and declined the play.

The old lady thereupon gave him a piece of advice in her turn, and it was to learn piquet.

The room at the old house had now become a habit with him, and he learned piquet.

Every week saw him at the old lady's table; but whether at whist or at piquet, he soon observed that it was his bad fortune always to be loser. To be sure the stakes were only to the amount of a few sous the game; but in the course of a long evening's play he found that it sadly diminished his very limited pocket-money.

One evening he sat at play with his old kinswoman, wondering over his constant losses, when he fancied he detected a dexterous trick of the hostess, which gave her the winning cards and the command of the game. Watching more closely, he, to his horror, became assured of this. The old lady saw, by his air of dismay, that he had detected her false play, but with only a confused blush, she retained her composure, and continued the game.

The young student determined, in the heat of his indignation, to abandon the acquaintance; but upon reflection, considering again his friendless condition, and the small gains which, after all, were won from him, depriving him only of an occasional bench at the theatre, or a half bottle of Maçon to his dinner, he continued his visits to the ancient neighborhood, and his play with his cheating kinswoman.

By-and-by the old lady sickened and died. A solicitor summoned the young student of medicine to his chambers, where he informed him that he was named a legatee under the old lady's will.

He counted it a pleasant restitution of her informal earnings, and hardly hoped that there would be much besides. But in gratitude for his pleasant companionship, and his delicate consideration for her foibles at cards, she had, it appeared, named him sole heir to an estate of twenty thousand francs a year!

This story is as true as the last; and the happy legatee, having abandoned Chomel and Velpeau, now drives a dashing tilbury, with a tiger in white-topped boots behind him, and may be seen on almost any day of the week whirling through the avenue of the Champs Elysées.

Editor's Drawer.

ROGER WILLIAMS somewhere says (we turn it from the prose form into verse):

"One grain of time's inestimable sand
Is worth a golden mountain."

It is curious, by the way, how much prose writing there is (and this is especially the case with the old English writers), which runs, with scarcely the transposition of a word, into blank verse. Thus Owen Feltham, in his "Resolves," exhorting his reader to overcome the fear of death, says, otherwise we shall "Dally, with the fear of dying, die.

To put off death is not in man to do.
Fired late, without him, deems him once to die.
The decree is past, and no appeal is left."

There is a striking example of the same near the close of Dickens's Martin Chuzzlewit. As in the former instance we keep the exact order of the author's words, only breaking his prose into verse:

"Thy life is tranquil, calm and happy, Tom.
In the soft strain which ever and again
Comes stealing back upon the ear,
The memory
Of time old love may find a voice, perhaps:
But it is
A pleasant, softened, whispering memory,
Like that in which we sometimes hold the dead,
And does not pain or grieve thee, God be thanked!"

The semi-versification may have been intentional in this latter case; but numerous instances might be quoted where prose thus runs unconsciously into verse, affording an argument for Wordsworth's bold dictum, that "Prose and verse are not essentially different kinds of writing."

WESLEY said that "ten thousand cares were no more weight to his mind than ten thousand hairs were to his head." Was it he or Whitfield, who, when asked whether a man was answerable for bad thoughts, replied, "I can not help the birds flying over my head, but I can prevent their making nests in my hair."

SOME one suggested as an appropriate epitaph for Hume, who was skeptical as to the reality of matter:

"Beneath this round idea,
Vulgarily called a tomb,
Ideas and impressions lie
Which constituted Hume."

A conundrum occurs to us here, which we once made: "Why is the Atlantic a confirmation of Berkeley's doctrine of the ideality of matter? Because it's merely a notion (an ocean)." And this reminds us of a series of questions and answers, well illustrating the spirit of a certain age:

What is mind?—No matter.

What is matter?—Never mind.

What is spirit?—That's quite immaterial.

As to the creed of the materialist, one would think there could be no better cure for it than to see it engraved on a tombstone, as it is in a certain cemetery in New England, as follows:

"THE HUMAN FORM,
RESPECTED FOR ITS HONESTY (!), AND KNOWN FOR FORTY-THREE YEARS
UNDER THE APPELLATION OF KESGAN TO DISSOLVE"

Then the date.

THE old Roman, Pliny, in one of his letters, well states an argument which has been sometimes recurring to wise men's thoughts in these latter days: "For opinions are counted, not weighed; nor is any other course practicable in politics, where nothing is so unequal as equality itself."

It may sound paradoxical to say, what however is true, that standing on ceremony is one extreme, and trampling on it is another.

HERE are some Oriental proverbs:

A friend—one soul, two bodies.

The bosoms of the wise are the tombs of secrets.

The pen is a tree whose fruit is expression.

Learning to have, and wisdom to lack,

Is a load of books on an ass's back.

The miser is God's enemy, though he be a monk.

Whose carriage is greediness, his companion is beggary.

It is an interesting fact that the word piety, among the old Romans, meant family affection, whether on the part of children or parents, or of brothers and sisters toward each other.

"A LOGICIAN and a swimmer," says a Persian story, "were in a boat together. Said the logician to the swimmer, 'Have you ever studied logic?' 'I never heard the name till now,' was the reply. 'Alas!' said L., 'then has half your life been drowned in ignorance!' Just then a squall came up. Said S. to L., 'Have you ever learned any thing of swimming?' 'Nothing but logic,' was the reply. 'Alas!' said S., 'then the whole of your life is drowned!'"

The moral of this, our teacher told us, is, that logicians sometimes get beyond their depth.

ANOTHER: "A physician being taken sick, his neighbors came in great numbers to see him, and sat a long time by his bedside. This annoyed him very much. At length one of the company, suspecting it, said, 'Hakeem Sahib (Sir Doctor), have you no farewell advice to give us?' 'Yes,' he replied, 'when you make visits, don't sit too long.'

ONE more: "A certain person had a friend who was a miser. One day he said to him, 'I am going a journey—give me your ring, then I shall always have you near me; for whenever I look upon it, you will come to my remembrance.' The miser made answer: 'If you wish to keep me in remembrance, as often as you look at your naked finger, remember that you asked a certain person for his ring, and he refused to give it to you!'"

A VERY bad pun occurs in a verse of Sale's translation of the Koran, where the Lord says, speaking of Solomon (who was King of the Genii, and a great hero among the Mohammedans): "And we also subjected unto his command divers of the devils who might dive to get pearls for him." What a dull ear Father Sale must have had!

A NOTE to the Koran relates the following legend: "The angel of death passing once by Solomon in a visible shape, and looking at one who was sitting with him, the man asked who he was, and upon Solomon's acquainting him that it was the angel of death, said, 'He seems to want me, wherefore order the wind to carry me from hence into India;' which, being accordingly done, the angel said to Solomon, 'I looked so earnestly at the man out of wonder; because I was commanded to take his soul in India, and found him with thee in Palestine.'"

ROMANCE OF THE REVIEWER.

(From the German of Uhland.)

Bold Reviewer, knight so valiant,
Mounts his horse, of mettle good,
Though no steed from Andalusia,
'Tis a hobby-horse of wood.

For a sword, a pen well-pointed,
From his ear he draws for fight,
And a mask, instead of visor,
Hides his eye's terrific light.

Lo! his lady fair, the Public,
Danger thousand-fold surrounds:—
Now a Siegfried's dragon, snorting,
Threatens her with barbarous wounds;

Now with lute-tones, soft and treacherous,
Wooes her fair a sonneteer;
Now a monk, with mystic preaching,
Crazes and confounds her ear.

Bold Reviewer, knight so valiant,
Tames the dragon's fiery pride,
Breaks the lute in thousand splinters,
Hurts the monk o'er pulpit-side.

Yet the hero, greatly modest,
Wills that none shall speak his name,
Scarcely one enigmatic pen-stroke
Shows his shield to waiting fame.

Bold Reviewer, rock of refuge,
Be to us forever true!
Take for payment Heaven's blessing,
And the publisher's pension too!

ORIGINAL CONUNDRUMS.

1. WHY are mankind like cows?
Because they have calves.
2. What two letters of the alphabet describe a faded loaf?

C D (Seedy).

8. Why is a spirited war-horse, when he hears the signal for battle, like a father refusing his boy's request to stay at home from school?

He answers with a Nay (neigh).

4. What marked event in modern literature is calculated to injure the cause of Temperance?

The free circulation of Punch among the thinking part of the community.

5. Why is it impossible that there should be one best horse in the world?

Because at every race-course you'll find a better.

6. When may two people be said to be half-witted?

When they have an understanding between them.

7. Why is a provident man like a monkey?

Because he's forehanded (four-handed).

8. Why are the names of the Jewish tribes like the serpents in India?

Because they're found in Numbers.

9. What singular assortment of wild beasts is mentioned in the table of Troy weight?

12 ounces in one pound.

10. If the letters of the alphabet were accused of combining to form wicked words, which one of their number, and in what language of Shakspeare, would they all unite in exculpating?

"Thou canst not say I did it."

11. What is the difference between a flock of sheep in the fold at night, and the words written in a letter?

The former are penned up, and the latter are penned down.

12. When should a common manual laborer expect higher wages than the President of the United States?

When he's engaged for higher (hire).

13. When may a German boor be pronounced dead drunk?

When he sleeps on his beer (bier).

14. Why is a vulture superior to the man who shoots him?

Because the vulture is a foul creature, but the man who shoots him is a fouler (fowler).

15. Why is a man who marries twice like the captain of a ship?

Because he has a second mate.

16. Why is an empty discourse like a solid one?

Because it is all sound.

17. Why are the cook's tongs in a ship like great mosquitoes?

Because they are galley nippers.

18. Why is a book of conundrums, in a dull company, like a man's inviting a large party and having none come?

Because there's a host put out and not one guest (guessed).

19. Why are the meadows in spring like an American Revolutionary hero?

Because they're one general green.

20. Where were the Tanglewood Papers written?

By a hawthorn in a pleasant style (stille).

21. Why are some of the boats in New Bedford harbor probably like the head of Victoria's eldest son?

Because they contain the prints of whales' teeth (the Prince of Wales' teeth).

22. When Shakspeare's mother wished him to confess a theft, what distinguished character did she hold up before him?

William, Tell.

23. Why are tame ducks like the eggs of wild ones?

Because they make water foul (water-fowl).

EVERY body has heard of the famous echo of the Irishman, which, when interrogated "How d'ye do?" would answer, "Pretty well, I thank you;" but we know of a real echo, which, if you ask it "What remedy is there for the evils under which we labor?" invariably answers, "Labor!"

A RECENT traveler up the Mississippi, having been disappointed in his attempt to get a view of Natchez, as the boat stopped a moment under the bluff, reports as follows:

The town of Natches
We saw by matches,
Up over the bluff,
Which wasn't enough;
But we couldn't see more,
For the shape of the shore Prevented,
So we had to be contented.

The same odd genius, having taken passage in the crack steamer Eclipse, seemed to hear her saying all the way to Louisville:

Hurry, skurry! I'm the Eclipse,
That every fortnight makes two trips;
Should like to see the boat that whips
The E-e-e-e-e Eclipse.

WHAT a strange, paradoxical thing Time is! The more you have to do, in a given time, the more time you have left. Time is like an India-rubber bag; the more you crowd into it, the more it will hold.

WE once received an invitation to a Lecture, to be delivered

At 7½ o'clock, P. M.,
By William Hill, A. M.

THE Chinese language expresses the idea of government by a hieroglyphic compounded of two, the one signifying bamboo, and the other to thwack. The word for Barber, in the same language, is Thi, compounded of to, to cut, and ty, respect; the man who trims the respectability.

THE pride of man, says a quaint old German writer, is a singular thing, and not so easy to put down; for if you stop up the hole A, it will peep out, before you think of it, at the hole B; and when you have closed that up, it will run round quicker than thought, and be standing all ready at hole C; and so on.

THE same shrewd writer says, "What makes it especially agreeable to write romances is, that in that way, whatever opinions one wishes to have go out into the world, he can always find a man to father them."

"THE sand in the hour-glass reminds us not only of the swift flight of time, but also of the dust into which we are one day to crumble."

THEY tell us to wait—that time will bring what we want. Friends, time will ripen the corn; but time will not plow the field.

"LIONS and despots see sharper in the dark than in the day."

"CHASTE, cold, and pale as the moon is the German people; chaste because cold, cold because pale, and pale because bloodless. Doctor Howard, in America, has discovered that the rays of the moon have warmth; but only by a burning glass could he succeed in making it act on the thermometer. But where is there a burning glass big enough to hold over the heads of thirty million men? The Liberation-war was such a one."

"THE Germans are always later than other nations in reaching an object, be it in art, science, or politics. Not that they did not know the shortest way, or trudged on too lazily; the reason why they are so much longer in getting to the goal is, that they start so much further back. They always proceed from first principles; and if a grease-spot is to be removed from the coat-sleeve, they study the chemistry first, and study so long and so thoroughly, that while they are doing it the coat falls to rags. But that is just the thing for them—they take the rags and make writing-paper. They turn every thing into paper."

Is there not an admirable moral in this of Börne's? "A rusty shield prayed to the sun: Sun, illuminate me! But the sun said to the shield: Purify thyself!"

"THE credit of having introduced the French Revolution has been ascribed to the philosophers. It is as if one should say, Sunday is the cause of Monday. Whenever new truths appear among men, they become visible first on the towering minds, as the rising sun illumines first the summits of the mountains. Now the enemies of the light think, if there had been no mountains, there would have been no day."

BÖRNE, in his letters from Paris, says, of course without being aware that he was making a pun for an English reader: "Madame Constant (wife of Benjamin) has had three husbands. The first she lost by death, from the second she was divorced, the third was Constant."

(From the German of Claudius.)

EPIGRAPH ON A WIND-MILLER.

The miller Jackson lies buried here!
He lived on wind, with wife and children small;
And many others live on it, that's clear,
Who have no mill at all.

COMPARISON.

Voltaire and Shakespeare: one of them
Is what the other seems.
I weep, says Master Arouet,
While Shakespeare's full eye streams.

HINE AND KUNZ.

KUNZ. How many doctors may there be in Paris?
I think a hundred, or somewhere near.
HINE. More, more, most certainly, good neighbor,
For, only think, the list of deaths in Paris
Is twenty thousand every year.
Break not thy head with labor sore;
But break thy will, for that is more.

LYRICAL TO MY DEAD DOG.

Alard is gone!—my swimming eyes run over
With tears of melancholy dim!
Alas, that the cold ground must cover
A dog like him!
That faithful one! how friendly he behaved him!
He clung to me in the last hour!
Gladly would I from death have saved him—
I had no power!

How oft I've sate, when none but he was near me,
At midnight, by the old oak tree;
Alard, I love thee yet!—dost hear me?
I'll bury thee
In that same spot, where spirit-whispers creep, Answered my dreams, and shared them, too.
Shine softly, moon, upon his sleeping!
The dog was true.

I flatter myself that I have not quite failed of infusing into this translation from the old Matthias Claudius something of the touching tenderness and simplicity of the venerable original.

EXTRACTS FROM THE NOTE-BOOK OF A READER AT SEA.

... My principal literary occupation to-day was reading a beautiful English volume called "Arctic Miscellanies," a book made up out of a MS. newspaper, edited monthly by the officers and seamen of Captain Ommaney's ship Assistance, which went out, with others, under the general command of Captain Austin, to seek for Franklin, and was wedged in by the ice from September, '50, to August, '51. Was struck with one piece (now invested with a painful interest), in which the writer expresses his own ardent hope of rescuing Sir John, in the form of a dream, supposed to be related by the lost navigator, and entitled "FRANKLIN'S VISION." The author's prose, with very few changes, melted into blank verse, as follows:

Sleep and oblivion o'er my wasted form
Their sense-annihilating mantle cast,
And Memory, with her sister Fancy's aid,
Retouched the picture of departed days.

The huge blank front of ice, that reared around
A barrier insurmountable, seemed rent,
And through the opening of the melted wall
Stole a sweet sunlight, soft with tints of morn.
A gentle zephyr's pure, warm, fragrant breath
Melted with its soft caress the yielding mass.
Now brighter shines the color-giving sun,
And through the heavy air harmonious tones
Of woman's long-lost voice steal o'er my soul
With thousand overwhelming memories.
Hot tears of love, streaming from well-known eyes,
Pass freely through the treacherous elements,
Commencing in the ecstasy of joy.
Nearer and nearer still the air-borne sounds
And home-like fragrance come—while in the dim
And lowering distance the dread region fades.
Lo! gentle Spring has decked the barren spot
With flowers that we in laughing childhood plucked.
Here, in gay garments clad, the light, the hope
Of life's bright dawn draws nigh; her buoyant step,
Firm with humanity, yet light, as wing'd
With hope deferred, scarce leaves its print behind—
She, bending, stretches toward my weary frame
Her soothing hand. . . .

What strange, rough forms are these?
What faces strange peer through these shaggy garbs?
Oh, let me dream again! Ha, whence that shout
That makes the very silence seem more void?
Ah! can it be the old, familiar tones
Of my almost forgotten native tongue?
Sweet dream! thou hast foreshadowed things to come!
No beautiful form tends her fair, helping hand;
Yet, in what shape soever thou dost come,
ASSISTANCE, thou art welcome to my soul,
For wearied, baffled hope had well-nigh sunk
In the blank, boundless ocean of despair!

Spent a good part of the day with that pleasant philosopher, old Gilbert White of Selborne. How charming is the freshness and simplicity of his very phrases! Of the reed-sparrow he records: "A sweet polyglott, but hurrying; it has the notes of many birds." Of the nightingale: "Its beautiful song is the result of long attention to the melody of the elder birds of its species." There is a deal of poetry in the old man's homely, quaint expressions, as where he says he found a falcon "nailed up at the end of a barn, which is the countryman's museum." His description of the field-mouse's nest, that "was so compact and well-filled that it would roll across the table without being discomposed, though it contained eight little mice that were naked and blind;" his minute observations on the swallow, the bat, the stone-curlew, that lays its eggs right on the ground, and, when its young are hatched, hurries them off to some flinty field, where they skulk among the stones, and escape detection by their resemblance to them; and finally, the humorous hits at Timothy, the tortoise—these are but a few specimens of the vast variety of curious and beautiful things which will repay the readers of "White's Natural History of Selborne." . . .

After dinner began the book which has been so many months lying, like an uncut plum-cake before the self-denying schoolboy's eye, the Autobiography of the Painter Haydon. One's skepticism is excited a little in reading these novel-like lives, by the fact that the very oddities and notabilities one would have wished to see and hear, e.g. Wilkie, and West, and Northcote, and Fuseli, appear just at the right time. One would greatly err who should suppose that any man's life ever moved on at the epic pace which Haydon's representation gives to his—I refer particularly to his early years. "Fond memory" singles out those salient points on which the presiding spirit of the after career throws back special glory, and speeds from peak to peak of the life-landscape, neglecting the commonplace valleys beneath and between. . . .

Devoted most of the day to Haydon. Was he not bent upon taking the kingdom of (his) heaven (of perfection in the historic department of painting) by violence? What does he mean when, after saying of his "Judgment of Solomon," "It was a victory in every sense of the word," he adds, "I did not command bayonets and cannon; would to God I had?" What is the meaning of that "melancholy utinam," as Sir Thomas Browne would have called it? Would he have swept away that plaguy Academy, and brought the noble and fashionable world to its senses? Ah, Benjamin! there is too much of this world about thee! Thou hast not yet attained to that highest art—the know thyself. . . .

Haydon is a very pithy describer. Witness his picture of Dieppe and its old women—"Neither born of woman nor made for man;" and of the Russian sailors, who, when they laughed, looked like animals. . . .

Took several more great bites into my plum-cake—Haydon's life. Saw him into jail and out again. What a jumble of prayers, passions, prejudices, lovings and hatings, criticisms, creditors, constables, does that journal present! I find that one of my comments has anticipated the editor, who says: "Haydon prays as if he would take heaven by storm"—"his very pious had something stormy, arrogant, and self-assertive in it."—Some more of Haydon's happy hitings-off of character: He shows up "the Duke of Sussex with a star on his breast, and the asthma inside of it, wheezing out his royal opinions." When his child is born, he hears "a peaked cry, as of a little helpless being who felt the air, and anticipated the anxieties, and bewailed the destiny of inexorable humanity." . . .

Finished the second volume of Haydon. An anecdote of Wordsworth I never heard before. "Davy, do you know why I published my White Doe in quarto?" "No." "To express my opinion of it." What word-portraits Haydon throws off in a phrase of the celebrities that sate to him. How well acquainted we become with Melbourne, with O'Connell—who has "an eye like a weasel's"—with Jeffrey, and with that reformer who introduced himself, and insisted upon being put into the great picture; to say nothing of Brougham and Wellington. What children the man must have had, according to his own account. Think of Frank, who, when two and a half years old, his father having said to him, as they walked by a grave-yard—"There's where we both must lie," replied, "But, father, you first." Then think of Harry, whom he so mourns, who had such a passion for the memory of Napoleon, having collected 200 pictures of him, which he perused every day after dinner; and who talked with rapture of a charge of cavalry—and died at the age of three and a half! . . .

Resumed Haydon, and finished the third volume. Thus have I lived one more life within a week, and what a life! Here is a man who finishes writing his life, and then finishes it in sad reality. He writes FINIS—black on white—in his journal, and then in red ink on his silver locks. After all, if one looked at this tragedy irrespectively of the hero's responsibility, it would seem as if the catastrophe must be pronounced in keeping. But the moral lesson of such a life is that "Order is Heaven's first law."

This giant refused to order his life in strict reference to the supremacy of moral principle, and how could he expect the blessing? Well may the editor call his religionness a puzzle. How wildly praying and swearing are jumbled in his diary! Indeed, his very prayers are often profane and presumptuous—a sort of taking of the Holy Name in vain. . . .

Tapped another of the literary cakes I had laid up—De Quincey's Autobiographic Sketches. Read the chapter on his Childhood—the period he so beautifully calls "a mighty darkness and a sorrow without a voice." Never knew such good reading so hard to remember. Somebody says, however, it doesn't follow that you were not well fed yesterday, because you forget what you ate. . . .

Read eight books of Pope's Odyssey; charming sea-reading. A great deal of old Homer in it after all. Was curious sometimes which to credit for an idea, Pope or Homer; for example, in the case of that striking correspondence to the saying of David, "He that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord." Pope makes Homer say,

"By Jove the stranger and the poor are sent,
And what to these we give, to Jove is lent." . . .

Read in Bloomfield's Poems. Remember but one striking expression, and that was a line in his description of a skim-milk cheese, quite worthy of Crabbe. The tough article was tossed into the styck, where it was rejected by the nosing porkers, as "Too big to swallow, and too hard to bite."

How affecting is that saying recorded of Bloomfield's mother, that there were only three enemies she dreaded—Winter, Poverty, and Old Age! . . .

Took up Köhl's "Panorama of St. Petersburg"—well named, for it is a real daguerreotype of that singular city. The book, like Dr. Tschudi's Peru, is a striking specimen of the facility with which the German genius combines poetic play of the faculties in conception and illustration, with business-like accuracy in description and statistics—in two words, enthusiasm with exactness. What can be more perfect than his illustration of a stranger's first sensations in the streets of the great city: "He sees spacious streets, bordered by rows of mute palaces, with only here and there a human figure hovering about, like a lurking freebooter among a waste of rocks!"

THE DEATH OF THE COLONEL.
(From the Polish of Mitzkavitch.)

Before yon hut, with measured pace,
The sentry marches to and fro;
Crowds throng the door, and every face
Is pale with terror and with woe.

What hero, honored and renowned,
Within, upon his death-bed, lies?
Hark! a clear voice with trumpet sound,
Comes mingling with the mourners' cries:

"Saddle my steed once more for me,
Who shared with me so many a fight!
That noble steed, oh, let me see,
Before I close my eyes in night!

"My sword and belt, too, let them lie,
And all my trappings, at my side:
Gazing upon my arms will I Die as the brave Czarnecki died!"

And when the steed was led away,
The priest bore in the holy bread;
On bended knee the people pray—
The soldiers' cheeks are pale with dread.

Old scythemen who, without a tear,
Poured blood, in Kosciusko's day,
From their own veins and foemen's—here
Weep, as the parting prayers they say.

The chapel bell, at early dawn,
Toll for the parted soul they hear;
And now the soldiers all are gone,
For that the Muscovite is near.

Peasants crowd round the warrior dead,
He clasps the cross as when he died;
Upon his saddle rests his head,
His sword and fire-arms by his side.

But whence this virgin cheek, they said,
And bosom femininely fair?
Now save us, Heaven! It is a maid!
Emilia Plater slumbers there!

"A new Science of Nomenclology; or, Heraldry improved: being a way by which every man may ascertain the character or condition of his Post-Adamite Ancestry." This is the title of a work which we wonder some curious fellow doesn't undertake. If any should be disposed to, we furnish him hereby a few hints. Let him divide names into classes, as for instance, 1. Names derived from the residence of the family, such as the Hills, the Fields, the Bridges, the Lanes, the Streets, etc. 2. Names derived from occupations; the Fowlers, the Taylors (Tailors), the Sawyers, etc. 3. Names derived from office: the Popes, the Princes, the Sergeants, the Pearsons (Persons or Parsons). 4. Names derived from animals: the Bulls, the Wolves, the Crabbes, the Hawkes, etc. 5. Names derived from qualities: the Littles, the Blunts, the Brights, etc. 6. The nations: Mr. Dutch, Mr. French, Mr. Holland, etc. 7. Names derived from characteristics: as Foote, Shakspeare (it ought always to be written Shakespear), Crown-in-shield, etc. 8. Relationship: Tomkins (Tom's kin), Dixon (Dick's son), etc. Who will undertake the work? We will furnish several lists and hints.

We also wonder that no one has yet edited a "Blunder-Book," containing the odd, and so often felicitous mistakes of printers. We could furnish several that have happened to ourselves. On an occasion we gave a printed copy of some verses to be quoted, and the line to our astonishment came out in its new dress:

"Did thus the astonished Indian gaze on thee?"

"Die thus the astonished Indian on thee?"

Campbell gives a droll instance. A line of his

"They stamp like dragons to the charge."

was printed

"They stumpe like dragoons to the charge."

We once heard of a comical Irish erratum: "In our yesterday's paper for her Grace, the Duke of Dorset, read his Grace, the Duchess."

CHAMISSE, in one of the notes to his poems, gives a funny old French melody, of which the motto might be, "I had a little husband," etc. We have turned it into English as follows:

My father got a spouse for me,
My! such a little spouse was he,
I had to take a lamp to see Where in the bed my spouse could be.
I burned the bed—and, oh, dear me!
He came out roasted—hi! hi! hi!
I took and put him, do you see?
Under my table carelessly.
The cat comes in, and what does she
But runs off with him—hi! hi! hi!
I thought I should have died with glee—
A cat make such mistake to see,
A husband for a mouse—hi! hi!

A NEW WAY TO "KEEP ONE'S TEMPER." We remonstrated with our steward on the importance of keeping his temper. "Temper!" he exclaimed, catching the last word and flourishing, as he spoke, the carving-knife he was cleaning, as if to compare himself with that instrument—"temper!" he exclaimed, his eyes and the blade flashing in rivalry, "yes, I've got a temper, and I mean to keep it to my dying day."

SHAKSPEARE sings of Queen Bees,

"In maiden meditation, fancy free"— and a German poet, Gotter, sings for a somewhat different specimen of maiden independence as follows:

I am a maiden, fine and young,
And am, thank God, yet free;
Romantic raptures never flung
Their witching spell on me.

My blood flows light; I love a jest,
I love to dance and sing;
My riches are a happy breast,
My jewels flowers of spring.

To good old mother Eve I hold;
Weak, trusting, vain as she:
Dear curiosity, seven-fold,
Her portion was to me.

At sight of man I'm not afraid:
How oft mamma would say,
For their sakes only we were made—
Creation's lords were they.

And so no stiff and stupid pride
Has e'er set foot in me;
To be a girl I'm satisfied,
Let others angels be!

HOW WORDSWORTH CAME TO WRITE THE "PREFACE."

When Wordsworth, master of the ethic lay,
Planned a great work that should survive his day,

Before his muse, on that "Excursion" bent,
Through England's fields, in quest of wisdom went (Say, rather, that incursion on the ground, Held by a school who gave up sense for sound)—
He, of all bards the most considerate one
That ever ripened in this earthly sun,
Sate coolly down, took out a new-laid ream
Of paper, and surveyed the mighty theme.
But ah, as he beheld that page so fair,
And dreamed of all that might be written there,
Like a white ghost, the vision of that scroll,
Pure as an infant mind, restrained his soul;
His thoughtful, feeling spirit quite unmanned,
The pen escaped his hesitating hand;
It fell upon the floor—while he gazed—
Then stooping down, the feathery tool he raised—
For lo! a gleam of hope had dawned, and now
Lift up a cheerful radiance on his brow.
"May I not write a poem first," said he,
"That I may know if I a poet be?"
A lucky thought! the bard began to write,
And so, at last, the PRELUDE saw the light!

ADDISON's fine Essay on Friendship contains the following spirited rendering of a passage from the old Roman poet Martial; which shows, by the way, that the countryman's remark—"There's a good deal of human nature in man"—was as true thousands of years ago as it now is:

"In all thy humors, whether grave or mellow,
Thou'rt such a testy, touchy, pleasant fellow,
Hast so much wit and mirth and spleen about thee,
There's no living with thee nor without thee."

HIM who can do what he will, we call a lucky man;
But he is the wise and great one, who will do what he can.

GIVE words to thy grief—so art thou relieved of it;
Give words to thy joy—so art thou bereaved of it.

TWO MINES.

I.

I would rather of wealth have a single drop
Than a hogshead of wisdom filled to the top.

II.

A drop of wisdom is dearer to me
Than a measure of fortune as deep as the sea.

The above sayings are translated from a German book called "Wisdom of the Morning and Evening Lands." (Beautiful expressions for East and West!)

PARSONS have always been among the most noted professors, or practitioners, of the art of punmanship. Severe study requires relief and provokes reaction—the grave leads to the gay and the severe to the lively—and they whose constant dealings with Scripture accustoms them to treat words as real things, who so often have to array them in the textual warfare of the sects and the schools, are naturally as likely as any to seek recreation and revenge by manœuvring them in the sham-fight of what Hood (or Lamb?) calls the Punic war. Old Mather Byles was perhaps the prince of our Yankee punsters. The old fellow seemed to carry about a sort of Byles's revolver with a hair-trigger. One day, as a company of British soldiers passed his house, the Doctor said he was glad to see that our wrongs were likely to be reddressed; and when some one said, "Ah, that won't do, you've used two d's," he instantly replied, "And who's a better right to D.D. than myself?" On another occasion he took some gentlemen up to show them the view from his cupola. "There," said he, "I call this my observatory, because from here I can observe a tory in any part of the city."

We once heard of a droll application of the words of a hymn, which, from the contrast of the three parties involved in it, must have been particularly effective in the first hearing. A clerical wag was present one Sunday, when a professional brother had a young beginner to preach for him. The next day, meeting his grave and prosaic friend, he said: "Brother Blank, I always knew that you were very felicitous in your occasional services, but I never heard you so happy as yesterday." Brother Blank looked very blank with surprise, and said, he really had not intended any thing especially pertinent to the occasion. "Well, then, it must have been a real inspiration, for don't you remember, as soon as that young man had ended his sermon, you got up and gave out the hymn beginning, 'Lord, what a feeble piece,' etc.?"

While on the subject of hymns, we may as well record one or two more parsons' jokes. It is said that, on a certain occasion, a good old minister who had somewhat outlived his popularity, having died, the senior deacon at the next conference-meeting read with great spirit the words of the well-known hymn of triumph on the taking away of the curse of the Law by the Gospel dispensation:

"Believing we rejoice

To see the curse removed."

We once heard a ludicrous illustration of the importance of right emphasis. A prosy parson read the following verse of Doddridge's hymn, laying the stress which we have indicated by Italics in such a marked manner that the effect may be readily imagined:

"The lamb he carries in his arms
And in his bosom bears."

Not the worst instance of mal-apropos-ity in the adaptation of hymns for the occasion, is that recorded of a clerical joker in New Hampshire. It is or was necessary in that State for a couple "intending matrimony" to have their purpose "published" beforehand from the pulpit. Once when our reverend friend had given notice of intention on the part of a couple to enter the holy state aforesaid, he followed the publication by giving out the hymn commencing—

"Mistaken souls who dream of bliss,
And make their empty boast."

Every one is familiar with the beautiful effect often produced in writing when the sound answers to the sense. We have often heard repeated a droll illustration of an attempt to realize something of the kind on the part of an old clergyman who would read as follows:

"In our vain passions, Lord, we fly
From vanities to vanities."

WE have often heard it said, but never met with it in the form of a proverb before the other day, in an old German rhyme:

A dinner party never must be Over 9 nor under 3.

THERE is too much truth in the following: Where money is, there is the devil, and where none is, there he is twice over.

To seize opportunity by the forelock is a familiar piece of advice: We lately saw, in an old book of wisdom, the fact upon which it is founded, viz., that "Opportunity has long hair in front and short hair behind." Too many men fancy that he wears a cue, but find out their mistake when they try to catch it.

Literary Notices.

The Knickerbocker Gallery (published by Samuel Hueston) has made its appearance in a splendid octavo volume, and, apart from the merit of the literary contributions which form its contents, claims a peculiar interest on account of the circumstances in which it had its origin. The editor of the Knickerbocker Magazine, Mr. LOUIS GAYLORD CLARK, so widely known for the exhaustless fund of humor which he serves up on his monthly board, and for his genial relations with many of the most eminent American authors, has performed such laudable service for the literature of his country, that, in the opinion of his "troops of friends," some appreciative testimonial was due to the excellent spirit and signal ability with which he has devoted years of unrequited labor to the cause of letters. With admirable judgment, they decided that such a testimonial should be presented in the form of a tasteful volume, containing original articles from the surviving writers of the Knickerbocker, of which the proceeds should be devoted to the erection of a cottage on the banks of the Hudson, "suitable for the home of a man of letters, who, like Mr. Clark, is also a lover of nature and of rural life." The enterprise was equally honorable to its projectors and its objects. Such an expression of sympathy and esteem is one of those rare boons, which bless alike both them "who give and him who takes." The appeal of the more intimate friends of Mr. Clark was promptly and cordially met by the distinguished corps of contributors with whose names the pages of the Knickerbocker have been graced. They comprise some of the oldest and most illustrious writers in America, with a noble array besides of men of genius and culture, who, if perhaps less known to fame, have yet gathered worthy literary honors in both hemispheres. A few examples will show the choice materials which have been employed in the composition of the volume. Washington Irving—the beloved and glorious patriarch of our native literature—contributes a delightful paper, entitled "Conversations with Talma," presenting some interesting reminiscences of the great French tragedian, and a series of original suggestions on French dramatic poetry. This was written in 1821, and will furnish a welcome fragment of the author's palmiest days to the host of his admirers who so fondly treasure every production of his fascinating pen. A poem, called the "Snow Shower," by Bryant, is the characteristic offering of our greatest American bard. "The Emperor's Bird's Nest," by Longfellow; "Mascaccio," by Lowell; "A Poetical Epistle to Mr. Clark," by Halleck; "A Vision of the Housatonic," by Holmes; "I'm Growing Old," by Saxe; "To a Beautiful Girl," by Prentice; "On Lake Pepin," by Epes Sargent, are in the happiest style of their respective writers. N. P. Willis, instead of rhymes, gives a kind-hearted and cheery letter from his invalid's retreat at Idlewild; and Tuckerman has a fine critical essay on Edmund Kean. Among other celebrated writers, whose fame is of more recent date, we observe the names of Mitchell, Boker, Kimball, Street, Shelton, Bayard Taylor, Cozzens, Fields, G. W. Curtis, and Stoddard. But space would fail us to enumerate all the celebrities on this red-lettered catalogue, which presents a curious illustration of the signal ability which the editor of the Knickerbocker has embodied in the long series of his annual volumes. The attractiveness of the work is greatly enhanced by the variety of portraits with which it is embellished, forming an extensive gallery of American authors. These are engraved on steel, in the best style of execution, and, in many cases, from original paintings by Elliot and other eminent artists. Such a varied and admirable collection of portraits, in which a large portion of the community is interested, we presume has never before been presented to the public. The editorial preparation of the work was intrusted to the charge of JOHN W. FRANCIS, GEORGE P. MORRIS, RUFUS W. GRISWOLD, RICHARD B. KIMBALL, and FREDERIC W. SHELTON, who, it is needless to add, have acquitted themselves of their generous duties in a manner which leaves no room for comment, except that of a congratulatory character.

The Rose and the Ring, by Mr. M. A. TITMARSH, is the title of THACKERAY's Christmas-story for the present year, and, with its inimitable pictorial illustrations by the author, is bound to make a sensation in every circle of juvenile readers. It combines the grave, resistless humor of Thackeray's best productions with his remarkable power of adaptation to youthful fancies. A beautiful edition for the holidays was issued by Harper and Brothers, and produced a general clapping of hands among the legion of the author's admirers in Young America.

The Bible Reading-Book, by Mrs. SARAH JOSEPHA HALE (published by Lippincott, Grambo, and Co.), presents a continuous narrative of the most important portions of the Bible, in the exact words of Scripture, including selections from the sacred history, biography, poetry, prophecy, precepts, and parables. Among the numerous compends of Holy Writ, this volume is distinguished for the simplicity and convenience of its method, the judicious care with which its materials have been selected, and the freedom from sectarian partialities which mark its preparation. It is intended to take the place of the Holy Scriptures in the school-room and family, and appears to be well-adapted for the use of those who are content with any abridgment of the inspired volume.

Leaves from the Tree Igdrasyll, by MARTHA RUSSELL. (Published by John P. Jewett and Co.) Following the hint of Carlyle that in the Northern mythology, "Igdrasyll, the ash-tree of existence, has its roots deep down in the kingdoms of Hila or Death—its trunk reaches up heaven-high—spreads its boughs over the whole universe—every leaf of it a biography—every fibre there an act or word," the writer of this volume has not unaptly selected a quaint title for a record of human experience that appeals to universal sympathies. It consists of a series of sketches, evidently taken from actual life, and though not without a strong tinge of ideality, bearing the stamp of naturalness in the highest degree. They betray the marks of genuine feeling, rich cultivation, and rare powers of expression. In their healthy tone of sentiment, and their style of vigorous simplicity, they are happily distinguished from the numerous mawkish and extravagant fictions which are becoming an unmitigated nuisance.

Maxims of Washington, collected and arranged by JOHN FREDERICK SCHROEDER, D.D. Under a variety of appropriate heads, the wise suggestions with which the writings of Washington abound are here presented in a manner both to awaken and reward the attention of the reader. The compilation is seasonable, and adapted to do good. The pregnant aphorisms of the Father of his Country can not fail to give weight to important truths, which, in other forms, are apt to be lost sight of amidst the excitement and turmoil of the times. In preparing the collection, the editor has made use of the most authentic materials, including both public documents and private letters, manuscripts and printed volumes, while his devotion to the memory of Washington is a guarantee for the zeal and fidelity with which he has performed his task. (Published by D. Appleton and Co.)

Nature in Disease, by JACOB BIGELOW, M.D. (Ticknor and Fields.) Connected with several elaborate essays of a strictly professional character, this volume, by an eminent Boston physician, has a few papers devoted to subjects of more general interest, like those on the Burial of the Dead, on Coffee and Tea, on the History and Use of Tobacco, and so forth. The author belongs to that branch of the old school of medical practice which trusts less, in the curative treatment of disease, to the active interferences of art than to the observance of the salutary indications of nature. During a protracted medical career, he has uniformly sustained the highest character for philosophical acumen, extensive erudition, and practical skill. The present work may be regarded as the last expression of his long experience, and as such, will be read with satisfaction beyond the pale of his profession.

The Lost Heiress, by Mrs. EDMA SOUTHWORTH, is perhaps the most finished production which has come from the pen of that fertile writer. The plot, though often running into superfluous intensity, is comparatively free from the gross improbabilities of some of her previous works, and the character-drawing shows discrimination of judgment as well as force of expression. The career of a popular statesman, and the progress of a gifted artist, which form essential features of the story, are depicted with great power, and furnish an effective contrast to the more romantic incidents which abound in the volume. The faults of this work proceed from an exuberant imagination and an excessive facility of language—but its vigor of conception and brilliancy of description make it one of the most readable novels of the season.

Mile Stones in our Life Journey, by SAMUEL OGDON. (Published by D. Appleton and Co.) The author of this volume has aimed to present the universally acknowledged precepts of religion in a novel and attractive form. He deals sparingly in dogmatic discussion, evidently preferring practical utility to speculative subtleties. He endeavors to connect the every-day realities of life with the benign influence of Christian truth, and to consecrate the lapse of time by intimate religious associations. The different periods of human life are treated with appropriate suggestions, and in a style of winning earnestness and beauty. Several personal reminiscences are narrated in an introductory chapter, containing home-like sketches of social life in New England, and an impressive picture of early incidents in an eminent professional career.

Wisdom, Wit, and Whims of Distinguished Ancient Philosophers, by JOSEPH BANVARD, is a brief digest of the opinions and sayings of several ancient philosophers, compiled chiefly from Enfield, Stanley, and Yonge. As a convenient manual of reference, it may be of service to readers who have no inclination or opportunity to consult more voluminous works. (Published by Sheldon, Lampport, and Co.)

Webster and his Master-Pieces, by Rev. B. F. TEFRT, L.L.D. (Published by Miller, Orton, and Mulligan.) A popular biography of the great American statesman occupies the first volume of this work, while the second contains a selection from his most celebrated speeches in Congress and on public occasions. Several incidents in Mr. Webster's life which, we believe, have not before been made public are brought forward in the narrative, and the general outline of his professional and political course is portrayed in lively colors. The style of the biographer is diffuse, and often bombastic, but the greatness of the subject can not be concealed by any defects of treatment.

Parish and other Pencillings, by KIRWAN. (Published by Harper and Brothers.) The effective pen of the famous anti-Catholic polemic is every where to be recognized in this racy volume. It consists of a series of brief articles, some of which have already been widely circulated in another form, treating of events and incidents within the personal experience of the author. A large portion of the work is devoted to familiar narratives, illustrating the leading truths of religion, by examples drawn from real life. Among the most interesting papers in the collection, are sketches of the Rev. Ashbel Green, Dr. Alexander, and Dr. Miller, which comprise a variety of personal recollections of those eminent men, and without pretending to superior elegance or accuracy of style, exhibit a freshness of feeling and sincerity of admiration, which make them valuable specimens of biographical composition. The writings of Kirwan, which have already gained an extensive popularity, will always command the attention of the public by their vehement expression of opinion, their glowing religious spirit, and their robust natural eloquence.

What Not, by Mrs. MARY DENISON (published by Lippincott, Grambo, and Co.) is a collection of slight sketches, written in a pleasing and unaffected style, and depicting the joys and sorrows of common life. With no parade of wisdom, it inculcates the most wholesome lessons, and is well adapted to exert a beneficent influence by its "delineations of the good and beautiful in humanity." The volume is brought out in excellent style, and is embellished with several appropriate and striking illustrations.

Clovenook Children, by ALICE CARY. (Published by Ticknor and Fields.) These stories have the genuine flavor of country life. They were written within the sound of running streams and amidst the odor of blossoms. Such natural pictures always have a charm for juvenile readers, and will make the author as great a favorite with them as they evidently are with the author.

Bruno; or, Lessons of Fidelity, Patience, and Self-Denial taught by a Dog. This attractive little volume is the first of a monthly series of story-books for the young, announced by Harper and Brothers. The name of the author, Mr. JACOB ABBOTT, gives plenary assurance that they will be wanting in no essential quality for adaptation to their purpose. His happy talent for interesting the minds of young people has been amply tested, and it will now find full scope in the composition of the proposed volumes. The plan of the series is of a very comprehensive nature. The books are not intended to be works of amusement only, but of substantial instruction. Comprising a great variety of subjects, the successive volumes will resemble each other more in their immediate aim than in their mode of treatment—each attempting to impart some useful knowledge, to awaken the intellectual powers, and to enforce the highest principles of conduct. The present number fully confirms the promise set forth in the original announcement. In all respects, Bruno is a delightful story. Full of animated description and enticing narrative, it constantly tempts the youthful reader into the pleasant and peaceful paths of true wisdom. It is printed on a large, clear type, and is embellished with a great number of excellent engravings.—Two new volumes of The Franconia Stories, by JACOB ABBOTT, entitled Agnes and Caroline, have also been issued by Harper and Brothers.

The Romance of American Landscape, by T. ANDERSON RICHARDS, is a very attractive gift-book, while it possesses qualities which give it a more permanent value. A score or so of landscape illustrations furnish a text from which the author discourses upon the picturesque and the beautiful, interspersing the dryness of topographical detail and the sameness of verbal description, with legends and incidents connected with the scenery described. It presents in a pleasing manner the leading characteristics of the beautiful natural scenery of our country, and can not fail to aid in the development of the popular appreciation of landscape painting. In thus using his graceful and facile pen as an accessory of the pencil, the author has done good service to his profession of Landscape Painter, in which he has acquired so honorable a place. (Published by Leavitt and Allen.)

The Wide Awake Gift and Know Nothing Token for 1855. (Published by J. C. Derby.) The chief feature which distinguishes this volume from similar compilations is that its contents are wholly of American origin, and for the most part of a patriotic character and bearing. They comprise a suitable variety both of prose and poetry, a portion of which is from the pens of the most celebrated writers in the country. Among the names appended to the different papers are those of Bryant, Emerson, Longfellow, Webster, Everett, Dr. Beecher, E. P. Whipple, Jared Sparks, and many others of no small note. The volume is well-printed and handsomely embellished.

Out-Doors at Idlewild, by N. P. WILLIS. (Published by Charles Scribner.) The invalid poet of Idlewild has turned his leisure to good account in the composition of these sparkling letters. They are in the happiest vein of the author, and present a beautiful illustration of the power of the mind to overcome the effects of physical infirmity. With none of the querulousness or gloom which are the almost inevitable fruits of protracted illness, they jot down the daily ongings of a tranquil rural life, catching the rapid mood of the moment, and opening the retreats of domestic enjoyment to the sympathy of the reader. They exhibit the same mastery of language by which the most rugged materials become fluent at the plastic touch, and the same power of giving a humorous or a graceful aspect to the most evanescent trifles, which characterize all Willis's writings; while, if we mistake not, they betray a deeper and more genial current of thought than any of his former productions.

They are suited to awaken a feeling of personal interest in the writer, who gives the details of his sick-room with as cordial a frankness as he describes a golden sunset or a summer's shower.

Things as they are in America, by WILLIAM CHAMBERS. (Published by Lippincott, Grambo, and Co.) An intelligent, matter-of-fact, prosaic Scotchman is the author of this new book of American travels, who traverses the country from Canada to Cincinnati with a diligent spirit of observation and a mind generally free from unworthy prejudices. Nothing very novel or very profound is contained in the record of his experience; but as showing what sort of a figure we make in the eyes of a shrewd, plain-spoken stranger, his book is not without interest.

You Have Heard of Them, by Q. (Published by Redfield.) In a strain of dashing, good-natured gossip, the anonymous author of this entertaining volume relates his impressions of various notabilities in the world of fashion, letters, and art. His connection with the London press appears to have opened the door for him to all sorts of studios, libraries, saloons, boudoirs, and green-rooms, and he has not failed to make the most industrious use of his "privileges." Some myths are no doubt dexterously embroidered upon the substantial texture of his narrative; but without deciding on the comparative share of imagination and memory in the concoction of the work, we may pronounce it one of the most readable of the many readable volumes of the popular publisher.

Southward Ho! A Spell of Sunshine, by W. GILMORE SIMMS. A party of pleasant friends beguile the voyage from New York to Charleston by relating sundry legendary tales, and engaging in lively conversation on topics of mutual interest. The daily talk is served up in this volume with the well-known skill of the practiced novelist. Several of the stories are brilliantly told, while graver discussions of the characteristics of different Southern States give an agreeable variety to the contents of the volume. (Published by Redfield.)

'Way Down East; or, Portraits of Yankee Life, by SEBA SMITH (published by J. C. Derby). The veritable Major Jack Downing again makes his appearance in these genuine specimens of the comic traits in New England character. No man is more completely at home in this kind of delineation than the worthy Major. His keen perception of humor is matched only by his skill in life-like portraiture. His brain is overflowing with Yankee traditions, local anecdotes, and personal recollections, which he reproduces with a freshness and point which always protect the reader from satiety. The force of his descriptions consists in their perfect naturalness. They are never overcharged—never distorted, for the sake of grotesque effect—never spiced too highly for the healthy palate—but read almost like literal transcripts of New England country life, before the age of railroads and telegraphs had brushed away its piquant individuality. The lover of the quaint old times of half a century back will welcome these sketches as a faithful record of "what will ne'er be seen again."

Poems, by PAUL H. HAYNE. (Published by Ticknor and Fields.) There is true poetry in this little volume, which we presume is the first production of a young writer. The principal piece, entitled "The Temptation of Venus," is founded on a legend which sprang from the horror of the early Christian church for the deification of Love in the Greek and Roman mythologies. The writer has endeavored to bring out the hidden moral significance of the legend, and to enforce the truth that "the apotheosis of the Sense is the funeral of the Soul." His versification is fluent and vigorous. He has a good command of poetic imagery, which he employs in a judicious manner, without burying his thought in superfluous ornament. Several of the smaller poems in the volume are distinguished for their tenderness and pathos, and nearly all of them give promise of excellence.

Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity, delivered in Philadelphia, by Clergymen of the Protestant Episcopal Church. (Published by E. H. Butler and Co.) In a well-written Introductory Essay to this volume, by the Right Rev. Bishop POTTER, a brief view is given of the problem of Apologetics, or the scientific Evidences of Christianity. According to the writer, this involves both a practical and a speculative question. The former may be stated as follows: Can the Christian faith be vindicated on those principles of evidence which, in respect to this life, men accept and act upon without distrust or hesitation? The speculative problem brings the inquirer into contact with some of the profoundest difficulties in metaphysical philosophy, including the questions, Whether there is a proper scientific basis for any of our knowledge, or whether it be not, in its first principles, essentially empirical; whether our subjective impressions are a guarantee for our objective beliefs; whether there is any valid foundation for our faith in Goodness, Beauty, Immortality, and God? These problems are discussed by Bishop Potter with learning and acumen. The body of the work consists of discourses on various topics of Christian Evidence, with special reference to the present aspects of infidelity, by distinguished Episcopal divines. In point of argument and composition they are of unequal merit, but they are all marked by earnestness and zeal, and several by impressive eloquence.

HENRI HEINE.—We abridge from the London Leader some curious particulars with regard to this erratic man of genius:

"Of deep interest is a little autobiographic fragment of the German poet HEINE. It has been known for some time that a singular mental transformation has come over this most remarkable of the poets of Young Germany, now in the fifty-fifth year of his age, and living, the poor bed-ridden victim of a painful form of disease, in Paris. Rumors of his conversion from the utter Hegelian skepticism which he had formerly professed, and in the spirit of which he had worked both as a poet and as a politician, have long been going about—some saying he had become a Protestant Evangelical of the Berlin school, and others that he had joined the Romish communion. The present fragment clears up, or at least throws light upon, the facts of the case. It is a most curious paper—full of brilliant and eccentric thought on various subjects; and exhibiting a strange mixture of the speculative, the humorous, the sarcastic, and the poetical. It is not unlike some of De Quincey's papers, but far more biting and fervid in its spirit. It is especially with reference to his work De l'Allemagne, published some years ago, and in which he expounded the nature of the newest German philosophy to the French, in a manner most original and striking, that he makes his present revelations. He tells what led to the preparation of that work, and how it dissipated the ideas till then entertained in France of the German philosophy.

"Of this philosophy Mr. Heine was once a votary, as far as it was in the nature of a poet to be. As a young man in Germany he had known Hegel himself—had 'seen him,' as he says, 'sitting in his woeful way, like a hen, on his terrible eggs, and heard his clucking.'

"When Heine came to Paris in 1831 he was an exulting skeptic, carrying a personal adaptation of Hegelianism about with him, if the essential doctrine had not pierced his poetical heart.

"And so he led his brilliant, wild life, the literary fruits of which are before the world. His first shock was on finding that his philosophy was no longer the exclusive possession of men of culture and genius like himself, but was getting down among the 'masses.' On these 'masses' and his own sentimental relations to them he has a curious passage. He avows that though theoretically an ardent friend of the people, yet in fact he had always had a horror of every thing done by their agency, and a dislike to personal contact with them. So long as he and his friends had 'blasphemed among themselves at their little philosophical suppers,' he was contented; but when 'the same themes began to be discussed in the low symposiums,' when 'atheism began to smell of tallow, and schnaps, and tobacco,' he was startled.

"It was the French Revolution of February, 1848, however, that worked the real change in Heine:

"The events of those foolish days of February, in which one saw human wisdom at a discount, and the elect of idiotcy carried in triumph, were so extraordinary, so fabulous, that they turned things and ideas upside down. Had I been a man of sense, my intelligence would have given way; but, fool as I was, the contrary occurred, and, strangely enough, it was precisely at a moment of general lunacy that I returned to reason."

"Poverty and paralysis were the more immediate agents of his disenchantment. Poverty, apparently, did a good deal, but paralysis did more. Here is a touch of Heine's irony—almost ghastly on such a subject:

"Besides my financial deficiencies, I have not been in the enjoyment of brilliant health: I am even affected with an indisposition, slight, it is true, according to what my physicians say, but which has now kept me more than five years in bed. In such a position it is a great comfort to me to have some one in heaven to whom I can address my groans and lamentations during the night, after my wife has gone to sleep."

"In this strange, mocking way, Heine announces his recantation of skepticism, Hegelianism, and atheism, and his conversion—to what? This is the question; and he answers it in a roundabout and characteristic way. First, he tells us of his great and sudden comfort in reading the Bible, out of which he derived as much, though not precisely the same in kind, as Uncle Tom did. This leads him into a dissertation on the religion and institutions of Judaism, in the course of which he breaks out into a singularly eloquent descant on the character of Moses—the greatest of human beings; as he thinks—mixed, in an odd manner, with sneers at the present King of Prussia. Resuming the autobiographic thread, he announces that, on the whole, his conversion has neither been to Roman Catholicism, nor to Prussian Evangelical Protestantism, but, if we may so express it, to a kind of Biblical Deism, formed by himself for his own uses."

FIGURES 1 AND 2.—HOME DRESS AND CHILD'S COSTUME.

THE HOME DRESS, which forms the principal figure in our leading illustration, is so clearly represented in the engraving that any extended verbal description would be superfluous. The body, it will be perceived, is demi-basque. The skirt is very full, touching the ground behind, and just clearing it in front and at the sides. The illustration fully explains the style of the corsage and collar. The sleeve is the most noticeable feature of this dress. Its convenience and elegance must make it a general favorite for an in-door dress. It is so fashioned that alternate shirred and plain bands oppose each other, in the upper and lower sections into which the upper half of the sleeve is divided. The lower portion falls full, but is gathered again at the wrist.

In the CHILD'S DRESS the upper garment is trimmed with swan's down, and the hat bordered with ostrich feathers. This last has become a very favorite style of trimming.

We furnish illustrations of several of the most admired styles of FURS. It will of course be apparent that our illustrations do not present them as they are worn en suite, but are purposely varied so as to present specimens of several kinds of furs.—The Fischer Russe Cape is of Sable. The Victorine is of Chinchilla. The Muff and Cuffs are of Stone Marten and Ermine.—A great variety of furs are worn. Notwithstanding the greater cost of the Sables and Chinchillas, there are many who prefer our American furs. In Europe, also, they are held in especial esteem.

ADVENTURES OF PORTE CRAYON AND HIS COUSINS.

Second Paper.

Ricominciâr con voglie ardite e pronte.—TASSO.

ONCE more upon the road! The horses, seemingly tired of inglorious ease and golden oats, trotted along at a jolly pace, expressing their satisfaction in alternate snorts; the coachman flourished his whip with such hearty goodwill that the fuzz flew at every crack; the girls chattered and sang in a manner betokening the highest exhilaration. Porte Crayon along, pensive and abstracted. His voice mingled in the gleeful chorus, and to Mice's frequent exclamations, "Mass' Porte! da! a squirrel—Mass' Porte! da! a crow," he paid no attention. Presently a light hand tapped him on the shoulder. "Cousin, are you asleep? or what has befallen you?"

"I am not asleep, Cousin Dora; and the cause of my hidden grief can never be made manifest. I fear it is beyond the comprehension of you girls."

"Indeed!" cried they, indignantly, "what unparalleled assumption! as if any secret was beyond our comprehension."

"Fish," said Fanny, "I would not give a brass thimble to hear one of Porte's secrets. I suppose he has lost a favorite lead-pencil, or something of equal importance." And so saying, she looked out of the carriage window with as much nonchalance as she could assume.

"I always did despise secrets," said Dora. "I never read one of these mysterious novels but I turned over the leaves to find out the secret before the characters in the book knew it."

"But, Cousin Porte," said Minnie, with her most winning smile, "it seems to me that when persons are traveling together, all the joys and sorrows of the trip should be common property, and that it is selfish, or at least ungenerous, for any one to appropriate exclusively either the one or the other."

"So pretty a speech, Cousin, deserves a better return than I shall be able to make; for, in truth, like Canning's Poor Knife-Grinder, I have no secret to tell. Indeed, if I had not been taken off my guard, I should have been tempted to invent one to satisfy you."

"Now," said Minnie, "I suspect you are wishing yourself back in the cave."

"That was a shrewd guess, Miss Minnie, and very near the truth; for I have been ill satisfied with my success in subterranean sketching, and would fain have had a few more trials. But it is just as well as it is, probably, for if I had remained a month, I do not know that I should have succeeded better. When I compare the soul-filling grandeur of the original with these bits of scratched and smutted paper which I have taken so much pains to elaborate, I begin to feel a sort of contempt for my art."

"Why, brother!" exclaimed Fanny with warmth, "the drawings are beautiful. We all recognized them. Mr. Moler recognized them. Any one who has seen the cave would recognize them at first sight."

"But, Cousin Porte, you draw portraits so well," said Dora, encouragingly. "I would much rather excel in likenesses than to have a talent for caves."

"Ah! pretty cousin, I failed more ingloriously in sketching you the other day, than I have done in the cave."

"Mass' Porte picters off a hoss 'mazin good, any how; he tuck dis sorrel so pat, I think I see him switchin' he's tail."

"Truly," said Crayon, with an air of satisfaction, "a little well-timed self-depreciation has brought me abundance of sympathy and consolation. I feel quite refreshed."

"I'm glad to hear it," said Minnie; "and truly glad on your account that we have got away from the cave. I began to be apprehensive lest you might share the fate of a mocking-bird I once heard of."

"What was that? Tell us about the mocking-bird!"

"Well," said Minnie, "an acquaintance of mine in the lower country had a mocking-bird whose powers of song and mimicking were marvelous, even among the talented race to which he belonged. From his cage that hung in an upper window, he heard and reproduced with variations and improvements the notes of all the feathered tribe, from the chattering of the wren that built her nest beneath the window-sill, to the cooing of the dove that haunted the locust grove. He had even been known to make recognizable attempts at imitating the gobble of a famous turkey-cock that strutted about the yard, and it was universally conceded he could do every thing but talk. One unlucky day a smart-looking negro rode up to the house, bearing a note from his mistress to the mocking-bird's mistress. As he tarried at the door for an answer to the missive, to pass time he commenced whistling. Now it seems this boy was also a genius in his way. He whistled like a flageolet, and at all the dancing parties, Christmas revels, or huskings, he was the acknowledged leader of the orchestra; fiddle, bones, and tambourine, all playing second to his magnificent whistle. At the first notes which struck his ear the bird's eye sparkled: he raised himself upon his perch, and thus continued, spell-bound, until the strain ceased. His mission finished, the lackey went his way whistling. Then the mocking-bird set himself firmly on his legs, and swelling his throat, began a warble. It was a failure. Again he strove, and again stopped disgusted and dejected. A third time he gathered up his strength, and poured forth a superlative trill: he ceased, the white film closed over his eye, and with a shivering flutter of his wings, he fell from his perch—dead!"

"Ugh!" said Mice, giving vent to his pent-up feelings. "He bu'st he's heart a-tryin'."

ASYLUM FOR THE DEAF AND DUMB.

"Poor thing!" said Fanny. "I know how he felt; I heard Jenny Lind once. It was not envy, nor jealousy, nor self-depreciation; but it seemed as if those undefined longings of the soul, those dreams of happiness and perfection were for a moment about to be realized; then the delusion passes away, and for a while after common life appears intolerable."

"How eloquent she is!" muttered Crayon. "There the genius of song got entirely the upper hand of the practical housekeeper."

"Porte! get out with your nonsense. And," continued Minnie, "suppose that Porte, overcome by his high-wrought feelings, had perished in the cave, and become a great stalagmite, like, like—who?"

"Niobe, incrustated all over with carbonate of soda—"

"Of lime," interrupted Crayon.

"Or, like Lot's wife, a pillar of chloride of something or other—a pillar of salt," said Dora.

"True enough; so it was. There goes the chemistry!" cried Crayon. "The laboratory will be blown up directly."

"And as Porte tells us," cried Minnie, "the stalagmite would grow, and grow, and grow, until it reached the roof of the cave, and resemble a tower, which the proprietor, with his usual aptitude in naming, would undoubtedly call the Tower of Genius; and which would be admired and wondered at through all time."

"And if such a thing had happened," quoth Crayon, "you, dear cousin, would have wasted away like Echo, until there was nothing left but the tip of your tongue, which, like the soul, I firmly believe, is destined to be everlasting. And, by the grace of fortune! there's Staunton."

"Where? Let us see!" cried they all at once.

The approach to the town of Staunton, by the road from Weyer's Cave, is quite imposing, especially if the view and its surroundings happen to be lighted by a brilliant autumn sunset, as in this instance. On the right, the Asylum for the Deaf and Dumb stands out in bold relief from its background of rich foliage, its Doric portico being one of the best specimens of architecture to be seen in Virginia. On the left are the extensive and commodious buildings for the Insane; and on the surrounding hills are a number of pretty edifices—academies, seminaries, and private residences—exhibiting far more architectural taste than is usually found in the smaller Virginia towns.

As the authorities had not been informed of the approach of our travelers, there was no public demonstration on their entrance into the town. But, in recompense, there was a considerable amount of staring on private account, especially among the colored population. And they flattered themselves, as they descended from their carriage at the door of the principal hotel—Crayon in his hunting costume, and each of the girls with a book in her hand—that there was an unusual commotion among the loungers. The idea of making an impression was not altogether ungrateful to our friends, as they well knew that Staunton was renowned all over the State for its cultivated society.

"Hark ye, girls!" said Porte Crayon, making an emphatic gesture with his finger, "no doll babies here."

"Certainly not," replied they in chorus.

"The idea of carrying the books," pursued he, "is a good one; in connection with my sketching, it gives a superior air to the party, suggestive of the literary tourist, or something of that sort. While I don't admire pretension in any thing, there is a certain modest, yet dignified manner of suggesting, rather than asserting one's claims, that goes far among strangers."

At this discourse Dora appeared really alarmed. "Mercy on us! I hope no one will take me for a literary body. I'm confused at the bare idea. I shan't know what to say; I shall be afraid to open my mouth."

"Bless your innocent eyes, Cousin Dimple, don't be alarmed. No one would ever suspect you for a moment. But prattle away in your usual amiable and artless manner, and, believe me, you will be none the less admired."

Here Crayon scrutinized his wards, and then cast an oblique glance at his own figure in the parlor glass. "I don't think," said he, "that a person of ordinary knowledge of the world would be apt to suspect any of us of being literary characters. But we must endeavor to keep up appearances, at any rate."

On the following morning an untoward event occurred, which gave great vexation to our friends, and showed that, however plausible Mr. Crayon's observations might appear, yet upon the whole, those are least liable to mortification or misconception who live and travel without any pretension whatsoever.

On sallying forth after breakfast to see the town, the girls in full costume, each with a magazine, and Porte Crayon with his sketch-book, they marched up street in high good-humor. On turning into the principal street, they saw an object that brought them to a halt. This was no other than that marplot scoundrel, Mice, dressed in his holiday suit, with a ruffled shirt of red calico, a June-bug breastpin, a brass-headed cane like the club of Hercules, and, to crown all, a number of Harper under his arm. As he swaggered along at a leisurely pace, his face beaming with exalted complacency, he was an object of general attention. Occasionally he paused to address a condescending question to some "common nigger," to salute some turbaned damsel of his own race at an opposite window, or to cast a look of ineffable satisfaction at his goodly shadow, which entirely overspread the narrow sidewalk.

Crayon is a philosopher (one of a multitudinous and lofty school), who looks upon the varying events of life with admirable calmness and equanimity, when every thing goes to please him; but who, when disappointed or thwarted, behaves very much like common people. For, as Crayon sagely remarks "It is not well for any individual to be entirely cut off from human feelings and sympathies." On this occasion, had his coachman been within reach, he would undoubtedly have caned him. As it was, his perception of the ridiculous got the better of his wrath; and venting his feelings in a jumbled paragraph (which he afterward told the girls was a quotation from Furius Bibaculus, the Roman satirist), he turned about and hastened back to the hotel.

"Waiter," said Mr. Crayon, "go into the next street, and when you see a big, foolish-looking negro, parading about with a book under his arm, tell him to come down and get out my carriage, as we wish to take a drive."

"Yes, Sir," replied the grinning waiter. "I know him."

As the streets were very dusty during the remainder of their sojourn in Staunton, our friends generally went out in their carriage.

They were highly gratified by a visit to the Asylum for the Deaf and Dumb, a near approach to which did not disappoint the expectations excited by the distant view. The grounds are already improved with great taste, and, from their peculiarly fortunate location, are susceptible of improvement to an almost unlimited extent. The buildings are extensive, well arranged, and imposing. Our friends took great interest in the exercises of the different classes of deaf mutes, and saw with wonder and delight how the missing faculties seemed, in some cases, to be more than supplied by the ingenious and skillful cultivation of the remainder. An air of cheerfulness and home-like contentment pervaded the whole establishment, and it is not a matter of surprise that the pupils generally leave their Alma Mater with reluctance. While there they are unconscious of misfortune, surrounded by companions and guardians with whom their intercourse is free and unrestrained, and carried on in a language as graceful and expressive as the most cultivated forms of speech. A part of the establishment is devoted to the Blind, a considerable number of whom are at present under instruction.

On the return of our party, the conversation naturally turned upon what they had seen. Minnie May observed that if she had the choice of misfortunes, she would prefer being blind; "because," said she, "I am naturally fond of talking, and one's friends would read aloud all the new works, and Cousin Fanny would sing for me; and besides, there is a touching interest which attaches itself to the blind, which does not belong at all to the deaf mute. A woman, after all, is a helpless, dependent creature; and this misfortune, in rendering her more so, increases in a still greater degree her claims to attention and protection." Fanny agreed to some extent to the foregoing; remarking that the cultivation of music, and the increased susceptibility to its charms, might compensate in some degree for the loss of sight. She appreciated the pleasure of conversation, the fireside in winter, and the veranda in summer; but she was by no means prepared to admit that women were such helpless or dependent creatures. Moreover, she thought a deaf and dumb lady could keep house quite as advantageously as one that had the use of her tongue, and that upon an average the servants got along as well without scolding as with it. Dora yawned and said, for her part she would be very well contented to remain as she was; but she did think she would like to have little feet like a Chinese lady.

"Mice," said Crayon abruptly, "don't you wish you were white?"

"Bless your soul, Mass' Porte, I see better as I is. I see a pretty good nigger, but I ain't got sense enough to be white."

The Hospital for the Insane consists of a double range of brick buildings, extensive, elegant, and handsomely located, although its position is not so commanding as that of the Asylum, nor are the grounds about it in so forward a state of improvement. This work, however, is in progress, and will be carried out in a style commensurate with the extent and importance of the institution.

Of the visit of our friends to the interior of the establishment they have never said much. They of course saw the public rooms, the cooking apparatus, and the chapel for the use of the patients, which is furnished with a fine organ; all of which are entirely unexceptionable. Porte Crayon, however, was a good deal vexed with his wards for their persevering curiosity, in wishing to see the unfortunate inmates of the Hospital. Having used moral suasion to no purpose, he privately bribed their conductor to tell them that the patients were not permitted to see or to be seen of strangers.

Having thus disposed of the lions of Staunton, our travelers resumed their journey, and leaving the general direction of their route, took the road to the northwest, toward the Chimneys, some sixteen miles distant. Several miles on their way they passed a man engaged in a controversy with a mule. As the presence of witnesses generally serves to aggravate a quarrel, so upon the approach of the carriage both mule and man became more violent in their demonstrations. As well as could be ascertained from their actions, the man wanted to go to Staunton, and the mule seemed willing to go any where else, even preferring the alternative of going backward over a bank ten feet high, rather than yield his point. The quarrel growing out of this diversity of opinion or of interest seemed likely to last some time, as the mule was a stout, healthy animal, and the rider a sinewy, long-legged, sun-burnt farmer, with a choleric and determined expression of face. The ladies united in desiring Porte Crayon to stop the carriage, that they might see the result of the dispute. This, however, he peremptorily refused to do, alleging as a reason that there was no calculating the time they might lose in waiting; and, besides, that politeness forbade them to be impertinent witnesses of the misfortunes of their neighbors. "Moreover," said he, "judging from the condition of things when we passed, you would most probably overhear, before long, a number of indelicate and profane expressions, improper for female ears."

But Minnie was unwilling to give up the point, and insisted that the poor man might get hurt, and that it would at least be civil to stop and send Mice to his assistance.

"By no means, cousin. I can appreciate your kind motive, but the man in question probably would not—certainly not in his present state of mind. Sympathy, in a case like this, only serves to increase the evil. I know something of these things by personal experience," said Crayon, with a wise wag of his head.

Anon he leaned out from his seat, and looked back with great interest.

"What's the matter? can you see him yet?" exclaimed the girls, looking through the peep-holes in the back of the carriage.

There, indeed, they caught the last glimpse of the unhappy couple, in the same spot where they had first seen them; the mule seated in the middle of the road on his ultimatum, and the rider, burning with rage and grief, standing astride of him, holding on by one ear, and pummeling him lustily with his disengaged fist.

REMINISCENCES OF EARLY DAYS.

Well, Cousin Porte—as politeness forbids us to laugh at the unlucky countryman—suppose you amuse us by the recital of some of your adventures—the experiences in mule-riding, for example—which you hinted at just now."

"Welladay, girls! It has been fifteen years or more since I rode one of them; and, to tell the truth, I have never cared to repeat the experiment. On that well-remembered occasion I was one of a riding-party, consisting of some eight or ten young people of both sexes, bound for a picnic on top of the North Mountain. When the party assembled at the rendezvous, I appeared mounted on a mule. The girls giggled, as a matter of course, and the men criticised my perverse eccentricity, as they called it. I, however, defended my monture with great vehemence. The ancient kings of Israel rode mules; knights and ladies in the chivalrous ages ambled on mule-back; the great Mohammed rode one; and why should not Porte Crayon bestride the likeness of Alborac? As the little animal trotted along with great sprightliness, I began to get credit for some judgment in my selection; and one youngster, who was mounted on a bonesetter, begged me to exchange with him. This offer in the pride of my heart I refused disdainfully. On fording the Tuscarora, at the Old Church, we reined up to water our beasts. Alborac junior drank deep of the limpid wave, and, when he had finished, suddenly roached his back, and pitched me plump over his head into the midst of a flock of geese. I remember perfectly how I felt when I rose out of the water. There was the cursed beast sipping away with the most cheerful and unconcerned expression of countenance, and making no attempt whatever to run away. I hastily swallowed a large gulp of fury and water, and mounted the animal again, endeavoring at the same time to appear as little incommode as was possible under the circumstances. 'Ha, ha! ha, ha!' said I, forcing a hearty laugh, 'I got a little ducking!' There was no response, but such faces as I could catch a glimpse of appeared all purple with constraint. 'He! he! he!' I snickered again, 'I got a funny fall.' No one replied. 'What the — prevents you from laughing?' cried I, in a fury. 'Nobody's killed!' A chorus of shouts and shrieks followed, long, loud, and unrestrained. I wouldn't have minded it, but Cousin Julia was there, and that infernal fellow Frank Williams. Cousin Julia could scarcely keep her saddle for laughing; in fact, she laughed all the way to the Mountain. Every silly, pointless speech furnished occasion for such extravagant and disproportioned merriment, that it was impossible not to perceive what was at the bottom of it. I had at least the satisfaction of perceiving that Frank was as much annoyed with it as I.

The creature was in love to that degree, that he could neither laugh himself nor endure to see Julia laugh. By the way, I can't imagine a more disgusting condition for any one to be in. They can't appreciate fun in any way, and are totally unfit for general society.

"When we got to the top of the Mountain, and were riding along its wooded crest in search of the spot for the view and the picnic, Williams rode beside me. 'Crayon,' said he, 'I am heartily sorry for your misfortune.'

"I replied, tartly, that I was not aware of having met with any serious misfortune, or of standing particularly in need of any one's sympathy, and especially of his. Frank reddened, and without more words rejoined my cousin. They exchanged a few sentences in an undertone, and presently she whipped up her horse and joined me. 'Porte, my dear cousin, you seem to be hurt. Frank, that is, Mr. Williams, did not intend to wound your feelings; and, indeed, I am extremely sorry —' 'Cousin Julia, stop this stuff. It's bad enough to be thrown by a mule, ducked, and laughed at for an hour and a half without intermission; but to be insulted in this manner, I won't put up with it. As for your Mr. Williams, he shall hear more from me.' And, to cut short the conversation and relieve my excited feelings, I gave my beast two or three sharp whacks across the rump. One would have been enough. He bolted like a shot, and when I found myself, I was hanging to the limb of a scrub oak, unhorsed, and the breath nearly knocked out of my body. I was so bewildered by this 'hey presto' movement, that although I hung only a few feet from the ground, I had not sense enough to get down myself, but was lifted down and set against a tree by one of the party.

"Like the man of Islington's second leap into the quickest hedge, this second mishap, aided by an apologetic glass of toddy brewed by Cousin

Julia, entirely restored me to my good humor, and by the time the cloth was spread, I felt as well—soul and body—as I did before I ever mounted the accursed mule.

"'Williams, a word with you.' Frank approached me rather stiffly, and we walked toward a laurel thicket a short distance off. I observed Cousin Julia's eyes following us uneasily. 'Frank Williams, I have had an unlucky day of it—I have been ducked, laughed at, and, finally, hung on the limb of a scrub oak like a scarecrow. I have borne the laugh with reasonable fortitude; but politeness and sympathy under such circumstances are beyond human endurance. Let me apologize—' 'No,' said Frank, 'I must apologize—' 'I was ill-tempered,' I insisted. 'I was a fool,' said he; and we both laughed until the tears rolled down our cheeks.

"By this time Cousin Julia had joined us. 'What are you two laughing at?' inquired she, with evident surprise and pleasure. 'Only some funny explanations we've been making,' I replied. 'Then, Sir, you owe me an explanation for your uncivil haste in riding off when I was talking to you,' and as she made this allusion she bit her lips, convulsively striving to avert an approaching paroxysm. 'Indeed, Miss Julia, I shall make no explanation whatever to you—you have diverted yourself sufficiently at me and my misfortunes to-day to clear all scores, and leave me still your creditor for a considerable amount; but Frank—oh, no, I mean Mr. Williams—is dying to make some explanations to you.' 'What do you mean, Porte?' said she, suddenly forgetting her merriment, and blushing scarlet. 'Oh! nothing at all,' I replied, hastening to rejoin the company, and chuckling at my wicked device for stopping Cousin Julia's mirth."

"Well, what became of them?" asked Minnie, with interest.

"Pshaw! They walked off somewhere, and didn't return until we had eaten up all the dinner. Some of the girls were considerate enough to save them a few sandwiches and a piece of pickle; but they didn't want any thing to eat. Frank, on being rallied about his loss of appetite, did take a sandwich; but, after nibbling a mouthful or two, he quietly slipped the remainder to a pointer dog. However, he did not refuse a thumping swig of toddy; and then, seizing my arm, he dragged me off to take a walk with him, and made me the custodian of such a string of mawkish confidences that I returned with the deliberate intention of making him drunk.

"As soon as my cousin laid eyes on us she divined my intentions, and gave me such a look! What an expressive eye Cousin Julia had! Language was really of no use to her—her eyes spoke so handsomely and eloquently; every glance was a paragraph. That look entirely unnerved me; it read thus: 'Dear Cousin Porte, can you be so ungenerous as to take advantage of poor Frank's soft condition? You know, when a young gentleman has just been accepted, he is open to any folly or extravagance that may be suggested. Don't do it, for my sake. Don't make him drunk.' Having first secured a glass of toddy for myself, to nerve me to the sacrifice, I slyly upset the pitcher on the grass. You may imagine how I was berated and reviled. Dick Spindle, who was already in a state of juvenile exhilaration, expressed his regret that the mule had not broken my neck before I got there. The girls, however, thought the accident was not amiss, and Cousin Julia gave me a look and grateful pressure of the hand that was entirely satisfactory."

"And what became of the mule?" asked Fanny.

"How absent I am. I forgot the mule entirely."

"We all forgot the mule toward the conclusion," said Dora; "and I think, cousin, your mule story was near turning into a love story."

"Bless me, child! what better could I do? The story had to run its course. My hero kicked up and ran away before the story was finished. He left me hanging in a tree with a couple of stupid lovers on my hands. I have got myself out of the tree, disposed of the eatables and drinkables, and left my lovers very happy. What more can any reasonable person ask?"

"I believe," said Minnie, "that Porte was in love with Cousin Julia himself."

"Is that the only moral you can extract from my story, little humming-bird?"

"And that Frank married Cousin Julia, of course."

"Frank did," replied Porte Crayon, with a contemptuous shrug of his shoulders. "At that day, Frank was a brilliant young man; he had a riding-horse that could out-rack Pegasus, was a jolly sportsman, chock full of adventure, and was the life of all dinner-parties and dances. Now he is the most commonplace of farmers, growing fat and rich, wearing a broad-brimmed hat and green baize leggings. He rides his old brood mare to town, with a colt trotting after him; has become a squire of the county, and goes to the Legislature. Poor Frank!" sighed Porte Crayon, feelingly, "that he should have sunk to this! And yet he don't seem aware of his degradation; he brags like a Kentuckian. 'Vita conjugalis altos et generosos spiritus frangit, et a magnis capitationibus ad humilimas detrahit.'"

And thus they beguiled the time in pleasant chat, until some two hours after mid-day, when they found themselves within sight of the neat little village of Mount Solon. The inn to which they were directed—the only one in the village—was a very modest-looking establishment altogether, and was kept by an old palsied man, who appeared as if he might have known better days. Ascertaining here that the object of their curiosity was only about two miles distant, they left their baggage and an order for supper with the landlord, and drove on.

After jolting over a rocky, uneven road for a short time, they at length had the satisfaction of seeing the black tops of the Chimneys towering above the trees in the distance. At this point our travelers left their vehicle and proceeded on foot, by a path leading through a barn-yard, to the base of the rocks, about two hundred yards from the main road.

This curious group of natural towers rises at the point of a limestone hill, which juts out like a promontory into an extensive alluvial bottom. There are seven of them, some seventy or eighty feet in height, their bases washed by a small stream, and their whole appearance reminding one of the ruined stronghold of some feudal baron surrounded by its neglected moat. To those whose fancies are more exclusively American, they look like the chimneys of a deserted iron-foundry; and altogether the picture presented is in a high degree unique and interesting. From no point can all the towers be seen at one view. The northern one is the tallest, the most completely detached from the hill, and in all respects the most perfect. Its round, regular stratifications, gradually narrowing toward the top, show like successive galleries and cornices, such as are represented in the old pictures of the Tower of Babel. This structure is about eighty feet in height, and thirty in diameter near its base. It is tunneled below by a wide archway, through which is the most convenient approach to the bases of the other towers; and from one point of view this huge mass appears supported only upon two pillars.

The southern group, consisting of three towers, united for about half their height, is also perforated by a cavernous passage, narrow at each entrance, but opening to a chamber of some size in the centre. None of the Chimneys are completely detached from the hill; and the view from every quarter is intercepted by a heavy growth of timber, much to the annoyance of the artist.

Although these rocks are highly picturesque, curious, and not wanting in grandeur, our travelers, having lately seen objects of such surpassing interest, expressed their gratification here in moderate terms, and were soon seated under some opportune apple trees, discussing their lunch with a zeal and earnestness which neither custom nor daily repetition had in the smallest degree abated.

Not so Mr. Crayon. He spent his time walking curiously about, examining the towers and caverns at all points. Having made several unsuccessful attempts to ascend the rocks, he at length succeeded in reaching the summit of one of the lowest, which is joined to the hill by a natural wall several feet in thickness, and reaching more than half way to the top of the tower. Thinking this no great feat, and perceiving that the ladies were too much engaged to look at him, he came down and betook himself to his sketch-book. Having taken his position at some distance out in the meadow to get a better view of the southern group, he was in a short time surrounded by all the dogs on the plantation—Bull, Ring, and Bobtail—who barked and clamored until they were tired, and then trotted off, surprised and disgusted at the imperturbability of the artist.

The sketches being completed, and the curiosity of all parties satisfied, our friends returned to their carriage. It was unanimously agreed that, although they had been much gratified by their visit, yet there was nothing about the Chimneys to excite enthusiasm—in short, they were wanting in the quality of sublimity. Porte went on further to observe, that he preferred the homely name of "The Chimneys" to the more elegant appellation of "Cyclopean Towers;" for, although an admirer of the classics in the abstract, and understanding fully the propriety of the name as applied to this style of architecture, yet he had always felt averse to mixing associations drawn from the Old World with American scenery. The most striking characteristic of our scenery, when compared with the European, is its freshness, observable even in the appearance of the rocks, and the charm of the impression is always disturbed by any association with the old mythology. The family of the Cyclopes was Sicilian, and was disposed of long before the discovery of America by Columbus, in 1492. Let them kick and sprawl till doomsday under their mountain tomb: we doubt if the introduction of distinguished foreigners is of much advantage in any way to us on this side of the water.

Miss Dora expressed a doubt whether there were ever any such persons as the Cyclopes. But Crayon assured her that he had seen the place where they were buried.

Arrived at the barn-yard, they found their horses still engaged in munching some remarkably fine oats, which had been served up in an old pig-trough. Crayon complimented his man on his thoughtful attention, and desired him to go and pay the farmer for the feed.

The coachman replied that, having a suspicion that the horses might get hungry, he had taken the precaution to bring a supply with them, which he had procured from Mr. Moler's barn at the Cave Hotel.

Not recollecting any charge for extra oats at that place, a suspicion began to insinuate itself into Mr. Crayon's mind.

"What?—why, here's a bushel more in the carriage-box! You scoundrel! have you been stealing, and feeding my horses on surreptitious oats?"

"No, indeed, Mass' Porte; dese ain't dem kind—dese is de best oats I seen sence I left home."

And Mice went on to declare that the oats in question fairly belonged to the horses, as they had not eaten their full allowance while stabled at the Cave Hotel, and he had only taken what he thought they ought to have eaten. He moreover added, by way of strengthening his defense, that the horses relished these oats especially, and that Mr. Moler had such a pile of them in his barn that he would not have missed ten bushels, if any one had seen fit to take that quantity. Notwithstanding this clear explanation, Crayon would have given his coachman a severe reprimand, but they all got into an uncontrollable fit of laughter, and one should never attempt to moralize without a sober countenance.

Fanny, being the first to recover her gravity sufficiently, reminded Mice of his devout belief in a place of future punishment, expressed while in the cave. This belief he re-affirmed, but felt assured that he "wasn't gwine to be saunt dere because he took good care of his hosses." Porte Crayon then mildly but firmly suggested that whenever there should be need of a fresh supply of oats, he should be informed, and that they should be acquired by purchase in the regular way—as our government formerly acquired territory. Mice acquiesced, of course, promising faithfully to attend to the matter; but looked, at the same time, as if he thought this arrangement involved a very unnecessary and absurd expenditure of money.

Our adventurers were on the road next morning before sunrise, while the fields were yet white with frost.

"This is an improvement, girls. How well you all look this morning. This is the glorious time for traveling; the horses move gayly, and puff clouds of smoke from their nostrils, like two steam-engines. Now the sun begins to show his red disk above the hills, and gilds the mountain tops rising to the westward of us."

Dora's eyes sparkled as she suddenly plucked Crayon's sleeve. "Hist! cousin, there's a pheasant."

"Where? quick—point him out!" whispered Crayon, unslinging his Yeager.

"There! don't you see? On that old log among the pines."

Mice had stopped the carriage upon the first intimation of game, and was looking intently in the bushes. "Da he is! I sees him—big as a turkey gobbler. Good Lord, Mass' Porte, shoot quick, he gwine to fly!"

"Be quiet, you blockhead! I see him now; a fine cock, with his neck stretched and his ruff up."

"Bang went the rifle—whir—r, whir—r, whir—r went the pheasants in every direction from among the grape trees, where a large company of them were breakfasting.

"Fotch him!" shouted Mice, tumbling out of the carriage, and rushing into the bushes. Presently he returned, his face illuminated with a triumphant grin, carrying the bird by the legs. "Bullet tuck him right through the neck; mizable good brile he'll make; fat as butter."

The whole company were now on the alert. "There's a pheasant! No, its a ground squirrel." "There's one in the grape tree!" Bang! down he tumbled, whirring and fluttering among the dead leaves. The girls clapped their hands, and were so full of the sport that the carriage could scarcely hold them; and when Porte Crayon missed a shot in his haste, they were quite outrageous upon him. He reinstated himself, however, by shooting two more birds shortly after. "We've now come to an open country and there will be no more pheasants this morning," remarked Crayon.

The girls were quite vexed, and insisted on going back over the same road, in the hope of seeing more game. "How blood will show itself in spite of every thing," cried the delighted Crayon; "all our family take to hunting as naturally as sparrow-hawks."

The appearance of the Augusta Springs diverted the attention of our travelers from the subject in hand; and as it was a pleasant, rural looking spot, they determined to tarry for half an hour to see what was to be seen. This place is twelve miles distant from Staunton, and is more frequented by visitors from the neighborhood than by those from a distance, its name being overshadowed by its more celebrated rivals in the counties of Bath and Greenbrier. The water is a sulphur, and is said to possess some value as a remedial agent. The girls here purchased a spotted fawn's skin from an old lady, for the purpose of making Porte Crayon a bullet pouch, to be presented as a testimonial of his skill in shooting pheasants.

About two miles from these Springs our friends struck the Lewisburg road, which passes the mountain at Jennings's Gap without a perceptible grade. From this point the country becomes more wild and rugged in its features. Mountains rise on every side, forests of pine and hemlock border the way, and limpid streams pour over rocky beds, murmuring of deer and trout. Human habitations become fewer and further between, ruder in their character, and frequently ornamented on the outside with trophies of the chase—deer's horns, racoon and bear skins, and turkeys' wings. At this season too, the road seemed to be deserted by travel. Occasionally, indeed, they met a lonely teamster, who, after exchanging with Mice their characteristic salute—a crack of the whip—passed on his snail-like journey toward Staunton.

The horses made good speed that day, although the meridian sun was hot and the road dusty. Cloverdale was reached at length and left behind. It was still far to the Bath Alum, and the sun was rapidly declining. The mountains rose grandly, deep blue with sharp-drawn outline against the glowing west. Still the tired horses were jogging on, fetlock deep in dust. The pine forests grew taller and gloomier in the fading twilight. No sign of life or civilization yet. Then utter darkness closed her wing over all the land. Night is the time for evil doers to be abroad. Night is the time when wild beasts range for their prey. Night is the season for the busy teeming fancy to conjure up its thousand phantoms. The girls whispered timidly among themselves, and Crayon instinctively examined his arms to feel assured that all was right.

"Drive cautiously now, Mice, it is useless to hurry; it can get no darker, and we must trust to the instinct of the horses."

Presently they came to a dead halt of their own accord, nor was a cautious admonition of the voice and whip sufficient to induce them to stir. "Dey sees somethin'," said Mice, who believed firmly that horses could see ghosts and other strange things invisible to mortal eyes. But the animals snorted and gently pawed the ground, thereby intimating to their masters that they were neither frightened nor fatigued, but had stopped from some other motive.

"I think I see something myself," quoth Porte Crayon; "a tall white thing standing on the left of the road."

"Lord bless us, master!" cried Mice, "what you think it is?"

"I think it is a sign-post," replied Porte. "Fanny, feel in my knapsack, under the sketchbook, and, rolled up in a silk handkerchief, you will find my tin match-box—hand it to me.”

Crayon got out, and having lighted a wisp of paper, found that he had not been deceived. There was a sign-post standing where the road forked, and by the light of his flickering torch he managed to read the direction to the Bath Alum, one mile distant. The horses, satisfied with this reconnaissance, started off briskly before Crayon had fairly regained his seat, or the coachman had given the warning crack of his whip. “D’ye hear, Mice? these horses must be well rubbed and curried before you go to bed to-night—to-morrow they shall rest.”

Now they see the star of hospitality twinkling in the distance, suggestive of smoking suppers and comfortable beds. These promises were in the present instance destined to be fully realized. Soon the cheerful board spread with biscuit, corn cakes, and hot venison steaks, rejoiced the souls of our benighted travelers, while crackling fires roared in the chimneys of the parlors and bedrooms. “Ah!” said Porte Crayon, throwing himself upon a springy sofa, with a sigh of unspeakable satisfaction, and a dreamy retrospect of numberless corn dodgers, hot and brown, floating in butter, and of four broad cut, generous portions of venison steak—“ah me! as much as I condemn luxury and despise civilization with its attendant fopperies and vices, I don’t mind taking a good supper occasionally.”

“Indeed,” said Fanny, “I don’t think you could take many such meals as you made to-night; the sixth time your plate went up for steak, both the waiter and manager got into a titter."

"My plate went up but four times," replied Crayon, dogmatically, "and the manager was laughing at my wit, and not my appetite."

"It went up six times, as I live."

"Young woman," said Crayon, with feigned asperity, "I did observe, but did not intend to comment on your performance at supper. Suffice it to say, if you had been in a region where fashion takes cognizance of what and how much ladies eat, you would have lost caste forever. Indeed, if those peony-colored cheeks of themselves would not be an insuperable objection to your admission into any refined society."

"Good gracious!" cried all the girls at once; you don't mean to say our cheeks are red?"

"Red!" quoth Crayon, contemptuously, "the word don't express it. A respectable damask rose would look pale beside them."

"This comes of traveling in the sun and wind with these foolish bonnets," cried Fanny, spitefully.

"It comes of exercise, fresh air, and good appetites; for besides, your are getting as fat as partridges."

"It is no such thing," said Minnie, indignantly. "Porte, you're a horrid bear! Come, girls, let us retire and leave him."

"And as freckled as turkey eggs," continued Crayon.

"It is positively insulting; he has no consideration for our feelings!"

"Porte shouted after them as they flounced out of the room, insisting that he had not intended to offend, and had really supposed he was complimenting them.

After enjoying his sofa for a while, it occurred to him to commend his pheasants to the cook, as they might probably be opportune at breakfast. Nor did he omit to assure himself of the well-being of the horses, and not long after, our hero found himself mentally comparing the merits of a hair mattress with those of the hemlock couch of the Canaan. As no conclusion has ever been reported, it is supposed he fell asleep before finally disposing of the subject.

The drizzling rain which fell during the whole of next day did not prevent our friends from enjoying their comfortable quarters, nor even from making sundry outdoor excursions. The improvements at the Bath Alum are certainly superior, in point of taste and elegance, to those at any watering-place in the mountains of Virginia. At a distance of several hundred yards from the hotel, beneath a slatestone cliff, fifteen feet in height, are found the Alum Springs, which are nothing more than six little reservoirs, so excavated as to catch the drippings from the projecting rock. These reservoirs contain the alum water in different degrees of strength; one of them is a strong chalybeate, and one a mixture of chalybeate and alum. These waters are but recently known as a remedial agent, and have suddenly obtained immense celebrity by their success in curing diseases hitherto reckoned incurable. Those who are desirous of more accurate and extended information on the subject, are commended to Dr. Burke's excellent work on the Virginia Springs, or what might be still more to the purpose, a visit to the Springs themselves. As for our travelers, having taken large doses of broiled pheasant that morning, they confined their experiments in alum water to a cautious sip from the glass handed by the polite manager, a comical wry face, and a forced compliment to its flavor—faugh!

DELIGHTFUL! ISN'T IT?

In the afternoon the rain increased to a continued heavy shower, notwithstanding which, Crayon, accompanied by his valet, went hunting, and it was near dark before they returned weary, wet, and hungry, with only three or four unlucky squirrels for their pains.

From this place to the Warm Springs, the distance of five miles, is accomplished by traversing the Great Warm Spring Mountain, on an easy, well-constructed road. When our friends set out from the Alum the rain had ceased, and fair promises of a clear day were given. Masses of damp-looking clouds still hung about the tops of the mountains, as if unwilling yet to yield the day to Phœbus, who, for his part, poured his bright rays through at every opening, producing in endless variety those brilliant and startling effects of light and shade so much sought after by the scenic school of English artists. When about half-way up the mountain, the girls, who had walked in advance, were seen suddenly to turn and fly with all speed toward the slow-toiling carriage.

"O Heavens, let us in—let us in quick!"

"What now? What's the matter? Have you encountered some untimely snake, or frost-bitten lizard?"

To Crayon's inquiry they vouchsafed no reply, but in breathless haste bundled into the vehicle; and ere they had fairly disposed themselves in their seats, the question was answered from another quarter. Where the road swept in a bold curve around the base of a cliff, now advanced with slow and stately tread, in all the pomp of bovine majesty, the vanguard of one of those monstrous herds of cattle wending their way from the rich pastures of Monroe and Greenbrier to the eastward. First came a stout negro, with stupid face and loutish step, leading an ox, whose sublime proportions and majestic port might have served as a disguise for Jove himself.

"Large rolls of fat about his shoulders clung,
And from his neck the double dewlap hung," while his horns sprung from his curling forehead in tapering length a full cloth-yard each one. What horns! What noble drinking-cups they would have made. One of them would hold enough to fuddle a Thracian. The negro remarked Crayon's admiring glances, and, as he touched his hat, the dull face lighted up with an expression: "Am not I one of the chosen—I who serve so magnificent a beast? Night and morning I curry him, and walk all day in his presence. He and I are the observed and envied of all." "'Pears to me," said Mice, "dat fool nigger is proud to be a leadin' of dat big beef."

Following this leader came a train of thirty or forty others scarcely inferior in size or appearance; and when the carriage, winding slowly through this formidable-looking company, turned the angle of rock, the road was visible in its windings for a mile or more, alive with cattle and bristling with horns. The horses held on their way through the living mass as steadily as if unaware of their presence, although the mountain resounded far and near with the hoarse bellowing of the beeves, mingled with the oaths and whoops of the drivers. The girls, who at first looked doubtfully upon the array of monstrous horns and the red, lowering eyes of the savage troop, soon regained their self-possession, and commented coolly on their size and keeping.

The celebrated view from the summit of the Warm Spring Mountain did not strike our travelers very forcibly, probably owing to the clouds which hid the distant mountain-tops rising to the eastward. The view of the Warm Springs and the valley seen directly below them was extremely pretty. This village, which is the country-seat of Bath, owes its existence and name to the famous fountain; and, in fact, consists of nothing more than the group of hotels, cottages, and out-houses about the Springs, and the ordinary county buildings, a court-house, jail, etc.

The principal hotel has heretofore had a high reputation for excellence; and the bathing-houses, although somewhat primitive in their construction, furnish a bath at a natural temperature of 98° Fahrenheit, the luxury of which must be experienced to be appreciated.

Our party remained at this place but a few hours, and hurried on to the Hot Springs, five miles distant, where they arrived about five o'clock on Saturday evening, on the 22d of October. Although the hotel here was closed for the season, the proprietor gave them a hospitable welcome, and they soon found themselves installed in comfortable quarters.

THE DROVE.

THE WARM SPRINGS.

This place, to the scientific traveler, is one of the most curious and interesting in the mountains. The Hot Springs, about twenty in number, issue from the base of a hill or spur of the Warm Spring Mountain, and range in temperature from 98° to 106° , but owing to the proximity of fountains of cold water at 53° , baths of any intermediate temperature may be had. The bathing-houses are numerous and well-arranged to suit the purposes of invalids. These waters are chiefly celebrated for their efficacy in rheumatism, dyspepsia, and affections of the liver, although they are resorted to by all classes of invalids. The proprietor is himself an eminent physician, and to the enlightened use of the waters under his direction is probably owing much of their success in the cure of disease.

The hotel and cottages here are pleasantly situated and comfortable, and the table most unexceptionable. Sunday was a delightful day, and our friends passed it pleasantly and quietly, wandering up and down hills, through meadows and forests, drinking in buoyant health with the pure atmosphere, and enjoying the mellow beauties of the autumn landscape. The evening fell in still and solemn grandeur.

"We will have a brilliant starlit night," quoth Crayon; "the air is soft and balmy. To-morrow I will make two or three fine sketches before we leave here."

"To-morrow," said Fanny, "I will produce my colors, and attempt this bit of purple landscape opening to the south."

"To-morrow," laughed Minnie May, "I will gather leaves of the maple and hickory, and weave chaplets of crimson and gold to crown our artists withal."

"And what shall I do to-morrow?" inquired Dora. "I'll point Porte Crayon's pencils for him, and hold Fanny's color-box while she paints, and help Minnie to weave her chaplets."

To-morrow, ay, to-morrow—O! simple-hearted schemers, who can reckon what a night may bring forth? In a night the gourd of Jonah grew, and in a night it withered. In a night the host of the Assyrian was blasted. And while your young eyelids are fanned by the soothing wings of sleep, in the darkness and silence of a night, what mighty changes may be wrought upon the face of nature!

"Porte Crayon, Porte Crayon, arise and look out of the window!" Porte Crayon opened his sleepy eyes, and gave a great yawn. "Methinks I heard a voice, and the pattering of light feet about my door." Our hero arose, and hastily donned his vestments; there was no one at the door; he then drew the curtain of the window.

"With wild surprise,
As if to marble struck, devoid of sense,
A stupid moment motionless he stood."

Presently, recovering his faculties in some degree, he rubbed his eyes and looked again. Our hero was well read in the philosophy of the schools, and knew how little credit was due to any appearance based solely upon the evidence of the senses. He pinched his ear, and plucked his beard. He rapped his skull with his knuckles. "Cogito, ergo sum," quoth he; "and yet this morning I am inclined to be a disciple of Pyrrho.

THE HOT SPRINGS.

"If I be I, as I do hope I be,

There are three little girls in the adjoining room, and they know me."

No wonder that the view from the window confused our hero's faculties and chilled his soul to marble. Lawn and grove, field and forest, meadow and mountain, were all covered deep with a white panoply of snow, and all the air was misty with the thick-descending flakes. Crayon hastily completed his toilet, and sallied forth. The first person he met was his coachman, hat in hand, and with a countenance of dumb dismay. "How now, Mice; what news?" Mice pointed to the front porch of the hotel, where the snow lay eight inches deep. "Mass' Porte, dis is redicklus."

"Go look after your horses; see that carriage and harness are sound and trim; then call for further orders."

The ladies were already in the breakfast-room, huddling around the fire, with looks equally expressive of dismay, but by no means dumb.

"Oh, Cousin Porte, what shall we do?"

"What shall we do, brother?" "What a dreadful thing, what can we do?"

Porte Crayon had that morning been more unnerved at the sight of the snow than he would be willing now to admit; but of all things to rouse the pride and energies of man, there is nothing like an appeal from one or more frightened beauties.

"What shall we do?—Do?" quoth our hero, giving his mustache a gallant twirl, "Impri-mis, let us breakfast." The cock-eyed servant, with a polite bow, intimated that the meal alluded to awaited their orders. Hot coffee, muffins, and beef-steak are well calculated to inspire vigorous and stout-hearted counsels. Their position and prospects were discussed during the progress of the meal. While waiting for the butter to melt on his fourth muffin, Porte Crayon prefaced a harangue with a thump on the table, so energetic that it made the china dance, and he felt under the necessity of apologizing for his violence before going on with his speech.

VOL. X.—No. 57.—U

"We will push on to the White Sulphur, if we are frozen to mummies. It is written in the programme, and we must accomplish it or perish in the attempt."

Here Dora intimated that she entertained a peculiar dislike to the idea of perishing in the snow.

"True enough, child; you shall not perish; I'll engage to carry you through without the slightest risk, and even without any considerable discomfort. I never was the man," said he, with a valiant look—(here he stopped to point his discourse with a mouthful of muffin and a swig of coffee)—"I never was the man to be bullied by the weather. I am ready to beard old Hiems himself, though backed by his flunkies, blustering Boreas and Jack Frost both together."

Crayon's swaggering manner, conjointly with the beef-steak, inspired all about him. The girls went bravely to work preparing for the sortie. All the extra shawls and worsted comforters were put in requisition; and Crayon's supply of yarn socks were distributed round to serve as overshoes.

Mice brought up the carriage in complete order; the curtains all down, and the bottom covered knee-deep with fresh hay. All arrangements being now complete, not forgetting a bag plethoric with lunch, Crayon gallantly took the girls in his arms and carried them one by one to the carriage, safe and dry-shod. Then depositing his rifle in a dry place, and brushing the snow from his feet, he took his seat beside the driver. The apron-cloth was drawn up over their legs, and with a brisk chirrup and a crack of the whip they started into the storm.

No spiteful spitting from a passing cloud was this; no accidental dredging from the snow-box; no light squadron of skirmishers adventuring far in advance of the imperial army of winter; here was the Snow-King himself, with all his host, marshaled in precipitating his squadrons upon the baggage-burdened retreat of Autumn. The 24th of October! Who ever heard of such a thing? It was a surprise, a base violation of compact, ungenerous, unlike a king, thus to take Nature all unvarned and unprepared. The forests, still encumbered with their tawdry apparel, were yielding fast on every side. The younger and lither trees bent their loaded crowns to the earth before the conquerer; the tall pine, whose evergreen top bore up the snow like a broad white canopy, would suddenly rip loose from the earth and fall like some smitten giant. The stout oak, who had braved a hundred winters, stood proud and defiant. "The Old Guard never yields!" Vain boast. A sudden crash proclaims the triumph of this remorseless enemy, and, one by one, his fifty strong arms are riven, and fall helpless to the ground.

"Battle's magnificently stern array,"

The horses bore themselves sturdily. The roan and sorrel were of good mettle; their backs were white with snow; the snow balled in their hoofs and tripped them as they moved; but they never faltered. When they reached the toll-gate on Jackson's river, nine miles from their starting-place, the storm, raged with unabated fury. The toll-gatherer begged them not to persist in the attempt to cross Morris's Hill. The road was blocked up so as to be impassable; a man had made the attempt that morning on horse-back and had returned.—"We will try it. En avant."—"Good luck to you, stranger," shouted the gate-keeper, hurrying into the house.

As they slowly toiled up the mountain through the deepening snow, the scene opened in all its wildness. The North Wind, not then the blustering braggart, came down upon them in his might. The downy-cushioned earth and woods gave back no echo to the sound of his rushing wings; but with silent energy and hissing malignity he drove the drifting clouds before him; now blinding men and horses with the showering flakes, now revealing in a long, wintry vista, the unbroken highway and snow-encumbered forest.

Sometimes the young growth was bowed from either side until the tops, interlocking in the centre, formed a snowy archway over the road. Then our adventurers would dash through, helter-skelter, and find themselves half buried in the avalanche from the shaken trees. Sometimes through erring judgment the rush would prove a failure, and they would be brought up standing, with their equipage so entangled in tree tops and grape vines, that it was necessary to open the passage with their knives. Sometimes trees were found lying across the way, as if forbidding their further progress. Then Mice would descend, and setting his ponderous strength against the obstacle, would roll it from the road, and pass on. When they at times encountered a tree too much for their strength, then, by deftly combining art with force, they would bend the limbs one by one, and hack them off with the hunting-knife until a passage was cleared.

When surrounded by difficulties, Porte Crayon is frequently in the habit of warming his courage by repeating heroic verses. On that occasion the noble lines of Scott, describing the battle of Flodden Field, were uppermost in his mind.

"No thought was there of dastard flight,
Linked in that serried phalanx tight,
Groom fought like noble, squire like knight,
As fearlessly and well."

They are brave verses, although they seem to have no especial applicability to the subject.

In the warfare on Morris's Hill, the groom was the predominant character. In narrating the matter, Porte Crayon says, "I was no more to be compared with him on that field than the presumptuous frog to the doughty ox. To be sure I was not idle; I hacked and hewed with my knife to the best of my ability; I waded about in the snow, and gave directions, shouted, sung, and made brave speeches; but Mice performed prodigies. Things that he took hold of seemed to lose their weight and tenacity. He would seize a moderate-sized pine-tree by the crown, and drag it out of the track as though it had been a bush. When the road for an eighth of a mile was so overhung with snow-bowed saplings and grape vines that the possibility of penetrating them was doubtful, he would walk ahead shaking, breaking, and tearing every thing before him, like an elephant in an Indian jungle, or a hippopotamus among the reeds of the Gariop."

"The events of that day," continues Crayon, "have covered the humble name of Little Mice with imperishable glory, nor shall a historian and limner be wanting to blazon his deeds to an admiring world. What a moment for the artist to seize him, as he issued from the bushes covered with snow, looking like a polar bear, and trailing after him, by his unconscious legs, a hundred feet of grape vine!"

THE HERO OF MORRIS'S HILL.

The snow had by this time attained a depth of fourteen inches, and was still deepening and drifting furiously. While the storm grew mightier, human and equine energy had their limits. The horses panted and sobbed at every hard brush, and the snow-flakes no longer whitened their smoking hides. Wet, worn, and chilled, master and man sat drowsily in their seats, feeling the approach of that dangerous lethargy which steals over men too long exposed to cold.

"Mass' Porte, I wish we was at a tavern," exclaimed the subdued coachman.

Porte folded his arms across his breast, and, with a desperate look, took a rapid mental survey of their position. "It is now four o'clock; night will be upon us a little after five. Since we passed the toll-gate we have scarcely averaged a mile in an hour. The horses are failing; this over-done giant is losing his courage. We shall be benighted, and completely blocked up by the snow in this wild, inhospitable forest. Poor girls! it was my rashness and obstinacy that brought them into this perilous position. God knows what may happen. I dare not think of it. They have been silent within there for some time. I have had no desire to communicate with them. I must warn them against sleeping, however; and must be careful not to alarm their fears. No, not for the world; they would sink under it, if they even suspected their situation."

Crayon quietly lifted the corner of the front curtain, and peeped into the interior of the vehicle.

The first glance at his charge relieved him of any fears as to the state of their minds. They were not asleep, nor were they weeping; but Fanny had the lunch sack in her lap, from which she had distributed sundry biscuits and slices of ham, and at the exact moment of Crayon's observation, all three were so busy in dismembering a broiled chicken, that he dropped the curtain and regained his former position unperceived. One might have supposed that this exhibition of the "mens æqua in arduis" in a trio of women would have delighted our hero. On the contrary, he was highly indignant. He mentally accused them of lacking the wit to appreciate their danger, and of the most heartless indifference to his exposure and sufferings. Moreover, when he thought of the heroic labors of Mice and himself, and compared their present forlorn condition with that of the ungrateful girls, giggling over their lunch, he felt strongly inclined to break in upon the feast, and warn them of their approaching fate.

"Mass' Porte, please Sir, ontie dis knot in my whip lash; somehow my fingers won't work."

"Neither will mine," said Crayon, "and I can't limber them. My gloves are wet, and my pockets full of snow."

"Here, take these, Porte," and a dainty little hand appeared beneath the curtain, presenting a pair of fur-tipped gloves. He received them with a gruff acknowledgment, and then regarding the gift with a smile of indifference, muttered—"The inconsiderate child; I couldn't get three fingers into them." So saying, he thrust them carelessly into the left pocket of his vest. Crayon felt a genial warmth pervading his half-congealed breast. It is difficult to believe that so trifling an addition to a man's clothing as those bits of fur and silk could produce so great a change; possibly their location in the vest pocket had something to do with it, but true it is, from that moment our hero felt neither cold nor despondency. Once more he sat erect, and his drooping eye again glanced defiance to the tempest.

"They shall not perish, positively," he growled between his teeth. "Their entire insouciance doubtless proceeds from a firm reliance on my promise that no harm should befall them; and they believe in my ability to fulfill it as confidently as if I were ruler of the storm. How beautifully feminine the trait, and how abject the soul that would not fire with the assumed responsibility!" Crayon's bosom so glowed with these generous emotions, that all the snow melted off the breast of his coat, and he broke forth into voluntary song. What particular song he sung is not recorded. Doubtless it was a good one, for the curtain was drawn up, and voices from the interior of the carriage swelled the jolly chorus.

"Amid the storm they sang" so blythe a carol, so hearty and so brave withal, that Boreas, in sheer disgust and impotence, gave up the war.

They had passed Morris's Hill, and the road lay before them plain and unencumbered, except by the depth of snow. The country too appeared more open, and the coachman's ardent wish to see a tavern seemed likely to be gratified speedily. Night overtook them, however, still toiling onward at a snail's pace. The driver dozed in his seat, abandoning the vehicle entirely to the discretion and instinct of the horses, and the silence was only disturbed by the creaking of the carriage and the monotonous crunching of the snow beneath the wheels. The effervescence of enthusiasm was past, and overwrought nature claimed her dues. Undisturbed by doubt or apprehension, our travelers sank unresistingly into pleasant reveries, and these, as if by a common instinct, turned toward their distant home. These siren thoughts insensibly glided into dreams. Their journey was accomplished; they had returned to their kindred; the welcome was over; the pantry ransacked to add to the profusion of the groaning board; "the fire fair blazing and the vestment warm" were prepared for them. Caressing friends sat listening with complacent admiration to their narratives of hair-breadth 'scapes and natural wonders. They recalled the Fort Mountains, the Cave, the Chimneys; they remembered the day they crossed Morris's Hill in a snow storm. A terrible day it was, and stoutly they bore themselves through it all.

At length the horses stopped, and the sorrel gave a loud snort, to which the roan replied with a triumphant whinny. Porte Crayon started from his sleep so suddenly that he flattened his cap against the top of the carriage. Before them, at a distance of no more than a couple of hundred yards, he saw a number of lights, and heard a confusion of loud voices. "Wake up, you lout! Here's a tavern at last!" shouted Crayon, shaking and pommeling his man with all his might. In a state of complete bewilderment, Mice stretched his benumbed limbs, and mechanically resumed the governorship of the carriage. "Girls! girls! wake up. We've arrived at last."

"At home? Are we at home?" said Dora, eagerly.

"No, child; but, most fortunately for us, at a tavern."

"Oh, cousin, are we still in the storm?" said Minnie. "I have had such a pleasant dream."

Before our travelers had fairly recovered their consciousness, their vehicle had threaded its way among a number of road wagons, and was drawn up in front of a country tavern—a long, low, wooden building, with a rude porch running the whole length of the front. The girls were daintily transferred to the house, and the horses immediately driven off to the stables.

"May I be spavined," said a wagoner to the group that witnessed the disembarkation, "if there baint an old feller with a beard as white as Noah's when he come out of the ark!"

"Cuss my hide," said a drover, "if I know what started a flock of wimmin to take the road sich a day as this."

The supper, at which the tidy hostess presided, was such as her honest spouse had promised, and consisted of fried middling and flapjacks, with six varieties of fruit preserved in the same fermented molasses. But, like Baucis and Philemon of old,

"The kindly hosts their entertainment grace
With hearty welcome and with open face;
In all they did you might discern with ease
A willing mind and a desire to please."

During the meal the man was at his wit's end to know how he should lodge his newly-arrived guests; but, on consultation with his wife, it was agreed that their own room, which was in a cottage standing in the yard, and a little way removed from the main building, should be arranged for the young ladies, the dame, with her brood, retreating into the loft, and the man agreeing to take his chance among the wagoners. Crayon desired nothing better for himself; and taking leave of the girls, went in search of his lieutenant, that he might have some assurance of the welfare of the horses. At the end of an hour he found him seated beside the kitchen fire, and there received the following artless report of his proceedings: The stables were even more crowded than the house. Not a stall was to be found, nor even a shed to shelter our faithful pair. The roan and sorrel looked wistfully into the crowded sheds, and saluted the possessors with many gracious and friendly whinnies. These salutations were civilly answered from within, but no movement was made to offer a place to the new-comers. Mice begged and diplomatized in vain; he received nothing but curses and threats from the wagoners. When these, one by one, had looked after their horses and retired to the more attractive precincts of the bar-room, he cast his eye upon the hostler, a negro lad who had been kicked and cuffed enough that day to prepare him for any thing that might be proposed. Mice desired his good offices to assist him in getting his horses under shelter, at the same time greasing his palm with a quarter. The boy insisted that every place was "chock full;" and then added, in a tone that might have passed for suggestive, "Dassent move any of 'em, no, indeed—eh! eh!"—"Whose hosses is dese?" asked Mice. "Dem's Mr. Longbow's, biggest devil of 'em all."—"Here's a big, wide stall, only one hoss in?"—"Eh! eh! him kicks like forty jackasses." Mice inquired still further, and finally ascertained that a couple of horses occupying a very cozy place, belonged to an individual who was dead drunk over in the loft of the tavern. Without more ado he untied their halters, and kicking them out into the yard, introduced his suffering friends into the vacated places. The boy made a show of protesting, and threatened Mice with the awful consequences of his temerity. "De Lord knows," he sagely observed in reply, "a man what's dead drunk ain't a-gwine to hurt any body." And besides, he promised himself to get up before daylight and replace the unlucky animals whose misfortune it was to have a master that got drunk. The roan and sorrel doubtless had a comfortable night, if indeed the general belief is correct that horses have no consciences.

That portion of the company which more particularly calls for the interest and solicitude of every gallant and humane traveler being disposed of for the present in the most satisfactory manner, if any one is desirous of knowing what further adventures befell our friends during their sojourn at this inn or elsewhere, he is referred to the next chapter of this veritable history.

NAPOLEON BONAPARTE.

BY JOHN S. C. ABBOTT.

THE REMOVAL OF THE REMAINS OF THE EMPEROR TO FRANCE.

THE history of most men terminates with the grave. It is not so with Napoleon. His wild and wondrous story is continued beyond the dying hour and the silence of the tomb. Nine years, after the burial of the Emperor, passed away, during which the long agony of St. Helena increasingly engrossed the attention of the world. Every memorial of his cruel sufferings was eagerly sought for, and a chord of sympathy was struck which vibrated in all human hearts.

In the notable three days of July, 1830, the French nation rose as one man, and, for the third time, expelled the Bourbons from the throne of France. In accordance with the prediction of Napoleon the crown was placed upon the brow of Louis Philippe, Duke of Orleans. Two months had hardly passed after this event, ere, early in October, a petition was presented to the Chamber of Deputies, requesting that the remains of Napoleon might be claimed of the British Government, and restored to France. The enthusiasm which his name ever inspired, but which had been repressed under the feudal monarchy of the Bourbons, now found free utterance. "Napoleon," said M. de Montigny upon this occasion, "re-established order and tranquillity in our country. He led our armies to victory. His sublime genius put an end to anarchy. His military glory made the French name respected throughout the whole world; and his name will ever be pronounced with emotion and veneration."

This petition was followed by many others, and a flame was enkindled in the hearts of the people which could not be repressed. It may be supposed that the government of Louis Philippe regarded with some apprehension this enthusiasm in behalf of the memory of Napoleon. But resistance was vain. There was no alternative but to attempt to take the lead in the universal movement.

On the 8th of July, 1831, by a national ordinance it was decreed that the statue of the Emperor Napoleon should be replaced upon the column in the Place Vendôme. The now humbled Allies who had, with sacrilegious hands, torn down that statue from its appropriate summit, no longer ventured to resist its triumphant ascension.

On the 29th of July, 1832, the son of Napoleon, born King of Rome, but named by his grandfather the Duke of Reichstadt, died at the age of twenty-one years, a dejected prisoner in the palace of his maternal relatives. Thus the direct line of the Emperor Napoleon became extinct.

The statue of the Emperor, in accordance with the national decree, was elevated upon its glorious pedestal on the 1st of June, 1838, with great pomp, and amidst the universal acclamations of France. Upon that majestic column were inscribed the words:

"Monument reared to the glory of the Grand Army, by Napoleon the Great. Commenced the 15th of August, 1806. Finished the 15th of August, 1810."

"28th of July, 1833, Anniversary of the Revolution of July, and the year Three of the reign of Louis Philippe I., the statue of Napoleon has been replaced upon the column of the Grand Army."

By similar ceremonies on the 1st of August, 1834, a statue of Napoleon was placed in the court-yard of the royal hotel of the Invalides. On the 14th of September of the same year, the Court of Cassation, the highest court of appeal in France, rendered homage to the most profound legislator the world has ever known, by suspending in the council chamber a magnificent portrait of Napoleon, representing the Emperor pointing to the immortal Napoleonic code. These acts of grateful recognition were but the prelude to a scene of national homage which arrested the gaze of the world, and which, in all the elements of sublimity and triumph, must forever remain without a parallel.

It will be remembered that the Emperor had written in his will, with his own hand, "It is my wish that my ashes may repose on the banks of the Seine, in the midst of the French people whom I loved so well." The French nation, liberated from the bayonets of the Allies, now, with a united voice, swelling from the Rhine to the Pyrenees, demanded of the English government the remains of their beloved Emperor.

On the 5th of May, 1840, the anniversary of Napoleon's death, the application was made to the government of Great Britain by M. Guizot, in the following official note. M. Thiers was at that time at the head of the French Ministry.

"The undersigned, ambassador extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of his Majesty the King of the French, has the honor, conformably to instructions received from his government, to inform his Excellency the Minister of Foreign Affairs to her Majesty, the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain, that the King ardently desires that the mortal remains of Napoleon may be deposited in a tomb in France, in the country which he defended and rendered illustrious, and which proudly preserves the ashes of thousands of his companions-in-arms, officers and soldiers devoted with him to the services of their country. The undersigned is convinced that her Britannic Majesty's government will only see in this desire of his Majesty the King of the French a just and pious feeling, and will give the orders necessary to the removal of any obstacle to the transfer of Napoleon's remains from St. Helena to France."

Times were now changed, and this demand could not be denied. The response was speedy and cordial. On the 9th of May Lord Palmerston transmitted the following reply, in which it will be observed with pleasure that the English government no longer stigmatized the renowned Emperor of France as a usurping general, but promptly recognized his imperial title:

"The government of her Britannic Majesty hopes that the promptness of its answer may be considered in France as a proof of its desire to blot out the last trace of those national animosities which, during the life of the Emperor, armed England and France against each other. Her Majesty's government hopes that if such sentiments survive any where, they may be buried in the tomb about to receive the remains of Napoleon."

This was all the amends which the English government could make for its unpardonable crime against the independence of nations. Justice exults in seeing the charge of usurpation thus retracted, in the recognition of the imperial title of the monarch of popular suffrage. Napoleon in his tomb had gained the victory.

On the 12th of May the French Ministry made the following communication to the Chamber of Deputies:

"Gentlemen; the King has ordered his royal highness the Prince of Joinville to proceed with his frigate to the island of St. Helena, to receive the mortal remains of the Emperor Napoleon. We come to ask of you the means to receive them worthily upon the soil of France, and to erect for Napoleon his last tomb. The government, anxious to accomplish a great national duty, has addressed itself to England. It has demanded of her the precious deposit which fortune had surrendered into her hands. The frigate charged with the mortal remains of Napoleon, will present itself, on its return, at the mouth of the Seine. Another vessel will convey them to Paris. They will be deposited in the Invalides. A solemn ceremony, a grand religious and military pomp will inaugurate the tomb which is to receive them forever. It is important, gentlemen, to the majesty of such a commemoration, that this august sepulture should not be in a public place, in the midst of a noisy and inattentive crowd. It is proper that it should be in a silent and sacred spot, which can be visited with awe by those who respect glory and genius, grandeur and misfortune. He was Emperor and King. He was the legitimate sovereign of our country. With such a title he could be interred at St. Denis. But Napoleon must not have the ordinary sepulture of kings. He must still reign and command in the building in which the soldiers of the country repose, and to which all who may be called upon to defend it, will go to draw their inspirations. His sword will be placed upon his tomb. Under the dome, in the midst of the temple consecrated by religion to the God of armies, art will raise a tomb worthy, if possible, of the name which is to be engraven upon it. His monument must be of simple beauty, but of noble form, and have that aspect of firmness and solidity which appears to defy the action of time. The monument of Napoleon must be as durable as his fame. Henceforth France, and France alone, will possess all that remains of Napoleon. His tomb, like his renown, will belong only to his country."

This annunciation, so nobly expressed, was received by the Chamber of Deputies, and by the whole of France, with a tumultuous burst of applause. The Prince of Joinville, with two armed ships, was immediately sent to St. Helena. General Gourgaud, General Bertrand, and Count Las Cases, the companions of the Emperor's imprisonment, accompanied the expedition. A coffin of solid ebony, elaborately carved in the shape of the ancient sarcophagi, was constructed, large enough to inclose the coffins in which the Emperor was interred, so that his ashes might not be disturbed. One single word, NAPOLÉON, in letters of gold, was placed upon the face of this massive and polished sarcophagus. A very magnificent funeral pall of velvet, sprinkled with gold bees, and bordered with a broad band of ermine, was also provided. At each corner was an eagle, embroidered in gold, and surmounted with the imperial crown.

On the 8th of October the two ships cast anchor in the harbor of St. Helena, and were received with friendly salutes from the forts, and also from the English ships of war which were in the roadstead, awaiting the arrival of the French vessels. The 15th of October was the twenty-fifth anniversary of the arrival of the angust prisoner at this dreary rock. This day was appointed for the exhumation of his remains. Precisely at midnight the British royal engineers, under direction of the Governor-General of St. Helena, and in presence of the French and English commissioners, commenced their work.

After nine hours of uninterrupted labor the earth was dug from the vault, the solid masonry removed, and the heavy slab which covered the internal sarcophagus was lifted by means of a crane. Prayers were then offered with uncovered heads, the coffin was carefully raised, and conveyed to a tent which had been prepared for its reception. With religious awe the three coffins of mahogany, lead, and tin were opened, and upon carefully lifting a white satin veil the body of the Emperor was exposed to view. The remains had been so effectually protected from dampness and the air, that, to the surprise of all, the features of the Emperor were so little changed that he was instantly recognized by those who had known him when alive. His military dress exhibited but slight decay, and he reposed, in marble beauty, as if he were asleep. The emotion experienced by all was deep and unutterable. Many burst into tears. The hallowed remains were exposed to the external air less than two minutes, when the coffins were again closed, and soldered with the utmost care, and were then placed in the massive ebony sarcophagus which was brought from Paris, and which was also protected by a strong box of oak.

In the mean time clouds darkened the sky, the rain fell in torrents, dense sheets of mist enveloped the crags in almost midnight gloom, and a dismal tempest wailed its dirges over the gloomy rock. Minute-guns, from the forts and from the ships in the harbor, blended their thunders with the sublime requiem of the ocean and of the sky. Still nearly all the inhabitants of St. Helena, regardless of the deluging storm, were at the grave, and followed in the procession from the tomb to the ships. The funeral car was drawn by four horses, each led by a groom, while eight officers walked by the side of the hearse. All the military, naval, and civil authorities of the island accompanied the remains, with crape on the left arm. And, by the express invitation of the Governor, the successor of Sir Hudson Lowe, all the gentlemen of the island were invited to attend in mourning. The whole military force of St. Helena, consisting of the regular soldiers and the militia, were also called out to honor these marvelous obsequies, in which repentant England surrendered Napoleon to France. As the vast procession wound slowly along among the rocks, the most soul-subduing dirges of martial bands blended with the solemn booming of minute guns and with the roar of the elements. The streets of Jamestown were shrouded in crape, the yards of the shipping apeak, and all their flags at half-mast. Napoleon went down into the tomb denounced as an usurper. He emerged from it, after the slumber of twenty years, acknowledged an emperor.

At the quay, where the English lines terminated, the Prince of Joinville had assembled around him the French officers, all in deep mourning. As the car approached, they stood in reverential silence, with heads uncovered. The car stopped within a few paces of the mourning group. The Governor-General of St. Helena then advanced, and, in the name of the British government, surrendered to France the remains of the Emperor. The coffin was then received beneath the folds of the French flag, exciting emotions in the bosoms of all present such as can not be described. From that moment the same honors which the Emperor had received while living were paid to his mortal remains. Banners were unfurled and salutes were fired as the coffin was conveyed in a cutter, accompanied by a retinue of boats, to the ship. It was received on board between two ranks of officers under arms, and was then placed in a consecrated chapel, constructed for the purpose, and illuminated with waxen lights. A guard of sixty men, commanded by the oldest lieutenant, rendered to the remains imperial honors. The ladies of St. Helena had offered, as a homage to the memory of the Emperor, a rich banner, embroidered by their own hands. This graceful token from the English ladies was suspended in the chapel. The affecting scenes of the day were closed by the appropriate observance of those religious rites which the serious spirit of the Emperor had so deeply revered.

The English authorities had vied with the French in rendering all possible official honors to the memory of the Emperor. "During the whole time," says one of the French officers, "the mission remained at Jamestown, the best understanding never ceased to exist between the population of the island and the French. The Prince de Joinville and his companions met, in all quarters and at all times, with the greatest good-will, and the warmest testimonials of sympathy. The authorities and the inhabitants must have felt, no doubt, great regret at seeing taken away from their island the coffin that had rendered it so celebrated. But they repressed their feelings with a courtesy that does honor to their character."

The vessels sailed from St. Helena on the 18th of October, just twenty-five years and three days from the time when Napoleon was landed upon the island, a captive, to pass through the long agony of his death. As they were crossing the equator, on the 2d of November, a French ship of war met them, with the alarming intelligence that hostilities had probably already commenced between England and France, upon the subject of the Turkish-Egyptian treaty. The danger of capture was consequently imminent. The Prince of Joinville immediately resolved that, in case he should meet with a superior force, rather than surrender the remains of the Emperor again to the English, the ship and all its inmates should go down, to accompany the ashes of Napoleon to a common sepulchre in the abyss of the ocean. This heroic resolve was communicated to the whole ship's company, and was received with an unanimous and an enthusiastic response. Fortunately, however, this cloud of war was dissipated.

On the 2d of December, the anniversary of the great victory of Austerlitz, the two funeral frigates entered the harbor of Cherbourg. Three ships of war, the Austerlitz, the Friedland, and the Tilsit, immediately encircled with protecting embrace the ships which bore the sacred relics. All the forts and batteries, and all the ships of war fired a salute of twenty-one guns each. The coffin was then transferred to the steam-ship Normandy, which had been, at great expense and with exquisite taste, prepared for the occasion. On the 9th the convoy entered the mouth of the Seine. A magnificent chapel had been constructed upon the unobstructed deck of the steamer, in which the coffin was placed, so raised as to be conspicuous to all who might crowd the banks of the stream. A very imposing effect was produced by the number of wax-lights and flambeaux which, by day and by night, threw a flood of light upon the coffin. The imperial mantle, sweeping to the floor, covered the sarcophagus. On a cushion at the head of the coffin rested the imperial crown, veiled with crape. A sentry with muskets was stationed in each corner of the chapel. At the head of the coffin stood an ecclesiastic in full canonicals.

Several officers were grouped near him. The Prince of Joinville stood alone at the foot of the coffin.

Thus the cortège approached the city of Havre. Watchful eyes had discerned its coming, when it appeared but as a dark speck in the dim blue of the horizon. The whole city was in commotion. Minute-guns were fired; funeral bells were tolled; and the still air was filled with dirges from well-trained martial bands. All business was suspended. Every sound was hushed but the appropriate voices of grief. The crowd, oppressed with a religious awe, preserved the most profound silence as the imperial steamship, with her black hull and tapering masts—to which were attached the banners of France, gently fluttering in the breeze—glided majestically to her appointed station.

At this place arrangements had been made to convey the remains, by a smaller steamer, up the river Seine, one hundred miles, to Paris. The taste and the wealth of France were lavished in the attempt to invest the occasion with all possible solemnity and grandeur. The steamer Parisian led the way, filled with the high dignitaries of the kingdom. Then followed a second steamer, with the crew of the frigate which had borne the remains from St. Helena. After this came the imperial barge, bearing the sacred ashes of the dead. It was richly, but with great simplicity, draped in mourning. The sarcophagus was so elevated in the chapel that every eye could behold it. Ten other steamers composed the unparalleled funeral train.

On the morning of the 10th of December, just as the rising sun was gilding the cloudless skies, this imposing flotilla of thirteen funeral barges, saluted by tolling bells, and solemnly-booming guns, and soul-stirring requiems, left its moorings, and majestically commenced the ascent of the river. The back country, for thirty miles on either side, had been almost depopulated, as men, women, and children crowded to the banks of the stream, in homage to the remains of that great man, who was worthily enthroned in all their hearts. The prefect of the Lower Seine had issued the following proclamation to the inhabitants:

"Fellow-citizens! The department of Lower Seine will be first traversed by the general cortège, proceeding under the direction of his Royal Highness the Prince of Joinville, toward the capital of the kingdom, where memorable solemnities are to be enacted in the presence of the great bodies of the State, and illustrated by all the prodigies of art. There is no event in history which presents itself with such a character of grandeur as that which accompanies the removal of the remains of the Emperor Napoleon. When the vessel containing those venerated ashes shall advance slowly along the river, you will receive it with that religious feeling, and those deep emotions which are ever produced by the recollections of the misfortunes of the country, its triumphs, and its glory. You will render the last honors to that great man, with the calmness and dignity becoming a population which has so often experienced the benefit of his protecting power and of his special solicitude."

As the cortège passed along, an innumerable multitude gazed in silence, but with tearful eyes, upon the sublime spectacle. Every battery uttered its salute. From the turret of every village church the knell was tolled; and there was not a peasant's hut passed on the route which did not exhibit some testimonial of respect and love. The city of Rouen, containing one hundred thousand inhabitants, is situated half-way between Havre and Paris. The sagacious policy of the Emperor had contributed much to its prosperity, and had rendered it one of the chief commercial and manufacturing cities in the kingdom. "Paris, Rouen, and Havre," said he, on one occasion, "shall form one great city, of which the Seine shall be the main street." Such were the noble objects of Napoleon's ambition. But the Allies thwarted his generous plans by their assailing armies, and hunted him down as if he had been a beast of prey. The Mayor of Rouen, in preparation for the reception of the remains of the Emperor, thus addressed the inhabitants of the city:

"Beloved fellow-citizens! After twenty-five years of exile in a foreign land, Napoleon is at last restored to us. A French prince, the worthy son of our citizen king, brings back to France what remains of the great Emperor. In a few days these glorious ashes will rest in peace under the national safeguard of his glory and the remains of his invincible phalanxes. A few moments only are allowed to salute the coffin of the hero who caused the French name to be respected throughout the world. Let us employ them in solemnly manifesting the sympathies which are in the hearts of a population over whom the Emperor once extended his powerful and protecting hand. Let us unite with a religious feeling in the triumphal funeral reserved to him by the city where his glory and genius are stamped with immortal grandeur."

From the adjoining country more than one hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants had flocked to Rouen. Both banks of the river were richly decorated, and long galleries had been constructed, draped in costly silks, for the accommodation of the countless throng. Many lofty pyramids were erected, covered with rich purple satin and spangled with golden tears. Upon the bases of these pyramids were inscribed the names of the principal battles of the Empire. A triumphal arch, of majestic proportions, spanned the whole stream, covered also with richest silk, and brilliantly decorated with bees of gold. Twenty thousand yards of silk were used in this structure, and thirty-six thousand bees. Two ships of honor, imposingly decorated, and covered with the flags of all nations, were so stationed that the funeral procession of steamers might pass between them. The bridges of Rouen were embellished with the highest decorations of art, and from every steeple and turret, and from almost every window of the city, tricolored banners were floating in the breeze.

Before mid-day all the inhabitants of the city and its environs were assembled—cuirassiers, judges and advocates, ecclesiastics, the national guard, with drooping banners draped in mourning, students, members of the Legion of Honor, retired officers, the veteran and wounded soldiers of the old armies of the Empire, fifteen hundred in number, all at their appointed stations. As these veterans, torn and battered by the storms of war, traversed the streets in long, military array—many of them in extreme old age, and all of them bearing in their hands crowns of immortelles and laurel—marching with reversed arms and to the mournful music of the muffled drum, their eyes moistened with tears and their faces flushed with irrepressible emotion, they were greeted with that fervor of enthusiasm which bursts from the soul when moved to its profoundest depths. They were the representatives of Napoleon. They were his children. There was probably not one among them all who would not gladly have laid down his life for his beloved chieftain.

Just at noon, of a serene and brilliant day, the funeral procession of steamers made its appearance, moving noiselessly and majestically along the mirrored surface of the river. A sublime peal of artillery, from ships, batteries, and the cannon of the national guard—louder than heaven's heaviest thunders—announced that the Emperor was approaching. The scene of emotion which ensued no language can exaggerate. The Emperor, though in death, was restored, triumphant in love and homage, to his Empire. The honor of France was retrieved; for her most renowned and adored monarch no longer slept, a captive, beneath the soil of his enemies.

The speed of all the boats was slackened that the spectators might have a better opportunity to witness the imposing pageant. On reaching the suspension-bridge, over which, like the bow of promise, rose the triumphal arch, the Imperial barge paused for a while, and the military veterans, defiling along, cast their crowns of flowers at the foot of the coffin, while with wailing voices they tremulously shouted "Vive l'Empereur!" The shout, which had so often thrilled in the heart of the Emperor, fell upon the cold and leaden ear of death. Did Napoleon, from the spirit-land, witness this scene, and rejoice in the triumph of his fame? The veil is impenetrable.

The Imperial barge then passed under the arch, and took her station in the center of a circle surrounded by the remainder of the steamers. The bells of the churches tolled the funeral knell, minute-guns were fired, the archbishop read the burial-service, while dirges from many martial bands were breathed plaintively through the air. Immediately after this act of homage to the dead, a salute from the shore announced that the ceremony would henceforth assume a triumphal character. The Emperor had returned to his grateful people, and was to be received as if still living. The bells rang out their merriest peals. All the bands played national airs. The troops presented arms. The artillerymen of the National Guard fired a salute of one hundred and one rounds; and though all eyes were dimmed with tears, and all voices were tremulous with emotion, the clangor of bells, the thunder of artillery, and the peal of trumpets were drowned in the delirious and exultant shout of "Vive l'Empereur!" It was the shout of an enfranchised people, in thunder-peal announcing to astonished despotisms the final triumph of popular suffrage, in the reenthronement of the monarch of the people's choice.

The same evening the procession moved on toward the excited, throbbing, expectant metropolis. The banks of the Seine, from Havre to Paris, are thickly planted with cities and villages. As the flotilla passed along, it was continually received with every possible demonstration of attachment to Napoleon, and of national rejoicing at the recovery of his remains. The shores were lined by thousands of spectators, and the inhabitants of every district did all in their power to invest the scene with the most impressive splendor. Thousands came from Paris to witness a spectacle so singular and sublime.

At Annieres lay the massive and gorgeous ship which had been built expressly to convey the remains of the Emperor up the Seine. A receptacle for the coffin had been constructed upon the deck, in the form of an Egyptian temple, open at the sides, with a flat roof, supported at the corners by four gigantic statues. The entrance to this temple was by a flight of steps. An immense gilded eagle formed the figure-head of the vessel. Tripods, blazing with many-colored flames, were placed around the tomb. This magnificent and costly piece of craftsmanship was, however, found to be too heavy to be towed up the Seine in season for the ceremony appointed on the 15th. But at this place the vessel joined the convoy, adding greatly to its effect.

At four o'clock in the afternoon of the 14th, the flotilla arrived at Courbevoie, a small village about four miles from Paris. Here the remains were to be transferred from the steamer to the shore. Thousands from Paris thronged the village and its environs to witness the imposing pageant. A colossal statue of the beloved Josephine arrested universal attention, as she stood there to greet her returning husband. Maria Louisa, the daughter of the Cæsars, was then living ingloriously at Parma. No one thought of her. At the head of the quay an immense column was raised, one hundred and fifty feet high, surmounted by a globe six feet in diameter, and crowned by a lordly eagle, glittering in gold. Upon the base of the column were inscribed the memorable words:

"It is my wish that my ashes may repose on the banks of the Seine, in the midst of the French people whom I loved so well."

A Grecian temple, one hundred feet high, was constructed at the termination of the wharf under which the body was to lie in state, until transferred to the funeral car. Richly decorated tripods, twenty feet high, emitted volumes of flame, producing a very impressive effect. Here Sergeant Hubert, who for nineteen years had kept watch at the solitary grave of Napoleon at St. Helena, landed. All the generals immediately gathered around him, with cordial embraces, and he was received by the people with deep emotion.

During the night all the vessels of the flotilla were brilliantly illuminated. The next morning the sun rose, resplendently glowing in the clear, cloudless, serene sky. Thousands exclaimed, "It is the sun of Austerlitz!" For a week multitudes, not only from the distant cities of France, but from all parts of Europe, had been arriving to witness this spectacle of sublimity unrivaled. For nearly four miles, from the esplanade of the Invalides, along the Quay d'Orsay, the Bridge of Concorde, the Elysian Fields, the Avenue of Neuilly, the Bridge of Neuilly to the village of Courbevoie, the road was lined by thousands of spectators, and crowded with an indescribable opulence of embellishments. The excitement of the war-worn veterans of the Invalides amounted almost to delirium. The whole National Guard of Paris was drawn out to escort the remains. The Polish emigrants, many of them men of high distinction, sent a deputation earnestly requesting permission to assist at the funeral ceremonies of the only monarch who had ever expressed any sympathy in their cause. Louis Philippe, the King of the French, with all the members of the royal family, and the members of the Chamber of Deputies and the Chamber of Peers, were assembled beneath the gorgeous dome of the Invalides to render homage to the returning Emperor. The embellishments in Paris, along the path of the procession, surpassed every thing which had ever been attempted before. The Arch of Triumph was decorated with most imposing grandeur. A colossal image of the Emperor stood upon its towering summit, looking serenely down upon his own marvelous triumph, and surrounded by those flags and eagles which his victories had rendered immortal.

The view down the spacious avenue of the Elysian Fields was imposing in the extreme. Each side was lined with lofty columns, surmounted by gilt eagles and decorated with tri-colored flags. Colossal statues, triumphal arches, immense vases blazing with variegated flames, and the assemblage of a countless multitude of spectators, presented a spectacle never to be forgotten.

The Imperial car was composed of five distinct parts—the basement, the pedestal, the caryatides, the shield, and the cenotaph. The basement rested on four massive gilt wheels. This basement, which was twenty-five feet long and six feet high, and all the rich ornaments with which it was profusely embellished, were covered with frosted gold. Upon this basement stood groups of cherubs, seven feet high, supporting a pedestal eighteen feet long, covered with burnished gold. This pedestal, elevated thirteen feet from the ground, was constructed with a heavy cornice richly ornamented. It was hung in purple velvet, falling in graceful drapery to the ground, embroidered with gold, and spotted with bees. Upon this elevated pedestal stood fourteen caryatides, antique figures larger than life, and entirely covered with gold, supporting, with their heads and hands, an immense shield of solid gold. This shield was of oval form and eighteen feet in length, and was richly decorated with all appropriate ornaments. Upon the top of this shield, nearly fifty feet from the ground, was placed the cenotaph, an exact copy of Napoleon's coffin. It was slightly veiled with purple crape, embroidered with golden bees. On the cenotaph, upon a velvet cushion, were placed the sceptre, the sword of justice, and the Imperial crown, in gold, and embellished with precious stones. Such is a general description of this funeral car, the most sumptuous that was probably ever constructed.

This Imperial chariot of velvet and gold, impressing every beholder with its gorgeous and sombre magnificence, was drawn by sixteen black horses, yoked four abreast. These steeds were so entirely caparisoned in cloth of gold that their feet only could be seen. Waving plumes of white feathers adorned their heads and manes. Sixteen grooms wearing the Imperial livery led the horses.

At half-past nine o'clock in the morning, after prayers had been read over the body, twenty-four seamen raised the coffin on their shoulders and, following the procession of the clergy, conveyed it to the Grecian temple. There it was deposited for a short time, while the clergy again chanted prayers. The seamen then again took up their precious load, and conveyed it to the triumphal car. It was placed in the interior of the vehicle, its apparent place being occupied by the cenotaph upon the summit of the shield. As the car commenced its solemn movement the sun and moon were both shining in the serene and cloudless sky, gilding with extraordinary splendor this unparalleled scene. No language can describe the enthusiasm inspired, as the car passed slowly along, surrounded by the five hundred sailors who had accompanied the remains from St. Helena, and preceded and followed by the most imposing military array which the kingdom of France could furnish. More than a million of people were assembled along the line of march to welcome back the Emperor. All the bells in Paris were tolling. Music from innumerable bands filled the air, blending with the solemn peal of minute-guns and of salutes of honor from many batteries. The multitude shouted, and sang, and wept. In a roar as of thunder the Marseilles Hymn resounded from ten thousand voices, and was echoed and re-echoed along the interminable lines.

The church of the Invalides, in the splendor of its adornings, resembled a fairy palace. The walls were elegantly hung with rich drapery of violet velvet, studded with stars of gold, and bordered with a massive gold fringe. The eight columns which support the dome, were entirely covered with velvet, studded with golden bees. It would require a volume to describe the splendors of this room. Beneath its lofty dome, beneath which the tomb of Napoleon was ulteriorly to be erected, a tomb which would cost millions of money, and which would require the labor of years, a magnificent cenotaph, in the form of a temple superbly gilded, was reared. This temple was pronounced by all judges to be one of the happiest efforts of decorative art. Here the remains of the Emperor were for a time to repose. Thirty-six thousand spectators were seated upon immense platforms on the esplanade of the Invalides. Six thousand spectators thronged the seats of the spacious portico. In the interior of the church were assembled the clergy, the members of the two chambers of Deputies and of Peers, and all the members of the royal family, and others of the most distinguished personages of France and of Europe. As the coffin, preceded by the Prince of Joinville, was borne along the nave upon the shoulders of thirty-two of Napoleon's Old Guard, all rose and bowed in homage to the mighty dead. Louis Philippe, surrounded by the great officers of state, then stepped forward to receive the remains.

"Sire," said the Prince, "I present to you the body of the Emperor Napoleon."

"I receive it," replied the King, "in the name of France." Then taking from the hand of Marshal Soult the sword of Napoleon, and presenting it to General Bertrand, he said, "General, I charge you to place this glorious sword of the Emperor upon his coffin."

The King then returned to his throne; the coffin was placed in the catafalque, and the last wish of Napoleon was gratified. The funeral mass was then celebrated. The King of France sat upon one side of the altar, accompanied by the Queen and all the princes and princesses of the royal family. The ministers and the marshals of the kingdom, the Archbishop of Paris with his assistant bishops and clergy, and all the prominent civil and military authorities of France gathered reverentially around the mausoleum in this last sublime act of a nation's love and gratitude. As the solemn strains of Mozart's Requiem, performed by three hundred musicians, floated through the air, all hearts were intensely moved. Thus ended a ceremony which in all the elements of moral sublimity has no parallel.

In beautiful tribute to the warm affections of the Emperor, France, in 1847, placed by his side the ashes of two of his most devoted friends, General Bertrand, and General Duroc, each of whom had been Grand Marshal of the Imperial Palace, as if to cheer, by their love and companionship, the solitude of the tomb. "These two men," said General Gourgaud, in the Chamber of Peers, "have been chosen principally because the functions which they have fulfilled near the person of the Emperor, were all those of friendship and confidence. In placing them after their death by the side of his tomb, they will be there, not as the most illustrious, not as the only devoted and faithful, under a reign which furnished so many illustrations, so many generous sacrifices of every kind, but as the natural representatives of devotion the most pure, the most grateful, and of a fidelity which was manifested the most frequently, the most direct, and the longest continued in good as in adverse fortune."

These two beloved friends now repose by the side of the Emperor. "Dear and venerated veterans," said General Fabvier, "when you meet our chieftain, say to him, that his glory each day extends and brightens, and that this ceremony is a homage which we render to his loving heart, in again giving him the companionship of two of his most cherished associates." France has also established, in grateful commemoration of the virtues of her illustrious Emperor, an annual religious celebration of the return of his ashes, to be observed through all coming time, on the 15th of December, at his tomb beneath the dome of the Invalides.

With such honors has France received back her Emperor, who had been torn from her by combined despotisms. Napoleon, in death, has become the victor over all his foes. Every generous heart now does homage to his lofty character. His last wishes are accomplished, and his ashes repose in the bosom of his beloved France, amidst the imperishable monuments of his wisdom, his goodness, and his glory. France has reared for him a mausoleum which is a nation's pride, and he is enthroned in the hearts of his countrymen as monarch was never enthroned before. Through all coming ages travelers from all lands will, with reverential awe, visit the tomb of Napoleon. His noble fame is every day extending. The voices of obloquy are becoming more faint and few, and soon will be hushed forever.

THE SARCOPHAGUS.

ITALIAN LIFE AND MORALS—EFFECTS OF ROMANISM ON SOCIETY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "PARISIAN SIGHTS AND FRENCH PRINCIPLES."

I HAVE universally found that the differences in the relative prosperity of the inhabitants of Catholic and Protestant countries was in ratio to the degree in which the Holy Father would consider the former faithful and the latter heretical. This has indeed become a trite observation among travelers of both religions. But no less a writer than the Abbé Lamennais denies its truth, and instances for his authority the condition of the very countries which Protestants claim as their own evidence. England, Sweden, and Protestant Germany, according to him, are given over to irreligion, licentiousness, and political turmoil; while those countries that repose under the shadow of the Holy See are stable in their institutions, and united in their faith. A monk of St. Bernard, in conversation with me on the extent and progress of the United States, acknowledged that we were indeed a great nation physically; but, said he, "what a pity it is you have no religion. You will soon perish."

Such is the general sentiment among rigid Catholics. They can not conceive how good morals, prosperity, a wise government; or salvation can exist independent of papal authority. To secure its supremacy, they are ever ready to trample upon those rights which we believe to be essential to human progress. Liberty of press and conscience, and the separation of civil and religious government, they consider equivalent to anarchy and atheism. The very enterprise, toleration, and freedom of thought which are developed by our political institutions, and which we fondly conceive to be the fruits of righteousness, are, in their eyes, so many witnesses of our corruption and infidelity. With them, absolutism, or centering faith and power in the Roman Church, is the "one thing needful" for humanity. This accomplished, they close their view to all further comparison; or if by chance they look abroad, and the wide gulf between the wealth, comforts, intelligence, and energy of Catholic and Protestant states is too obvious not to be acknowledged, they class the latter among those who in gaining the whole world are losing their own souls.

Believing, as we do, that the possession of the good things of this earth proceeds mainly from those qualities that heap up most treasure in heaven—or, in other words, that virtue and vice, whether of the individual or nation, have their appointed rewards and punishments in this life as well as in that to come—we consider it a fair rule to judge papal rule by its fruits. In one Swiss Canton we find no beggars, universal thrift, cleanliness, and enterprise; in another, beggary, poverty, dirt, and general distress. The one is Protestant, and the other Catholic.

But as Protestantism predominates in Switzerland, the contrasts are not so striking as between those Catholic countries which are exclusively the religious property of the Roman

See, and England, Prussia, and the United States, where Protestantism, although enforcing toleration, sways or influences the entire population. France is in a transition state, a chaos of atheism, bigotry, and sentiment. Its shopkeepers, in mingled devotion and blasphemy, scarce knowing themselves which impulse predominates, place over their doors, "La Grace de Dieu" (the Grace of God), as a sign to attract custom, as may be seen in the street St. Roch, at Paris. The Spaniards call a fighting-vessel the "Most Holy Trinity;" and the Romans name a bank "The Holy Ghost;" but these names are given in sincerity and solemnity. France has grown prosperous and strong in proportion as she has become tolerant and free from the control of Rome; while Italy and Spain, the beloved of the Church, are filled from one extremity to another, in proportion as they are steeped in Romanism, with indolence, superstition, beggary, and their concomitant vices. If, then, wherever Romanism is omnipotent we perceive these results, it is natural to infer that they follow the relation of cause and effect.

My inquiries relate to Italy, and chiefly to Rome. Throughout the peninsula, except where the new-born liberality of Piedmont stimulates, or the iron hand of Austria, as in Lombardy, crushes, we find Indolence the national characteristic. The Church encourages this parent of vice, by appropriating more than a quarter of the year to festivals, on which all labor is forbidden and amusements encouraged. The vacations of the schools, on this account alone, are so numerous that the general ignorance ceases to be a wonder. Undoubtedly many of the holidays originated in the desire to relieve overtaxed labor and recall the untaught mind to sentiments of religion; but during so many centuries saints have so rapidly increased as to threaten to entirely monopolize the time of the living. "Let the dead bury their dead," has a pointed moral in Italy in the present age.

Another cause of indolence are the fetters imposed on knowledge. There are numerous primary schools, it is true. Rome alone possesses three hundred and seventy-two, which receive about fourteen thousand children of both sexes. Throughout the country they exist gratuitously; but, beside the simple elements of instruction, they, as well as the universities, are made subordinate to papacy. The instructors, in general, are priests. The Church Catechism is a text-book. All knowledge that tends to expand the mind, liberalize ideas, or develop physical energy unsuited to the theory of absolutism, is rigorously tabooed. Their intent is not to rear citizens, but to make subjects—to train disciples, and not masters. Catholic teachers are free to receive Protestant children—but a Protestant teacher is forbidden to receive a Catholic pupil. Indeed, it is with difficulty that Protestant parents can educate their children, unless they submit to the requisitions of the priesthood. Even the Catholic principal of the best institution in Tuscany, a Frenchman, has with difficulty, by the interference of his ambassador, been allowed to continue his school, because the authorities conceived that he was bringing up his pupils to be "too manly." They even wished to exile him from the country.

The field of knowledge being thus limited, enterprise is proportionally so; so that the educated, who have means, become in general effeminate idlers and corrupt in morals; while the poorer sort obtain some nominal office under government, at one or two shillings per day, or else try their fortunes in the few and in general despised branches of commerce left to their option, sufficiently unfettered as to admit of hope. In America, we can not realize the extent of the restrictions to personal freedom, even in the commonest concerns of life, which are the lot of Italians. If you are living on the sea-shore you are denied the use of a boat, unless as a licensed fisherman. Each city has its custom-house. I have seen a carriage stopped at the gates, and a penny's worth of cake, which a little girl held in her hand to eat, taken and taxed the smallest copper coin—equal to a mill—for which a receipt was regularly made out and given, before the carriage could enter. The poor are unmercifully fleeced at every gabelle; while the rich can carry loads of merchandise, unopened, in their trunks from one end of Italy to another, for a bribe of fifty cents given at each custom-house.

From Rome I have gone by land to Naples, thence through some of the northern states of Italy, and back to Florence, and never once opened a carriage-load of trunks. The gift was expected, as a matter of course; but for the officers to do their duty, that was quite another affair. The system is seen in its greatest corruption in the Neapolitan kingdom. At every ten miles or so the traveler comes to a dogana. The soldiers stop the carriage. The ladies are requested to alight, and the gentlemen are ushered into an upper room, where, in solemn dignity, sit the officials, who become prolix upon the necessity of a strict examination of the baggage. Should you in your innocence offer the keys, they speak more to the point, and at last plainly say that it will save both trouble and expense for you to give them a fee. Otherwise, they will be sure to find something contraband. If you hand a Napoleon, they look astonished at your meanness, and shake their heads, and say this will never do. They would do the same if it were a shilling. An Italian must always be twice paid. The smallest additional gratuity settles the difficulty; and with a profusion of bows and good wishes you think you are ready to proceed. Descending the stairs, your mistake is at once rectified. First comes the officer of the guard for his gratuity—next the corporal—next the soldiers, each of whom swears he has been your special guard; that is, he has invited himself to a ride on your box for a mile or so—and, lastly, the facchini, or porters, the most extortionate of all, who claim high pay for not taking your trunks off. This is all done amid a throng of beggars and thieves, who pick your pockets or steal from the carriage as opportunity offers, at the same time stunning heaven with cries for charity, or calling upon the Madonna to pass to your credit above the coppers you have distributed among them below.

A little further on occurs a similar scene at a so-called passport-office. I have had money, with which I was paying a porter, snatched from my hand in the streets of Naples by a sentinel on duty, and no one thought it strange. Go where you will in this kingdom, and you find a similar system of organized robbery, which makes one almost regret the good old days of banditti, when novelty and excitement added zest to the adventure. But now it is barefaced extortion, disgusting wrangling, and inevitable pillage. Formerly there was a chance of escape—now none. If you refuse to pay, your baggage remains untouched, but you are not allowed to proceed. The same corruption extends through all classes, with, of course, some honorable exceptions. The King of Naples is well known as the chief of the lazzaroni. Hats, handkerchiefs, and sundries are not always safe at an Italian ball, or among even what may be considered a genteel crowd. These peccadilloes, with lying and cheating, so common among even the better classes, bespeak a defective moral education, and find their solution in great measure in the confessional, which acts as a safety-valve to the conscience, a little money or trifling penance securing indulgence or absolution, until at last habit destroys the sense of sin and shame altogether.

In France, lies are expected as a matter of course. Among the ladies they pass under the softened expression of "broder" (to romance); with gentlemen, more vulgarly, "blaguer" (to fib); but both practice the vice either to please or to add piquancy to scandalous gossip, but seldom from baser motives. They so love to exaggerate, that even their daily newspapers are universally dated a day in advance; and even Galigani has been compelled to follow their example, to do away with the charge that he did not give the latest news.

With the Italians, however, lying is a downright vice. Without the courage and gallantry of the French, they lie from fear as well as fun. One need have no greater evidence of the depravity of morals among the higher classes of Italian cities, than the universal scandal, which spares no one, and at the same time announces a general corruption inconceivable in similar circles in Protestant countries, or which, if existing, would doom the offenders to social isolation. So the universal suspicion proclaims the equally-spread habit of falsehood. However much courtesy may gild social intercourse, the serpent-head of distrust is seen beneath. Jealousy is equally common. Not the more honorable sentiment founded on a regard for chastity, but the meaner spirit begotten of envy. It is really extraordinary to see how ludicrously, not to say inhumanly, domestics and the lower classes will sometimes exhibit this, when one would suppose that common wants would produce common sympathies. As for the former, when it exists, it is chiefly among lovers, and not married couples, whose connubial eye is supposed to be blind. I have heard it remarked, by other ladies, of one of the chief nobility of Tuscany—a wife and mother that it would be well for the country if it possessed more of—"How strange it is that the Duchess—contents herself with only her husband." Such is the common sentiment. Matrimonial fidelity is the exception.

Generally speaking, Italian women are the most untidy of their sex, both as housekeepers and in their toilet, when not dressed for their diurnal drive. This arises from indolence and want of good home educations. Convents are the schools of Italian mothers. Slipshod at home, they loiter or doze away their time after the most approved listlessness, indifferent to every thing but appearing well on parade or at the opera. Their households are neglected, children intrusted to servants, and their work, if any, confined to embroidery, rarely music, and sometimes a little painting or design. Their want of good taste in dress, in which, as a class, they are behind every other civilized nation, is the more strange, as they possess a natural taste for the beautiful in art. When the sex is thus unrefined in person, the mind is upon a par; so that one is not astonished to find a latitude in conversation, and an ignorance on general topics no less lamentable, but combined with an amiability and wit which, under better auspices of government and religion, would raise them to the level of their sex in more favored countries.

The general effeminacy and want of energy of the male sex, would astonish any one not versed in their political history for the past two centuries. They weigh like nightmares upon the race; but without scope for ambition, or even ordinary physical action, what else can be expected?

The care which an Italian dandy takes to preserve himself from the fresh air of heaven, to avoid all exercise, and to develop his effeminate beauty, is ludicrously wonderful. There are said to be not over three days of their delicious climate in a year which are all right for an Italian. What with its being too hot or too cold, too dry or too humid, too changeable or too monotonous, the poor weather is little able to satisfy the race on which he lavishes most of his bounties. I was at a sea-side watering-place last summer. The water to me, who have lived eight years within the tropics, was uncomfortably warm; but the titled Italians first prepared themselves for their sea-baths by aperient medicines and a course of warm baths, so that their systems should not undergo too great a shock.

To return to schools and ecclesiastical education. One of its chief principles tends to perpetuate a canker which is gnawing at the vitals of Italy. The Church honors beggary in its bosom, by sustaining numerous communities of idle monks, who live on the charity and industry of the public. It teaches through all its lessons, even as an article of faith, that alms expiate sins, and that it is necessary to give continually and abundantly to win heaven. Her charity is not of doctrine; she holds none in store for those who deny her faith—they are inevitably damned; but in good works and almsgiving she is lavish, because by them she buys salvation for herself. This abuse of the doctrine of charity is twofold. It makes heaven a matter of barter, and teaches the poor to believe that it is only necessary to wear rags, and live in filth and idleness, for the wealthy to become their debtors; while the excess of good works of the Church provides them with a bed in a hospital when ill, a snug retreat when old, and the gifts of the rich at all times.

"By the sweat of thy brow shalt thou earn thy bread," was the early mandate of Heaven, carrying with it a blessing. The spur of want is, however, the only sure provocative to labor. In Polynesia, and those climates where Providence, as it were, houses and feeds man gratis, the human race remains stationary, never rising above the incipient stages of civilization. What Providence has seen fit to do for certain races of savages, limiting at once their sphere and their supply, Rome, from the days of the Gracchi through its long decadence, sought to do for its turbulent population. But that which God did in wisdom man imitated in folly. The Romans looked upon the state as a parent bound to provide for its offspring. From daily bread, they soon learned to demand their daily oil and wine; then money; and, finally, spectacles and amusements—all gratis. The consequence was, that Rome trained its citizens into a mongrel race of beggars and robbers, resolved to live without labor. They succeeded, but Rome fell; for the curse of idleness was upon it.

The Church succeeded the Empire. To destroy its legacy of corruption was no easy task, but one to which Christianity was equal, had she not herself bowed to idols. Under her imperial patrons she conquered but did not reform. True, individual virtue, and occasionally able and upright rulers, did much to counteract the prominent heathen vices, which slowly disappeared before the principles of the gospel; but with all their power they were inadequate, in the hands of papacy, to cleanse the foulest fountain of them all.

The modern Italians, like the ancient Romans, remain a race with outstretched hands. They are beggars. Beggary has become an hereditary vice. Shame, if it ever existed, has long since forsaken the practice. With unblushing falsehood it is to be seen in the palace and in the hovel, in all its cunning degrees, from the throne of St. Peter's to the veriest wretch that coils his scabby limbs under its shadow. The Church is responsible for much of this, not from design, but from its mistaken doctrine, that the greater blessing attends the giver than the worker. It honors idleness, sanctifies the spread palm, and thus impedes labor. Sixtus V. labored diligently to arrest this evil. The established workhouses forbade mendicancy under the severest penalties, and sought by energetic measures to extirpate the pest, but in vain. After brief intervals of apparent reform, it reappeared as vicious as ever. The popes forgot that, while weeding with one finger, they were bountifully sowing tares with an open hand. The Romans, of all Italians, have in consequence the most profound aversion to labor. They are listless and silent even in their amusements, varied only by occasional flashes of passion, or the excitement of the carnival.

The rich give abundantly and with indiscriminating generosity, but as frequently from policy or ostentation. Like old patricians with their clients, they gather about them a numerous horde of idle dependents or professional beggars, who, content in the abasement of receiving, gratis, their daily subsistence, have ceased to envy the common possessions of their lords. Nearly three-fifths of the real estate within the walls of Rome belong to less than one hundred families; the remaining two-fifths to the hospitals and convents. Consequently, not one in a thousand of the inhabitants of Rome has any fixed property. The Church and Government, including the few noble families able to support their state, own all Rome—a state of things sufficient in itself to kill enterprise, and keep the city as it is, a century behind even the other capitals of Italy.

Each city has its characteristic type of beggars, though none is without specimens of all—as they are a wandering race, and move to where charities are most abundant. Rome, however, is the capital of beggarmdom. In Venice they ply their art in gondolas. In Florence they dress in filthy rags, whine piteously, expose infants, and train bright-eyed young girls to waylay strangers, demanding alms with a pertinacity proof against all repulse, though liable to the penalties of the law; in fact, throughout Tuscany they are the dirtiest and most beggarly set of beggars Italy can show. At the entrance of Vassieux's reading-room, a white-haired old man, bent with age, his clothes hanging together by scanty stitches, is to be seen sitting in one position, and always in the same spot: for years he has been thus; he never speaks, but, as the visitors pass, meekly bows his head—silent if he receives a copper, and equally silent if disappointed. His dumb appeal is not without its fruits. A more expressive image of venerable patience, poverty, and humility the imagination never conceived; and yet, I presume, the old dodge, like Beppo, the legless, roguish king of beggars at Rome, is rich, and able to dewer his daughters, if he have any.

In Naples they beg from the fun of it; bright-eyed, merry boys, full of life and activity, or lazaroni, up to a thousand tricks to excite compassion and gain the trifling sum that will feed them for a week, while, for a bed, stone steps or a basket are sufficiently comfortable. But at Naples they are all ready to do any thing but actual labor to unloose your purse-strings; they will lie, cheat, or steal as temptation offers, and, if it please you, dance, sing, engulf macaroni, and play the jackanapes after the drollest fashion possible. There is fun and mischief in their begging which half-disguises its viciousness.

The begging monks form a class, sui generis, under the especial patronage of the Church. They are the greatest eye-sores of the community, being in general men of almost brutalized appearance, unctuous and ignorant, and of corresponding habits.

Beggary in Italy is elevated to the rank of an occupation. Men and women are born and die beggars, as their parents before them. This class appears the more numerous, because they have the art of multiplying themselves, as it were, interminably. They are the carrion crows of benevolence. They strip it to its very bones, and scent their game afar off. There is no end to their disguises and ailments. Protens-like, they change their rags and diseases to suit every phase of charity. With an ubiquity that savors of marvelousness they are here, there, and every where at the same instant; now lame, then dropsical, all at once minus an eye, arm, or leg, covered with sores, rheumatic, crippled by age or famished by hunger; surrounded by nursing, starving children; assuming every shape of disease or deformity, with crutches and all the outward appeals to sympathy, they excite terror and disgust as often as charity. There is no disguising their barefaced imposition. If their imperfections are real, the eighteen hospitals of Rome are ample for their relief. But they are like Bedouins in their habits, and prefer the plunder of the public to the legitimate relief of their wants. They are to be seen chiefly on the steps of the churches, when not begging, swearing, card-playing, quarreling, or sleeping from morning to night; where they then retire to, no decent mortal may know.

In contrast with these are the genteel beggars; counts and countesses, veiled ladies in black, who haunt theatres; others in gayer costumes, who track you to your homes; all begging under some pretext or other, and grateful for a half-dollar, when, from their appearance, you feel ashamed to offer the man an eagle. I have had a well-dressed gentleman approach me in the street, bow with great courtesy, apologize for interrupting me, and then go on to inform me that he was of the higher classes, but had lost his money, and would be thankful for a "mezzo-baiocco," half-cent! Ladies, too, so grateful as to kiss your hands for a half-dime! The degradation in such cases is too deep for the poverty to be wholly genuine.

The system of asking is universal. At certain palaces where you may have dined, the servants demand of you a fee. Mechanics, tradesmen even, all who serve you in one way or other, with few exceptions, ask for something additional, grateful if they get it, and nevertheless ready to try again if they fail. In the country on the usual routes of travelers this nuisance is universal. Children follow the carriage for miles clamoring for coppers, and if refused, salute your ear with a curse and "May you break your neck! may the apoplexy seize you!" or some equally welcome catastrophe, winding up with some demoniacal sign, indicative of bad luck. I have always noticed that Italians never failed to counteract the spell by some cabalistic movement of the fingers, known only to the initiated.

The usual reference is to the Madonna for your welfare, though all the saints in the Calendar are in turn invoked. Sometimes, especially with the Romans and Neapolitans, there is a touch of flattery, or a dubious wish expressed in their demands extremely naïve and not always creditable to the morals of either party; as for instance, "May your handsome Excellency be fortunate in your amours."

Aside from the parasitical and fictitious misery of Italy, there exists a vast amount of real, which even the colossal proportions of Roman Catholic charity are not sufficient to relieve. The mass of the people in ordinary times are but scantily supplied with even the most indifferent and least nourishing qualities of food. Consequently, in times of scarcity they are reduced to a condition bordering on absolute starvation. Their chief diet is coarse bread, beans, and chestnuts. Any thing better partakes of the character of luxuries. The faintness or want of strength resulting from so meagre a diet, is relieved by the stimulus of large draughts of the light wines of the country, in general, mixtures deleterious to the health, though not very intoxicating. Indeed, one cause of the apparent sobriety of the peasantry is said to be their inability to swallow enough to make them tipsy, though there are men among them that will drain a gallon flask at a sitting. They drink sufficiently, however, to excite to crime and disorders; and their temperance may be considered rather a passive than active virtue; though, as men will seek artificial stimulants, it would be an advantage to the United States could light wines be substituted for strong liquors.

The effects of general want and poverty are shown among the Italians generally, and especially the Tuscans, in their short stature, heavy lifeless look and almost haggard appearance; the tout ensemble of dress and mien betokening a dispirited, badly-fed, and worse governed race. Their numerous holidays prevent their being overworked, but the pale, spiritless faces, bent figures, and misshapen shoulders of the laboring women, painfully tell their lack of generous diet and healthful employments. I never walk the streets of Florence without feeling pained at the sight of much silent misery that, callous as it were to its own wants, passes humbly and painfully by, seemingly without pleasure in the past or hope for the future. It really appears wrong to dress well and walk erect and joyful in the consciousness of health and the blessings of Providence, not to speak of the ostentation of the rich, in contrast with the blight which has fallen so heavily upon the lives of so many of our fellow-beings, through centuries of oppression and miseducation.

It is difficult to procure reliable statistics in Italy, but the few which I feel authorized to give, will show not only the extent of poverty, but the extent of charity also in this land. Indeed, so numerous and so richly endowed are the "palaces" for the destitute, as the poor houses and hospitals may truly be called, that, in view of the general beggary and destitution, we can not come to other conclusion than that they overdo their own charitable design. Too much assistance has made the population lazy and improvident. They rely more upon public charity than private enterprise. Consequently reform must commence with them.

In 1798 there were thirty thousand poor, or one-fifth of the population of Rome, upon the lists of the curates of the several parishes. Under the administration of the French up to 1814, the proportion had been diminished to one-ninth. Since that period it has been on the increase.

There are in Rome nineteen hospitals for the treatment of diseases. One of them, Saint Roch, is for the reception of pregnant women who wish to be confined in secret. In eight public hospitals the average number of sick daily, is about fourteen hundred, who cost nineteen cents a day each. For every five patients there are two assistants or nurses, at the daily wages of thirty-three cents each, so that nearly one half of the revenues of the hospitals are expended on the well, who, of course, are greatly interested in multiplying them.

The hospital of the Holy Ghost receives all bastards without question. They cost Rome yearly fifty thousand dollars. There are besides some fourteen semi-convents, where young girls are gratuitously received and educated. They never leave these retreats except to marry or become nuns. If the former, they receive a dowry of thirty-five dollars; if the latter, fifty dollars, so much is celibacy in Rome held in honor above matrimony. As an anomaly, however, in this doctrine, there exists at Rome, and in Italy generally, dotal institutions, which annually provide a considerable number of poor girls with sufficient dowries to tempt offers of marriage. The lottery is also a recognized institution of the Church, or, more properly speaking, of its charity. Benoit XIV. ordered that at each drawing five maidens should receive their dowries from as many winning numbers; hence the fortunate damsels are known not by their Christian names, but as Miss 79, or Miss 1025, as the prize numbers may prove. The hospitals succor annually about five thousand poor, at an expense of two hundred thousand dollars.

The Pope has various resources for his public and private benevolence. The Apostolic Alms, provides him with about five hundred dollars per month for general benevolence. The Datory, whence briefs and bulls are issued, a sort of ecclesiastical chancellery, which employs about one thousand persons, and receives immense sums from the sale of dispensations, indulgences, and the usual paper traffic of Rome, produces the Pope about thirty thousand dollars. An acquaintance of mine paid to this institution two thousand francs for the privilege to marry his deceased wife's sister. Shops for the sale of dispensations from fasting, and all the numerous requirements of the Church of Rome, to say nothing of more criminal indulgences, are common. The lottery produces fifty thousand dollars; the bureau of briefs and other offices some six thousand more, so that the Pope, unless prodigal, need never be empty-handed.

Venice, which once counted nine hundred rich and noble families, now contains scarcely twelve in comfortable circumstances. Some thirty others live obscurely in corners or lofts of their dilapidated palaces, depending upon the scanty rents received from strangers. At one period more than two-thirds of its population, or seventy thousand souls, required public aid. Milan, to the stranger, presents neither beggars or poverty; its aspect is gay and brilliant, but this is owing rather to the severe measures of the Austrian police to prevent mendicancy than to real prosperity. Its asylums are on the same scale of palatial splendor as in other parts of Italy. As in Sardinia, the poor are removed from sight, and placed in buildings decorated with columns, mosaics, spacious halls and courts, rivaling in architecture the stately palaces of their rulers; which cold magnificence, associated often with forced labor, they would gladly exchange for a gipsy life of privation in the open sunshine. Two thousand eight hundred individuals, according to a Milanese writer, are daily succored by the houses of industry of St. Vincent and St. Marc alone, at a net annual expense of eighty thousand dollars. The same establishments at Venice are more prosperous, costing the city but about five thousand dollars, and even producing a saving, if the cleaning and lighting of the streets, with which they are charged, be comprised.

BRIGANDS—ARMED AND UNARMED.

Mendicity in the beautiful and rich Etruria has been very appropriately termed by Doctor Purchetti an "unarmed brigandage." Its insolence and pertinacity, coupled with the healthful and robust appearance of the majority who demand, rather than ask alms, have won for it this character. Even in Florence, where alone it is forbidden by law, it often stalks the streets apparently unmolested, though it frequently assumes the disguise of traffic to blind the eyes of the police. Unlike other parts of Italy, it seldom descends to wanton exposure of ulcered or crippled limbs, or other disgusting corporeal modes of exciting compassion, but boldly says it is hungry, and simply exclaims, "Give me a quattrino." Florence and Arezzo alone have organized houses of industry for the unoccupied poor. Elsewhere they are at the mercy of, or prey unmolested upon, individual benevolence. All strangers arriving at Leghorn are taxed nearly one dollar a head for the poor. But their "palace" is occupied by Austrian soldiers, while in rags and vermin they are allowed to infest the streets with more the air of nobles than of beggars. Such sights are not grateful to the eyes of a court. Consequently when the Grand Duke comes to the baths of Lucca or elsewhere, the police are active in clearing the roads of a class of his subjects which reflect no credit on his government. After his departure they make up their temporary losses by harassing strangers with two-fold energy. In the capital, however, the severity of the law, which inflicts imprisonment or fines for the first offenses, and perpetual imprisonment with forced labor for renewed transgressions, serves in some degree to abate the nuisance.

Formerly there were three hundred churches and convents in the little city of Florence, owning the larger part of its real estate. Thanks to the enlightened Ferdinand and the French, the greater part of these abodes of idleness were suppressed. Even now, however, the Church owns a large proportion of the city. The numerous heraldic devices of the lamb and cross, to be seen on so many of the houses and palaces of the city, indicate the wealth of the cathedral alone. At present there are seventeen convents of men and fourteen of females, besides seven houses of refuge for young girls under the charge of nuns. Of hospitals of all kinds there are eight or ten; that of Santa Maria Nuova, founded in 1287, being one of the finest and best organized in Europe, and succoring annually more than three thousand sick of both sexes.

In this hospital is to be seen the museum of the late Professor Segato, who discovered the process of petrifying animal substances, so that while they retained their natural colors and shapes, they became as hard as stone. The Church, as usual, interfered with his art, on the ground that it was 'contrary to the scriptural doctrine of "into dust shalt thou return." Consequently, unable to prosecute the discoveries further, he soon after died, leaving to the world this unique museum as the evidence of his success, and to tantalize science with regrets for the lost secret.

It comprises every portion of the human body transformed to stone, destined to endure as long as the world itself, if not ground to pieces by violence. There are two tables, one finished and polished, the other incomplete, made of mosaics, formed by sections of human bones, brain, lungs, blood-vessels, intestines, and muscles, as firm as marble, showing the internal structure of each, but resembling colored stones. Without an explanation every visitor would presume them to have come from some stone mosaic manufactory, for they are symmetrically arranged in squares, with the great variety of colors nicely graduated. Different portions of the human body, showing the internal anatomy, are so perfectly petrified as to form perfect objects of study for the medical student. Even morbid anatomy was subjected with entire success to this process. Animals of all kinds, reptiles, chickens, in and out of the egg—in short, nothing that had warm blood was capable of resisting his petrifying touch. The beauty of his art was that it preserved the life-like appearance and color of the animal; hence, for anatomical and natural history museums, his discovery was invaluable. The student had before him the real object of his study, perfect as in life, without any of the inconveniences and imperfections attending waxen representations and stuffed, or spirit-preserved, specimens. The Roman Church, above all others, did wrong to discourage the art. Next to medical colleges it is the largest dealer in dead men's bones. What an improvement it would have been, instead of exhibiting a knee-pan in a vial, or a dried skull in a gold case, to have held up for adoration an entire saint as fresh as in life. All skepticism in relics would then disappear, for however easy it may be to substitute one bone for another, there could be no possibility of destroying personal identity. The stone saint would be the actual image of the live saint; no daguerreotype could be half so exact; and when not in use, could be quietly laid by on the shelf, as is frequently done in life.

What a gallery of great men might not be bodily perpetuated to the world by this art. Who would not now like to see the real Homer, Socrates, or Cæsar, not in cold marble, but looking as if they merely slept, their actual flesh and blood stiff and erect before us? The sculptor would have abandoned his art in despair. I can not say that I should look complacently on the process as applied to one's own family. Perhaps the relations of Homer, Socrates, and Cæsar would have had similar objections, and so we should have preferred the funeral pile to the adamantine embalmment. There is, however, in this museum the head of a young girl, with long flaxen hair of remarkable beauty, as soft and tresslike as in life. Belonging to this head is a virgin bosom, snow-white, and of a perfection of form that nature seldom equals, and art never surpasses. Power's Greek Slave, or the Venus de Medici, could exchange busts with this maiden without loss; so exquisite are its proportions, and so pure its outlines. Here, then, exists a figure which women will envy, and men admire through all time, as cold and hard as flint, yet warming the feelings with love and pity for the fate of one so young and beautiful. All that is known of her is that she was found dead with others under the roof of a church that fell in, and Segato possessed himself of her corpse.

Hospitals for foundlings appear to be a peculiar charity of Roman Catholic countries. They indicate both great distress and a low scale of morality. Increasing as they must, from the facilities they afford to illegitimacy and concubinage, evils scarcely less than those which they seek to remedy, Protestants should be cautious in imitating them. Indeed, in countries of their origin they are defended only as a choice between the infanticide and abandonment, which it is their peculiar province to prevent and relieve. Both legitimate and illegitimate infants find a home in these asylums to the number of several thousands annually. When of sufficient age they are placed in the families of the peasants, who receive a trifling sum for their maintenance, which ceases when the children are able to earn something for themselves. If the girls marry, they are entitled to a dowry of about thirty dollars, but after they have left the hospital and are at service, they frequently continue to obtain this sum without the necessary condition, through others to whom they furnish their papers for that purpose. In 1825 there were 10,194 infants received into the several foundling hospitals of Tuscany. The number increased to 12,494 in 1834, owing, in part, to the increase of population. In 1841 the family of the Royal Hospital of Innocents of Florence alone, numbered 7511, a large number of whom are legitimate children abandoned from cause of poverty by their parents. They can, however, at any time reclaim them by reimbursing the hospital for the expenses incurred. A considerable number, one in sixteen, are thus withdrawn, but with all the care and kindness bestowed upon those who remain, their lot is a hard one. I had a domestic once who knew nothing more of her childhood than that she was found in the streets and placed in one of these hospitals, where, after receiving the usual fare and education for a certain number of years, she was sent out into the world to gain her own subsistence. She knew neither parent nor relative—in fact, was perfectly alone, united to society only by the indissoluble chain of servitude; for what hope has one of these public orphans to contract ties of family when even noble born maidens without dowries are compelled to pine in solitude, or seek religious consolation in cloisters. She was humble and grateful, but sad; feeling deeply her forlorn situation, aggravated as it was by a pulmonary complaint, which threatened soon to terminate her sorrows in life, and unite her with Lazarus in Abraham's bosom. I know not who are most to be pitied; the parent driven by shame or poverty to violate the purest instincts of human nature; or their offspring, fatherless and motherless, knowing no kin, nursed during infancy by hirelings, or else confined within the walls of a charitable institution, deprived of the sacred joys of a home, until bone and muscle are sufficiently grown for them to take their places as "the drawers of water and hewers of stone" for their more fortunate brethren. Vice brings with it another punishment. Whoever has noticed these orphans will have perceived that they appear like an inferior race of humanity, compared with the civilized European type. Their faces and forms seem as if run in one mould, with dull, unintellectual, almost imbecile expressions, and short stubby figures, like those of well-fed swine. After looking at these children I ceased to wonder at the stunted, haggard, lifeless population so often seen in the streets.

Naples, in its "Albergo dei Poveri," possesses one of the most sumptuous poor-houses in existence; one immense establishment, accommodating upward of three thousand paupers of both sexes, in which there are not only workshops for the fabrication of silks, cottons, laces, the cutting of coral, and other trades, but also schools of music, design, arithmetic, and other branches of knowledge, besides a printing-office, type-foundry, and other arts, so as to afford suitable employments and instruction for all capacities. Notwithstanding this model establishment and numerous others, whose annual revenues amount to nearly two millions and five hundred thousand dollars, Naples is infested with an idle, begging population, to reform which, would require all the energy of well-directed, liberal institutions, or else a severity which even its heartless despotism dare not exercise.

There is an important distinction between Roman Catholic and Protestant benevolence in modes of action. Both are comprehensive, self-denying, laborious, and unwearied. The former, however, partakes of the parade and ostentation of the Church, which controls and directs its operations. It delights in uniforms, chantings, torch-lights, and masquerading. When it visits the sick or buries the dead, it puts on its robes of office. With all its apparent humility, it blazons forth its good deeds to the world by a state and trappings that announce its errand, and proclaim its suberviency to the Holy See. To relieve is the secondary, to proselyte is the primary object of its creed. Its various associations form the militia of popery, and, owing to their real virtues, they are the most successful of its soldiers in extending its conquests. No one can meet the Roman "Brethren of the Dead," whose office is to bury the deserted victims of contagion, see the mournful costume of the Florentine "Brethren of Pity" in their more comprehensive errands of mercy, or watch the noiseless steps of the French "Sisters of Charity," as they glide, like ministering angels, to the hearthstones of poverty or the bedsides of the sick and dying, without feeling his heart respond to the sublime doctrine of the universal brotherhood of man, and involuntarily reverencing that form of Christianity which thus manifests its benevolence to the world. But is there not more real sublimity in the silent, humble walk of Protestant benevolence—the doing good in secret—than in all the mighty machinery of Rome? The one takes hold of the sentiment, and exalts the imagination; it proclaims its work and demands its tribute. The other also has in its ranks Sisters of Charity and Brethren of Mercy as devoted and unwearied as any in the ranks of Rome. But they go forth on their daily rounds of Christian love unheralded by chants, and undisguised in the robes of state; less known to the public than if, in their spiritual pride, they doffed their usual habiliments to bury themselves and their good works in those lugubrious costumes with which Romanism conceals all but the eyes, for fear that the right hand shall know what the left doeth, while at the same time they bid the world to do them reverence.

Protestantism washes no pilgrims' feet, and feeds no paupers in the pride of charity amidst the splendors of a dominant hierarchy. It makes no theatrical exhibition of its benevolence, though its English form delights too much in good dinners. Its benevolence flows not at the command of a human "Holy Father," directed by one fallible will toward one infallible purpose; but is the offspring of individual hearts, concentrated by love, for the simple purpose of visiting "the widows and fatherless in their affliction."

Men see not the Protestant Brethren of Mercy as they pass by, for they are like other men; neither do women kneel on stony pavements when the Protestant clergyman carries hope to the dying, for his presence is not pompously announced by a long train of priestlings in gaudy robes, with the tinkling of bells, and the armed soldiers, who guard the Roman minister as he bears the body and blood of the Prince of Peace on his way to absolve dying sinners; nor do our Sisters of Charity wear other garb than that in which they so faithfully perform their duties as Christian mothers.

Protestant benevolence appeals directly to "Our Father in Heaven" to sustain and direct its energies; it acknowledges its accountability to the public, from which it derives its material aid: and in all points it seeks to dispense its bounties as Providence extends its blessings, silently and effectively, to all who hunger and thirst. Both are the children of Christianity. Which does it most honor, and partakes largest of its spirit, the records of eternity alone may decide. Would that, while both remain on earth, their rivalry were solely in provoking each other to good deeds!

Roman Catholic cities, in their primary aspect, present a higher appearance of public morality than Protestant capitals. But few public women are met in their streets; drunkenness seems rare; and there is a general quiet and lethargy, the exact reverse of the bustle and enterprise of those towns that acknowledge Protestantism. Nowhere is this parallel more strikingly shown than between Geneva and Lucerne, Florence and New York, or Rome and London. This external morality is readily explained.

While the grosser forms of prostitution are not so openly exhibited in Papal cities as in Protestant, the distinction between virtue and vice is much less rigorously drawn. The Roman clergy are able to repress it outwardly, but it extends inwardly. Society in general is corrupt, while the streets are comparatively pure. The forced celibacy of the priesthood ever has produced, and will continue to, while it exists, a vast amount of hidden concubinage. The religious restraints and expenses of marriage produce more that is open, while the general laxity of public opinion tolerates corrupt unions that in England and the United States would bring upon the offenders the penalties of law and expulsion from society. Possibly there are fewer public prostitutes in strictly Roman Catholic towns than in Protestant, but as an offset, the morals of their women are looser, and afford wider scope for intrigue, so that licentiousness is not concentrated, as in general with us, to a class of degraded females, and reduced to the baser condition of traffic. Our streets too are freed from a nuisance which no traveler escapes from in Italy. Pimps dog his steps every where, and though he may escape the sight of loose women, he is constantly haunted by the obscene importunities of their beastly male agents.

Intoxication is rarer, because strong liquors are not so available. There is, however, more general drinking, and perhaps, in the mass, more aggregate vice and misery from this cause than in America. In Italy all drink; teetotalism is unknown. If we possess a confirmed race of drunkards, they do not understand the principle of temperance; so that while they fail to show as many repulsive specimens of this vice as we, they exhibit more general misery and degradation.

The average morality of the Italian races, in other respects, I consider as beneath the American. Why is it that the lower story of every house and palace is fortified by iron gratings and massive doors, so as to resemble more a prison than private dwellings, if it be not from the general sense of insecurity to property? Petty dishonesty, pilferings, and what may be comprehended under the general term of knavery, extend to degrees of society whose social position would apparently place them above all risk of taint. The servility which panders to vice and clutches at gain, through ignominy or disregard of self-respect, is painfully apparent. Female servants kiss the hands of their masters, and obsequiousness is the chief recommendation in domestics. There is much kindly feeling in the relation of servant and master in Italy, it is true, to the credit of both parties; but the gulf between the two is an impassable one—its boundaries are those of perpetual caste.

Italians are not educated up to the Protestant standard of truth and honor. As beggary with the lower classes carries with it no shame, so falsehood among the higher would not be deemed a vice. The multiplicity of newspapers in the United States prevents any crime from being long hid. Every thing which in any way interests the public is spread before it, from one extremity of the Union to the other, with the rapidity of thought. In consequence, all our evil deeds are dragged to light, and every day develops, as it were, some new crime. At the first glance it would appear as if we were a peculiarly criminal race, but when we consider that the newspapers reflect as a looking-glass the moral condition of a population of twenty-five millions, our surprise is rather at the paucity than the extent of crime. Italy presents nothing of the kind. Its population is not one of readers. Journals are small, scarce, and restricted to only what jealous governments permit to be known. They are but an indifferent clew to the moral condition of Italians. Crimes may be common or rare, and nothing be heard of them away from their immediate circle. Still, I do not believe that the Italians are given to the cold-blooded atrocities which figure not unfrequently in the criminal calendars of England and America. At all events we rarely hear of coolly-planned murders for the sake of booty; and yet brigands and assassinations figure largely in Italian tales. The Italian kills in warm blood, or in his profession of a "bravo." He uses his knife, particularly the Roman, as an Anglo-Saxon does his fists. It is his national weapon, and the idea of courage is particularly connected with a prompt thrust in revenge of real or fancied wrong. The Italian is like the Indian in respect to his mode of retribution. He seeks it in the way in which he himself is safest; and what northern minds would consider as base and cowardly, he considers as courageous and justifiable. All who have read the appeals of Mazzini to his countrymen will not fail to perceive that he relies chiefly on treachery and assassination—a wholesale repetition of the Sicilian vespers—to bring about a revolution. The criminal statistics of Rome would show that he does not appeal to their skill in the use of their national weapon without reason.

During the last century, the average of murders in Rome, with a population of one hundred and fifty thousand souls, was five or six a day, and on one occasion fourteen. While occupied by the French, there were in a single day one hundred and twenty assassinations. And as late as 1828 they averaged one daily. A chapel of the Madonna in the church of the Augustins is hung about with knives, dirks, and other murderous instruments, suspended there by their owners, at the order of their confessor, as a condition of absolution and evidence of pardon of their crimes.

The streets of Rome are not safe at the later hours of night, even now, for any one who has aught about him to tempt the cupidity of its highwaymen. Roman friends of mine are accustomed to place their watches in their boots when out late at night. Every housekeeper will tell you the risks they run in not keeping the strictest watch over their premises; and any one's experience in visiting Italian families will convince them that they have more confidence in their portcullis doors and massive gratings than in either the honesty of their countrymen or the guardianship of the police. It is customary, when a visitor calls, to reconnoitre, either through a loop-hole or an upper window, so as to ascertain his quality and business before withdrawing the bolt. Fear and suspicion are manifested to great extent in the domestic arrangements of Italians, and with reason, for in no country is there more sympathy felt for the bandit. As he protects the poor, he is considered more as their champion than a criminal. The ranks of highwaymen are often recruited from the disaffected toward the government, whose oppressions force them, as it were, into open hostility. Hence they partake in part of the character of patriots; and, even with the aid of French and Austrian troops, Italy finds it no easy task to keep her roads and cities safe for the traveler. Judge, then, what would be the condition of the country were its five hundred thousand bayonets reduced to the number that compose the army of the United States!

The chiefs of the Roman brigands, from their audacity and extent of their crimes, have ranked with the vulgar as heroes. The Roman government, unable to cope with them, has, after they had glutted themselves with plunder, pardoned and pensioned them to keep the peace.

One of the most noted was Gasparone, who began his career by killing his confessor for refusing to absolve him for a robbery. Yet so scrupulous was he in the performance of those religious rites that ignorant Romanism substitutes for spiritual worship, that he acquired with the country people a reputation for sanctity; particularly for his devotion to Saint Anthony, and his careful abstinence from murders on Sundays and Church festivals.

Another, Gobertino by name, killed, during his career, with his own hand, nine hundred and sixty-four adults and six infants; regretting only on his death-bed that he had not been able to make up the number to a thousand. Aronzo Albagna massacred his entire family, including his father, mother, two brothers, and sister. America and England may contain criminals capable of rivaling these exploits; but it is certain that the opportunity never would be allowed them. It is rare in either country that a villain gets beyond his first great crime.

My object in presenting this unfavorable summary of Italian character is to show to what extent, in comparison with Protestantism, I consider Romanism to be responsible for it, both for what it has actually done and what it has failed to do. If such are the results where Romanism is supreme, are not other nations in which it seeks to find sway warranted in viewing it, both in a political and moral sense, with a jealous eye? If there be in the institutions of Protestant countries any superiority over those of Roman Catholic, if it is owing to the purer faith, greater knowledge, and more elevated view of human rights which they have developed. Protestantism is progressive. It looks both to the temporal and eternal welfare of the individual. What it claims for itself it allows to others, asking deference only to civil law, while creeds are left intact. It seeks to convert the understanding, and not to terrify the nerves and lull them into a false repose.

Romanism, on the contrary, is the opposite of all this. She forbids liberty of speech and freedom of the press. She refuses the appeal to the Bible. Intolerance is her constant principle. By one weapon or another, by being all things to all men, by persuasion when possible, by force when she has the power, she seeks to bind all nations to her spiritual despotism. Romanism and republicanism are antagonistic powers. When together, one or the other must succumb. In the United States, thus far, Protestantism has succeeded in extracting the sting from her enemy. There are only two powers equal to cope with her. Democracy, on the one hand, strong in its own rights, and enlightened as to its true mission to elevate mankind by the gradual spread of liberty sanctified by religion and knowledge; on the other, a despotism capable of controlling elements as powerful as its own. In England and America it is kept within restricted limits by the superior power of an enlightened public opinion. In France it has again become restless and aggressive; not content with equality, it seeks supremacy. Whether the infidelity of France will be able to retain the toleration it has permitted to all sects in the contest with the subtleties and fanaticism of popery, remains to be seen. The policy for Romanism is to demand for itself all that it refuses to another—the golden rule has no place in its creed. Protestantism asks nothing more than that all sects should be placed on an equal basis, and left to find their way to the hearts of men through the paths of knowledge and truth. In doing this, she disarms herself of weapons that Romanism unscrupulously uses to her injury. They do not meet on equal terms except on Protestant grounds. When the Pope rules, the tongue is tied and the limbs fettered if they do not acknowledge his supremacy. It is a mistake to suppose that the attacks of popery are confined to Protestant countries. Her power has been checked repeatedly by Catholic princes, and equally against them she wages endless war on every point that crosses her selfish interests. Venice was free and powerful while she was tolerant and uncompromising to the demands of Rome; Florence populous and prosperous until her rulers became priests and her interests confided to Rome. All free communities that have trusted to her for salvation have fallen by her arts. There is no hope for Italy while popery exists as a dominant creed. It opposes an insurmountable barrier to freedom and knowledge. None are more painfully convinced of this than enlightened Italians themselves. Piedmont is now a rising state, but every step of her progress is one of contest with the Pope. In Spain, popery refuses a Christian burial to a Protestant. In Germany and France she calls marriages concubinage when not sanctified before her altars with gifts to her priests. But I have already pursued this topic sufficiently far to bear my witness against the giant cause of the darkness and ignorance that overspreads so large a portion of our globe.

One topic which enlists the sympathies of liberty every where still remains. Will Italy ever become a united, free country, or must she ever remain, in the words of Metternich, merely a geographical idea? Nature evidently intended her for a unity. This, however, has never been accomplished. Rome founded her power over isolated cities and kingdoms; she melted them in the crucible of her power, but did not cast them out a united state. Romans, not Italians, ruled the world. When Rome fell, Italy resumed her previous condition of rival communities engaged in ceaseless contests. Commerce and war developed wealth and energy. Italy became great from the genius and arts of her hostile sons. She contained within herself all the elements of the first power on earth but union. Her commercial cities were each worth the ransom of kingdoms. They conquered territories and spread their power abroad, while neglecting to insure it at home. All paid homage to Rome as their spiritual head. Then was the time for a patriot Pope to have healed their dissensions and united them as one people. But no! The Popes were alive only to the extension of their own petty temporal sovereignties. They esteemed it a higher honor to rule over a few cities, wasted with fire and sword at their command, than to be the saviours of Italy. To this end they sowed fresh dissensions; they repeatedly leagued with transalpine enemies; they exterminated liberty; and finally became the chief among the many sad causes which have contributed to make Italy what we now find her—the mere foot-ball of European policy.

Besides popery, Italy is held down by two-fold bonds. First, the policy of France and Austria is to prevent a rival power, such as she would be if free and united, from holding a rank on the shores of the Mediterranean. Secondly, and by far the greater obstacle, is the spirit of disunion among her own sons. So long have they been accustomed to look upon cities as countries, that each citizen considers his neighbor of another city as a stranger—their country is embraced within the limits of their city walls. The bitter recollections of former feuds and rivalries are still active. Venice hates Milan—Leghorn, Florence—Pisa, both; in short, the nearer are towns the more cordial is the hatred that exists between them. Patriotism is purely local. During 1848, the Livornese wished to plunder Florence, and would have preferred turning their arms against their countrymen rather than against their common enemy. The little, poverty-struck Lucca, now merged into Tuscany, mourns its court, and resents as an injury its absorption into a greater and more powerful state. The feeling between the numerous states into which Italy is divided, is far more cordial than between the cities of each state. Genoa is restless under the sway of Piedmont, and exalts in her imagination the departed glories of the Ligurian Republic. Venice dreams still of her old doges, and the power and commerce that have forever forsaken her wave-washed palaces. The peasantry of Lombardy prefer Austrian rule to Italian, and fired upon the patriots in 1848 who marched to their relief. Those of Tuscany cling likewise to their bondage. They say, we would rather have one "padrone" than many. The Grand Duke has a right to be our master, because his family have always ruled us; so we had rather have him than new masters. The unlettered Italian mind has no conception of liberty. It is a condition it never dreamed of. Despotism may be created in an hour, but republicanism is of slow growth. Those who hope to regenerate Italy in an hour, are putting faith in dreams.

Is there then no hope of Italy? Many shrewd observers say no. I differ from them. True, I believe that the vices of Italy are as great as I have represented them to be. But there is also, in her varied population, as much innate talent, genius, and natural goodness of heart as exists in any country. Romanism has willed all that it has touched, but the germ still exists. Remove the causes, and the evils will disappear. In the simple-hearted inhabitants that people her mountain valleys she has resources of mind and soul that need but the talisman of cultivation to flood with new life her cities and her fields. Her towns still shelter learning, science, and virtue. Her industry is indeed crushed, and her commerce annihilated; but the same race that once won the markets of the world still exists, emulous of the fame of their fathers. New Savonarolas, Michael Angelos, and Rienzis will arise. The race of great hearts and lofty minds is not extinct. We say that nations die out. Is it so? A name may die out, but humanity never. It is a common saying that the races of Europe are in their decline, as if races of human beings, by a physical law, arose to a certain climax and then degenerated to mere brutes again. If this theory were true, what creates the greatness of the United States, for Americans are but transplanted Europeans? In America the citizen creates the government, in Europe the government creates the subject. This simple fact explains the gulf between them. The European thrives just in proportion as his government permits. The Italians are but what their rulers have made them. Change their rulers, and there is hope. Unfetter the mind, and it will develop new channels of thought and enterprise. Mental stagnation was never intended by Providence as the condition of beings created in his own image. I will not theorize as to the immediate agencies by which Italy can be united and regenerated, for that concerns more particularly her own sons; but that she can be, and through her own instrumentality, aided by the sympathy and experience of other nations who have passed through their agony of travail, I both firmly believe and devoutly hope.

GLANCES AT OUR MORAL AND SOCIAL STATISTICS.

PROFESSOR DE BOW, Superintendent of the United States' Census, has just issued a new and most interesting volume of statistics. Last January, the House of Representatives ordered a compendium of the Seventh Census, embracing many details that had not hitherto appeared, to be printed for its use. The present work has been prepared in answer to that resolution. Its collection of information and facts is exceedingly valuable. Immense labor and research have been bestowed upon it, and no possible pains have been spared, by the study of collateral sources of knowledge, and the employment of every incidental aid, to make it a complete and reliable American Encyclopedia.

Viewed altogether—in its relation to statistical science, in its bearing upon the policy of the country, in its suggestiveness to the political inquirer, the social reformer, the intelligent moralist, and the cultivated Christian—it is not too much to say that it is one of the most attractive and important books ever presented to the American public. It may be termed a hand-book for the Republic—a condensed but explicit manual of progress and position—a broad outlining of what we are, where we are, and whither we are tending.

A census is not a mere enumeration of the people. It is not simply a series of figures, nor a tabular statement, in stiff and forbidding form, of sexes, births, ages, dwellings, industry, and similar topics; nor is it only a diagram, indicating by lines how our population has disposed of itself, and in what physical relations it stands. All this it is and much more. Whoever takes a comprehensive view of it can not fail to perceive that, beneath this arithmetical exterior, there are found the great cardinal facts of our real life. The register of the past, the prophecy of the future, are here. If read rightly, we can see therein an ample commentary on the principles of American Liberty and the precepts of American Law. The heart of our country, so far as mortal eye can penetrate it, can thus be searched, and we can ascertain, at least with a high degree of probability, the point we have reached in the scale of humanity.

On these accounts we welcome this volume. Congress has done a good service to the country in ordering one hundred thousand copies of it, and we can but hope that it will be judiciously circulated. We have been permitted to examine the work in advance of its appearance, and to lay before our readers a selection from some of its statistics:

AREA OF THE UNITED STATES.

The superficial area amounts to 2,963,666 square miles. Our original territory was 820,680 square miles, and hence our increase has been over three-fold. If we compare the soil of the United States in 1783 with its size in 1854, it is not the mere fact of geographical extension that strikes us so much as the value of the additions themselves. It has not been our policy to acquire remote colonies, or establish distant outposts, but to enlarge our immediate territory. Whatever we have gained has become a part of our national home. It has been made subservient to our wealth and power as well as to our dominion; and if we now reach from the Island of Brazos, in the Gulf of Mexico, to the Straits of Fuca, in the Northern Pacific, and from the Aroostook Valley to the Bay of San Diego, the whole of this vast surface—three times as large as France, Britain, Austria, Prussia, Spain, Portugal, Belgium, Holland, and Denmark put together—is either directly or prospectively tributary to our strength and advancement. The territorial growth has resulted from the purchase of Louisiana and Florida, the admission of Texas, and the Oregon and Mexican treaties.

At the present time, the States and the Territories have about an equal area. In the former, we have 1,464,105 square miles against 1,472,061 in the latter. There are, east of the Mississippi, 865,576 square miles; west, 2,070,590; intermediate between the Mississippi and the Rocky Mountains, 1,200,881; west of the Rocky Mountains, 870,209. Slaveholding States and District of Columbia have 851,508 square miles; Non-slaveholding, 612,597.

If the reader will turn to the accompanying map, he will see the minor divisions of the country depicted. Their relative size is finely presented. One-fourth of the total area belongs to the Pacific slope; one-sixth to the Atlantic proper; one twenty-sixth to the Lakes; one ninth to the Gulf. If the Lake and Gulf regions be included in the Atlantic section, it will make it one third. More than one half is embraced in the Middle region, and over two-fifths are drained by the Mississippi and its tributaries.

Let us stand in the southern part of Illinois and survey the scene. Far away to the north-east the Ohio river extends one thousand miles, its branches entering into the interior of New York, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, and receiving their products for distant transportation. Along the north a shore-line of lakes stretches for more than thirty-five hundred miles; toward the west, the Missouri reaches three thousand miles; while, north and south, the Mississippi measures the length of our possessions.

Looking toward the Atlantic, we see a range of mountains rich in every variety of minerals. Ages since, the deep beds of their wealth were formed by the mighty agencies of nature. Sunshine, that left the parent orb centuries ago, is imprisoned in their dark recesses; and there, too, is the wondrous working of the earth's great furnace; and there, the monuments of ancient upheaval efforts by which the treasures of the globe were brought within the grasp of man. See the gigantic basin, with its sides sweeping from mountains that are sufficiently wide apart to shelter three hundred millions of people; the stupendous provisions for convenience and comfort; the inexhaustible materials for the noblest forms of civilization and the fullest security of empire. What a prophecy has the past recorded here! Geology explains its strata, and Natural History its records; but what are they in comparison with those perfected uses to which the future will reduce them in the service of our race! It is not what the globe is, but what man will make it, in executing the decrees of Providence, that its true grandeur lies.

No sooner had our Independence been won than a new era of extension and occupancy commenced. A procession began to move westwardly—small at first, but swelling in succeeding years, until it seems as if the magnificent crusade of peace were to be enacted here. The movement has been easy, natural, and safe. No shock has been given to the States or to the country. The early disposition of emigrants was to adhere to their old lines of latitude as far as practicable, and thus the practical effect was to render the new settlement a continuation of the original colonization. Hereditary usages, ancestral sentiments, and established habits were perpetuated in this way. It was the nation expanding itself. It was the same energy, the same lofty attributes of character, the same sincere trust in the guidance of an unseen hand, that had signalized the battle-fields of the Revolution. Heroic days were those—days of dauntless courage and enduring fortitude. Civilization, retiring with a crown of victory from a contest with tyranny, transferred the struggle to another field. Wildernesses were explored; forests leveled; cities founded; rivers converted into highways of trade, and States erected. Above all, the Union has been cemented. If the North and the South have extended themselves according to the laws of natural direction, they have subverted the interests of each other and of the whole. Northern capital and Southern labor, Northern industry and Southern consumption, have been brought into nearer relations of mutual profit and assistance. The laws of physical geography have combined with circumstances to promote growth and strength. The constant tendency of our advancing civilization, by consulting the facts of climate and social peculiarities, has been favorable not merely to sectional wealth and power, but yet more to the real, vital connection of the parts themselves. No surer plan could have been adopted to unite the agricultural Northwest with the South; to identify Boston and New York with Charleston and New Orleans; to make each portion of the Union sensitive to the welfare of the other, than the one which we have unconsciously worked out in the progress of our national history. The colonization of the Valley of the Mississippi may, therefore, be said to have done more to break up any tendencies toward insulation, and to cement our bonds of fraternal sympathy, than all other physical causes put together.

It has had another effect. The increase of our territory, followed by the organization of new States, has illustrated the beauty and wisdom of a simple, limited Federal Government. If the prerogatives of the Federal Government had been more numerous, if its authority had been spread over every local affair, it is impossible for us to conceive how it could have sustained itself with such a surface. Its duties complicated, its offices intertwined with every thing, its immediate representatives multiplied into a host of dependents, no one can see in what way its existence could have been continued. But organized as it is, the length and breadth of its dominion interposes no impediment in its path. Each State, vested with the sovereignty necessary for its own control, training its citizens to the virtuous, intelligent exercise of freedom, and managing its own separate interests to suit its views and circumstances, relieves the central power of all onerous burdens; while it, occupying the ground of federal relations, and administering a general superintendency over the concerns of common welfare, is able to fulfill its watchful guardianship in every part of its immense empire. Fifty years since, each one of the members of the House of Representatives numbered a constituency of thirty-three thousand, now it is ninety-three thousand four hundred and twenty. Thirty-two Senators then represented sixteen States, now sixty-two form that branch of our National Legislature. In 1820 our Atlantic States sent one hundred and ninety-six members to Congress against sixty-two from the West; in 1850 the former had but one hundred and sixty-seven against one hundred and twenty-nine from the latter. Amid these changes the varied wants of the country have been met, and the public good consulted. New States have vied with the old thirteen in loyalty to the Constitution of the land. Looking at the vast additions to our territory, the multiplication of States, the birth of new centres of trade and influence, the variety of claims to be regarded and interests to be preserved, and then, contemplating the fact that the same Constitution which was provided for the welfare of three millions of people, now protects the rights and upholds the honor of twenty-five millions—its essential principles unchanged, and its authority still supreme—who can fail to see that it presents the most remarkable instance known to history, of a sagacity that read the future—of fruitful intellects that had garnered wisdom for coming ages—of true and noble hearts, that felt the prophetic throbbings of humanity in their burning pulses—of a guiding will and a sustaining hand, higher and purer than the world can give?

GROWTH OF STATES.

The least growth in ten years belongs to Vermont, her gain having been but 7.59 per cent.; the greatest to Wisconsin, her increase having amounted to 886.88. The smallest rate of growth within the last sixty years is that of Delaware (54.89), while the largest is Tennessee (2701.58). The ratio of increase of the Slaveholding States at the census of 1840, was 25.41 per cent.; in 1850, 31.73: for the Non-Slaveholding States and Territories it was, for 1840, 38.73; 1850, 38.98. Our general growth for the decade 1800–1810, was 36.45 per cent.; for 1840–1850 it was 85.87. The ratio of increase from 1840–1850 is larger for the Slaveholding than for the Non-Slaveholding States, and the average growth of the whole is greater than ever before, the decade of 1810 excepted.

MALES AND FEMALES.

The number of white males in the country is 10,026,402; of white females, 9,526,666. The excess of white males is 499,736. There has usually been in the return of each census about 96 white females to 100 white males. The excess of males has been increasing—in 1850 there were 100 for every 95 females. The number of males in 1850 in Great Britain and the Islands of the British Seas, was 10,223,558, while the females numbered 10,735,919. White females in New England are always in excess; in 1820 there were in that section 103.01 against every 100 males; in 1850 the proportion was reduced to 100.87. All other parts of the Union give an excess to the males; it is generally the largest in the southwest, where there are about 100 males to 91 females. The relations of the ages of the sexes present some interesting facts. We learn from Table XXXIII. of the Compendium, that in about every section of the Union the white females between the ages of fifteen and twenty outnumber the males; thus, in Connecticut there are 105.1, in District of Columbia 121.3, in Louisiana 117.6, in Massachusetts 114.6, in Maryland 108.1 for every hundred males. From twenty to fifty years of age the males are usually in excess. Beyond seventy the females show a greater number in most of the States. It appears from the British census for 1851, that for all ages, there were 103,363 females to 100,000 males, a singular contrast to our own returns. Nor does the contrast end here. Boys are born in greater proportions than girls, and yet, in Great Britain there are 105,291 females at twenty years of age against 100,000 males; at forty years, 106,628 against 100,000. The disparity is unnatural, and can only be explained by the intervention of artificial causes. The marked inequality in Scotland is worthy of notice. For every 100 Scotchmen at the ages of twenty to forty there are 112 Scotchwomen; at forty to fifty there are 117; at sixty to eighty there are 185; eighty to a hundred there are 159. Whether Scotchmen die in greater numbers than Scotchwomen, or leave their wives at home when they go abroad, or marry English wives, we can not say, but the disparity of numbers at those seasons of life when the male sex predominates, is certainly a phenomenon. From twenty to forty the proportion in the United States is about 14 men to 18 women.

Another fact of interest is the number of our white population under twenty-six years of age. According to the first, second, and third census, about one-third of the whole was under ten years of age, another third between sixteen and twenty-six. Over ten millions are under twenty years of age, and more than six millions range from twenty to forty, while from twenty to fifty we have over seven millions and a half. The present number of persons in middle life shows a gain on preceding ages, and consequently the producing classes are advancing.

FAMILIES AND DWELLINGS.

Among our white and free colored population there are 3,598,195 families, and 3,362,387 dwellings. The ratio of dwellings to 100 families is 93.44; the ratio of families to 100 inhabitants is 18.00. In Utah and Oregon there is one dwelling to every family; in Louisiana 100 to every 110; in Connecticut 100 to 114; in Massachusetts and Rhode Island 100 to 126 families. In England the proportion of families to houses is 12 to 10. The general rule in England, says the British Census, is for every family to have its own house, but exceptional cases exist in London and the large towns. The crowding of many families into the same building is carried to a much greater extent on the Continent than in the British Islands. There can be no doubt that wherever strong domestic sentiments exist, the prevailing disposition of a people will be to enjoy the privacy of home. The idea of seclusion, indeed, is essential to our conception of home; for only so far as it contrasts with the free intercourse of public life, the daily throng bearing us on as a part of its restless activity, can it be cherished as the dwelling-place of our hearts. Our countrymen, inheriting the Anglo-Saxon love of retirement, evince this sentiment in its strongest form. A home of their own; where their thoughts may be free, where the offices of affection may be serenely discharged, and the wearied pulses of their being may throb with renewing vigor, is always before their youthful fancy. Romance glows with no more resplendent hue than when it paints such a scene, nor has age a brighter memory than that which preserves, amidst feebleness and decay, its sunny aspects. The power of this passion in educating us to appreciate the value of our republican institutions, in cultivating the cardinal virtues of citizenship, and making us jealous of every thing that might impair the stability of our government, can scarcely be estimated. It is this deep-rooted anxiety in the American mind to have a home, that has prompted so many to emigrate to the West. It has stimulated industry and enterprise. It has multiplied owners of farms and other real estate. And especially has it evinced itself in that fearless encounter of the responsibilities of business in early manhood, which is so marked a feature in our character. If our people are excessively eager in the pursuits of mammon, to their credit be it said, that the best earthly feelings of our nature are generally connected with their devotion to trade.

A few paragraphs above, the attention of the reader was drawn to the large number of young persons in our country. We have eight millions of our white population under fifteen years of age. Such a vast element in our social system suggests many serious reflections. A mass of mind like this, surrounded by circumstances that generate sufficient excitement to fill every moment, and awaken every faculty to its utmost stretch, inheriting tendencies to every kind of earnest, ambitious effort, and finding the broad fields of activity open and tempting before it, must necessarily be computed in our estimate of the future character and influence of the republic. Happily for us, a profound concern for the young is one of the traits of American life. It is seen in the immense provision for their secular instruction, in the Sabbath-schools of our churches, in the literature written expressly for them, and in many other forms of benevolent interest.

The ratio of Marriages is supposed by Professor De Bow to be about one in one hundred persons. In England, there is 1 marriage to every 130 inhabitants; in France and Austria, 1 in 123; in Prussia, 1 in 110. Combining the different facts that bear on this branch of inquiry—relations of the sexes, dwellings, marriages, families, and children—it would seem that our domestic system approaches nearer to completeness than is found elsewhere. Nor is this at all surprising. The circumstances of our country directly tend to produce this result. The doctrines of Malthus are not applicable to us; our condition is favorable to the obtainment of a competent support for a household; the opportunities that lie open to industry and enterprise are numerous and inviting; and hence, nature is as little restrained here in seeking the lawful gratification of its social instincts, as it could be under the present arrangements of humanity. One of the greatest advantages of good government is in that entire freedom which the social relations possess, and by which they can adjust themselves in simple obedience to their own inherent laws. Where the physical circumstances of a nation harmonize with such a civil policy, there is nothing left for man to desire. The world, stamped all over with his Maker's promise, offers its treasures to fill his hands, supply his senses, satisfy his wants, please his taste, and exalt his life. That this state of things exists, in an encouraging degree, in our country, can not be doubted; nor can we fail to perceive that it must exert a most beneficial agency in fitting us to enjoy the blessings of liberty.

UNION CEMENTING THE UNION.

The migratory habits of our citizens are well known. Wherever interest offers a strong inducement, there they are sure to settle; a stronger motive, presenting readier or larger gains, soon moves them again; and in some instances—numerous enough to attract notice—the change continues until life is exhausted in the chase after novelty. The number of those residing in the States of their birth is 13,624,897; of those living out of their native States, 4,112,681. More than one-fourth of the free persons born in the Southern States have removed to other sections; one-sixth have left the Eastern or Middle States; one-tenth the Southwestern; and one-fortieth the Northwestern and the Territories. Among those who live in the Slaveholding States, 726,450 are natives of Non-Slaveholding States, and 352,112 of those residing in the Non-Slaveholding States are natives of Slaveholding States. Any one must see that this extraordinary system of interchange must have a potent influence in making the various sections of the country better acquainted with one another, in correcting errors and eradicating prejudices, and above all, in establishing the closest bonds of social union. Whoever has traveled much through the United States, and observed the intimate connection between families in remote sections, must have been struck with the thousand ties that have thus been formed. The intelligent young lady of New England, introduced to the South as a teacher, has, in very many cases, changed this relation for the position of a wife and mother. Men of the North, seeking Southern cities and towns for mercantile and commercial purposes, have married Southern ladies, and settled permanently in the States of their adoption. In all parts of the national territory our habits of inter-emigration have produced these results. One town in Mississippi may be given as an illustration. Out of 548 families, the husband and the wife of 225 were from different States, domestic or foreign; 61 were natives of Non-Slaveholding States, intermarried with those of Slaveholding States. The fireside is thus made tributary to our union; and how typical is it of the flame that burns on the altar of our common land!

FREE COLORED POPULATION.

Its number is 484,495; of which 275,400 are black, and 159,095 are mulattoes. The ratio of its increase is declining. "In New England the increase is now almost nothing." In the Southern States it is only about one-fourth of what it was from 1800 to 1810. The Northwest shows the largest ratio of advance. If the rank of the States be considered with reference to this class of population, Maryland stands the highest, as it has done for forty years; Virginia is the second. Massachusetts, from being the fourth, has become the thirteenth. Interesting facts are presented in regard to their occupations. Out of 7693 free colored persons in Connecticut, there are—farmers, 146; mariners, 316; servant, 108; laborers, 1108, over fifteen years of age. Out of 17,462 in Louisiana, there are—carpenters, 521; cigar-makers, 169; coopers, 55; farmers, 158; laborers, 411; masons, 825; planters, 244; shoemakers, 99; tailors, 86; doctors, 6; brokers, 9; capitalists, 4. Of this class in New York city, 1 in about 55 is engaged in an occupation that requires an education; in New Orleans, 1 in 11. In Connecticut it is 1 in 100; in Louisiana, 1 in 12 of the whole free colored.

PERSONS OF FOREIGN BIRTH.

There are living in the United States 2,244,648 of this class, and they are distributed as follows, viz.: Eastern section, 806,249, against 2,421,887 native-born; Middle, 1,060,674, against 5,447,733; Southern, 48,531, against 2,342,255; Southwestern, 105,335, against 1,973,531; North-western and Territories, 708,860, against 5,557,529: total of foreign birth, 2,244,648, against 17,742,915 native-born. The largest per cent. is in the Middle section, being 19.84; the smallest in the Southern, being 1.86. The amount of personal property brought by foreigners to the United States can not be accurately estimated, but taking the calculation of the English Commissioners of Emigration, it is set down at $21,644,480 for the last six years. Where do these foreigners prefer to reside? They seek the towns and cities; for out of 961,719 Irish, it has been found that 382,402 are in the large cities. The ratio among the Germans and Prussians is nearly the same; in the former being 39.76 in favor of the cities, and in the latter 36.43.

REAL AND PERSONAL ESTATE.

The approximative value of real and personal estate is $7,066,562,966. The real estate is over 45 per cent. greater than the personal. A rough estimate of the real estate holders makes about 1,500,000 persons, or 33 per cent. of the free males over 21 years of age. The expenditures of the States are estimated at $24,628,666, and their debt $191,508,922. The amount supposed to be paid by each individual in the Union, for every species of taxation, is $3 58, against $2 55 in 1832.

FARMS AND THEIR PRODUCTIONS.

There are 1,449,075 farms and plantations, averaging 208 acres each, and valued each, with implements, at $2862. About one-thirteenth of the whole area of the organized States and Territories is improved, and one-eighth more is occupied but not improved. About one-sixth of the national domain is occupied or in ownership. Taking New England, we find that 26 acres in the 100 are improved; in the South, 16; Southwest, 5. The average value of occupied land is, in New England, $20 27; Middle States, $28; Southern, $5 34; Southwest, $6 26; Northwest, $11 89; Texas, $1 44 per acre. The value of agricultural products for 1854 is estimated at $1,600,000,000. In meadows, there are 33,000,000 acres; in wheat, 11,000,000; in corn, 31,- 000,000; in cotton, 5,000,000; in potatoes, 2,000,000; in all crops, 113,000,000. Among the planters, there are 74,000 producing over 5 bales of cotton each; 2681 sugar planters; 551 rice planters, growing over 20,000 lbs. each; 15,745 tobacco planters, raising each over 3000 lbs.; 8327 hemp planters. The crop States only are taken in the latter statements.

RAILROADS, CANALS, TELEGRAPHS.

There are now nearly 20,000 miles of railway in the United States; cost of construction, $489,603,128. About 12,000 miles are in construction. In 1828, there were but 8 miles of railroad; in 1830, 41; in 1840, 2167; in 1850, 7855. Great Britain has constructed 7686 miles; Germany, over 5000; France, over 2000. We have about 5000 miles of canals. A report of 2856 miles of canals, shows a total cost of nearly $55,000,000. We have 89 telegraphic lines, as estimated in 1853, with over 28,000 miles of wire; but at the present time we have over 80,000 miles of wire.

COMMERCE.

Imports of the principal States in 1821 and 1852.

| | IMPORTED. | |
|----------------------|-----------------|--------------|
| | in 1821. | in 1853. |
| MASSACHUSETTS | $14,826,732 .. | $41,267,956 |
| NEW YORK | 23,629,246 .. | 178,270,999 |
| PENNSYLVANIA | 8,158,922 .. | 18,834,410 |
| MARYLAND | 4,070,842 .. | 6,330,078 |
| VIRGINIA | 1,078,490 .. | 399,004 |
| SOUTH CAROLINA | 3,007,113 .. | 1,808,517 |
| GEORGIA | 1,002,684 .. | 508,261 |
| ALABAMA | | 806,562 |
| LOUISIANA | 3,379,717 .. | 18,630,686 |

The largest exporting States are given as follows, viz.: Louisiana, 1853, exported $67,768,724; New York, $66,030,355; Massachusetts, $16,895,304; Alabama, $16,786,913; South Carolina, $15,400,408; Georgia and Maryland, each over $7,000,000; Pennsylvania, over $6,000,000.

A comparison of the leading articles of exportation, in point of time, shows—

| | EXPORTED. | |
|-----------------------|-----------------|---------------|
| | in 1821. | in 1853. |
| Cotton | $20,157,484 .. | $109,456,404 |
| Tobacco | 5,648,962 .. | 11,319,319 |
| Rice | 1,494,307 .. | 1,657,658 |
| Flour | 4,298,043 .. | 14,788,894 |
| Fish | 973,591 .. | 461,016 |
| Manufactures | 2,584,916 .. | 22,721,660 |
| Lumber | 1,822,077 .. | 4,996,014 |
| Beef, etc., etc. | 2,052,439 .. | 8,416,878 |

The export of specie in 1821, was $10,478,059, and in 1853, $27,486,875.

Our exports to Great Britain between 1790 and 1854, have increased fourteen-fold; to France, seven-fold. For each person in the United States we consumed $5 72 of foreign goods in 1790; and in 1853 it was $9 92. The proportion of exports of domestic goods in 1790 to each person was $5 00; and in 1853 it was $8 44.

The imports of several leading articles into the United States are given thus:

| | In 1821. | In 1853. |
|-------------------------|-------------|--------------|
| Cotton Manufactures.. | $7,589,711 | $27,731,313 |
| Woolens | 7,437,737 | 27,621,911 |
| Linen | 2,564,159 | 10,236,087 |
| Silk | 4,486,970 | 33,048,542 |
| Coffee | 4,489,970 | 15,564,590 |
| Sugar | 3,558,895 | 14,998,008 |
| Tea | 1,322,686 | 8,224,858 |
| Iron and Steel Manufac. | 1,868,529 | 7,888,791 |

Our use of foreign cottons and woolens has increased nearly four-fold within the above period; linen shows a greater advance; while silk has increased nearly eight-fold. The cost of our silk importations, if averaged to our population, is nearly $1.50 for each person. Our people were much more economical in this respect in 1821, for then the average expense was less than 50 cents. The large increase in the use of coffee is also noticeable, the average having advanced from about fifty cents for each person to nearly seventy cents. Tea shows nearly the same advance as silk.

The proportion of our debt in 1790 was $19.21 for each person; in 1853 it was $2.23. The proportion of revenue in 1790 to each person was 71 cents; in 1800, $2.00; in 1820, $1.74; in 1830, $1.89; in 1840, $1.00; in 1850, $1.87; in 1853, $2.43. The proportion of our tonnage to every 100 persons in 1790, $12.78; in 1800, $18.83; in 1810, $19.68; in 1820, $13.28; in 1830, $9.26; in 1840, $12.77; in 1850, $15.24; in 1853, $17.42.

Our domestic exports in 1790 amounted to $19,660,000; in 1800, $31,840,903; in 1820, $51,683,640; in 1840, $113,895,634; in 1850, $134,900,233; and 1853, $213,417,697. The increase in our exports to Great Britain and France has been given above. We now export to Russia $2,456,653 against $66,221 in 1795; to China, $3,736,992 against $1,023,242 in 1795; to Spain and her dependencies, $11,847,101 against $4,714,864 in 1795.

The imports from the South American States into the United States are nearly three-fold as great as our exports to them. It is about the same in the case of China.

PRODUCTS OF MANUFACTURES, MINING, AND THE MECHANIC ARTS.

The total capital invested in these branches of industry in 1850 was $527,209,193; raw material used, $554,655,038; males employed, 719,479; females, 225,512; total of hands, 944,991; wages paid, $229,786,377; annual product, $1,018,336,463; per cent. profit, 48. The seven States which have the largest of these investments are, New York, with nearly $100,000,000; Pennsylvania, over $94,000,000; Massachusetts, over $83,000,000; Ohio, over $29,000,000; Connecticut, over $23,000,000; New Jersey, over $22,000,000; and Virginia, over $18,000,000. The per cent. profit ranges from 12.85 in Minnesota to 812.52 in California. Taken by geographical sections, New England has an average gain of 31 per cent.; Middle States, 48; Southern, 37; Southwest, 40; Northwest, 71; Slaveholding States, 48; Non-Slaveholding, 51 per cent. profit.

RELIGIOUS WORSHIP.

There are 38,183 buildings used for religious worship in the United States, capable of accommodating 14,270,189 persons, and valued, with other church possessions, at $87,446,371. The new tables, which appear in the Compendium, are of great interest. The average value of the churches is $2357, and the capacity of accommodation is 376 persons. In every 1000 of the whole population 619 can be seated at one time in the churches, and if the whites and free colored are estimated, nearly three-fourths (72 in 100) can be accommodated. Taking the various denominations, it seems that the Methodists have one church for every 1739 of the total population; the Baptist, one for 2478; the Presbyterians, one for 4769; the Protestant Episcopal one for 15,874; the Catholics, one for 18,901; and other sects, one for 2923. If we examine the provisions for religious worship in the States, we find that the largest accommodation is afforded in the following, viz.: Indiana and North Carolina, 2.06 churches to every 1000 of the whole population; Georgia, 2.05 do.; Florida and Tennessee, over 2. For the several great sections, it is estimated that New England has Churches, 4612; Accommodation, 1,895,285; Average Accommodation, 411; Ratio of Accommodation, 69.47. Middle States have for C., 9714; A., 4,306,483; A. A., 443; R. A., 65.00. Southern States have for C., 7394; A., 2,571,412; A. A., 348; R. A., 65.05. Southwestern States have for C., 5415; A., 1,596,760; A. A., 295; R. A., 48.08. Northwestern States have for C., 10,926; A., 3,853,926; A. A., 353; R. A., 60.41. California and Territories have for C., 122; A., 46,283; A. A., 379; R. A., 25.03. The average value of the churches in New England, Middle States, California, and Territories, is nearly the same, and it is nearly four times as great as that of the other sections; but the average accommodation, as will be seen in the above statement, does not so materially differ. Among the large cities, it appears that Albany ranks, in the ratio of accommodation, 70.52; Baltimore, 47.59; Boston, 56.26; Charleston, 67.58; Chicago, 73.76; Cincinnati, 46.63; Louisville, 56.92; Mobile, 63.37; New Orleans, 23.50; New York, 41.53; Philadelphia, 45.70; St. Louis, 42.74. About 30,000 clergymen are regularly or occasionally employed.

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES.

The Federal Government has granted over 48,000,000 acres of land for school purposes, and over 4,000,000 for universities. More than four millions of children, as returned by families, attend school. Maine has a larger proportion at school than any other country in the world. The number there is one to three persons. Denmark has one to 4.6; United States, without slaves, one to 4.9—with slaves, one to 5.6; Great Britain has one to 8.5; France one to 10.5. In New England only one person over twenty years of age in every 400 native whites is unable to read and write: in the South and Southwest, one in every 12; in the Territories, one in 6; in the whole Union, one in 22. Among the foreign-born, there is one illiterate to 12; and hence it appears that this class is about twice as numerous as the native illiterate. The proportion of pupils to the whole population has largely increased in the several sections, but most in the South and Southwest. The advance has been from 13 to 20 per cent. But, in consequence of the influx of foreigners, the number over twenty years of age who can not read and write has increased in every section, and for the whole Union it has gone up to 5.03 per cent. from 3.77. The Colleges, Theological, Medical, and Law Schools are reported at 215, and the students at 18,733.

STATISTICS OF THE PRESS.

There are 2526 Newspapers in the United States, and they circulate annually about 500,000,000 of copies. 855 of them are reported as Whig; 742 Democratic; Literary and miscellaneous, 568; Religious, 191; Scientific, 58. In 1810, we had 359 newspapers; in 1828, 852; in 1840, 1631. The proportion to every 100,000 persons in 1810 was 6.1; in 1850, 12.9. The ratio of political papers to each person is, in New England, 16.88; Middle States, 16.80; Southern, 6.18; Southwestern, 8.66; Northwestern and Territories, 6.92; for the Union, 11.35. But these estimates, as representing sections, must be taken with caution, as the Northern papers circulate largely in every part of the country. About $15,000,000 are expended upon the newspapers press; and if the whole issue for one year be estimated, it would cover a surface of 100 square miles, or form a belt, thirty feet wide, around the earth.

PAUPERS.

The whole number of paupers, supported in whole or in part in the different States, within the year ending June 1, 1850, is—native, 66,434; foreign, 68,588; total, 134,972. The annual cost of support is nearly $3,000,000.

PRISONS AND PENITENTIARIES.

The whole number of white persons confined is set down at 4758. Nearly one-third of these are foreigners. Colored and slaves are reported at 888. Total, 5646. For every 10,000 native whites, there are nearly two in prison; for every 10,000 foreign whites, there are over six; for every 10,000 native and foreign white, there are between two and three in confinement. In the Slaveholding States, thirteen free colored in every 10,000 are in prison; in the Non-Slaveholding, 28.

GROWTH OF OUR CITIES.

The increase of Charleston for 30 years was, in 1850, 73 per cent.; Savannah, 102; Baltimore, 169; Philadelphia, 198; Boston, 221; New York, 316; New Orleans, 328; Louisville, 976; Cincinnati, 1097. For about the same period, Paris had increased 47 per cent.; London, 91; and Berlin, 134. The native and foreign-born free population of some of the cities is as follows: Baltimore, native, 130,491; foreign, 85,492. Boston, native, 88,948; foreign, 46,677. Charleston, native, 17,809; foreign, 4648. Chicago, native, 13,693; foreign, 15,682. Cincinnati, native, 60,558; foreign, 54,541. New Orleans, native, 50,470; foreign, 48,601. New York, native, 277,752; foreign, 235,738.

TASTE IN NAMES.

Americans are famous for names. There are, among cities, towns, townships, and the like, 26 places called Adams; 9 Addison; 8 Albion; 9 Albany; 9 Alexandria; 8 Allen; 13 Athens; 14 Auburn; 7 Avon; 9 Bath; 11 Beaver; 12 Bedford; 22 Benton; 17 Berlin; 18 Bethel, and 10 Bethlehem; 19 Bloomfield; 9 Boone; 14 Bristol; 12 Brooklyn; 19 Brown; 12 Buffalo; 18 Burlington; 17 Butler; 15 Camden; 11 Canaan; 14 Canton; 11 Carroll; 11 Cass; 47 Centre; 32 Clay; 31 Clinton; 19 Columbia; 22 Concord; 7 Crawford; 13 Decatur; 15 Deerfield; 21 Dover; 12 Eagle; 10 Eden; 24 Fairfield; 8 Fayette; 85 FRANKLIN; 11 Fulton; 15 Goshen; 26 Green; 18 Greene; 20 Hamilton; 20 Hanover; 57 HARRISON; 123 JACKSON; 74 JEFFERSON; 22 Lafayette; 18 Lexington; 64 LIBERTY; 47 MADISON; 43 MARION; 57 MONROE; 17 Montgomery; 14 Newport; 16 Newton; 20 Orange; 67 PERRY; 18 Pike; 14 Penn; 15 Porter; 45 Richland; 13 Rome; 38 Salem; 15 Scott; 41 Springfield; 25 Troy; 113 UNION; 28 VAN BUREN; 28 Warren; 188 WASHINGTON.

OUR OCCUPATIONS.

The returns of the census for 1850 show, that for every 1000 free males in the United States, there are 514 engaged in some occupation. If we deduct one-third in each 1000 as being of ages unsuitable for business, it will give a large proportion who have regular employment. Our pursuits are diversified. The number of agriculturists is large. If we take the free male population over fifteen years of age, who are employed, it would seem that 44 per cent. are connected with the cultivation of the soil. In 1820, there were 190 in every 1000, who were devoted to agriculture; in 1840, there were 217. The estimate for 1850 is on a different basis, and hence is useless for comparison. Looking, however, at the facts presented, we see that it is a popular branch of industry and that our people are fond of rural life. It would seem, indeed, as if the great garden of America had been brought into the service of man just at the time when its amazing fertility was most needed. Nor are we only benefited. Wherever men are emerging from the lower stages of civilization, the agriculture of our country aids their progress, for it is ready to supply their physical wants and promote their comfort. Our manufacturing, mining, and mechanical industry is also extending rapidly. Taking the exports of our manufactures alone, we find that in 1821 they amounted to over $2,000,000, while in 1853 they were nearly $23,000,000.

American Labor is just now entering on its wonderful career. One of its chief aims hitherto has been to supply machinery to meet its wants, and it has, in a considerable degree, succeeded. Automatic action has been made to do the work of numbers, and machines have multiplied fingers. The intelligent foreigners who visit our establishments, notice our inventions for making seamless grain-bags, ladies' hair-pins, button-shanks; for manufacturing wood and stone; for turning out clocks and revolvers by the hundred, as well as many other substitutes for muscular toil. If our industry is not yet divided into its distinct departments, with those minor subdivisions that are so essential to perfect skill, there is much in our system to encourage versatile talent, and to improve individual character. We are laboring to liberate the workman from the degradation of drudgery, and to elevate his position. This spirit animates the American mechanic. It inspires the humblest artisan; and hence he is ever anxious for his personal freedom from every sort of service that machinery may be employed to execute. The idea of manhood is a growing idea with his class, and every facility that will tend to improve his circumstances is eagerly sought and cherished. For he feels that something else is before him; that life is rich in means and opportunities; that society presents no barrier to his progress; and consequently he has a quick mind to invent, and a ready hand to embrace whatever will make labor more productive, and enterprise more successful.

Accepting the statistics as indications of the respective branches of active life, which they represent, we may derive from them some reflections of practical as well as of speculative interest. The first point that we notice, is the increase of persons in "ALL OCCUPATIONS." The proportion can not be accurately ascertained, but it is sufficiently clear that the tendency to industrial pursuits is becoming greater. We think that this opinion is fairly borne out by circumstantial reasoning. Any one who has noticed the progress of American sentiments, has not failed to observe that there has recently been a much more full, earnest, intelligent discussion of the dignity of human labor than ever before. As a fundamental law of life, as a divine institution, as a necessary component in our probationary state, it has been most admirably expounded in the pulpit, as well as elaborately treated in the popular forms of instruction. Its relation to Political Economy has long been argued. But of late years it has been considered on higher grounds. Labor has been shown to be a noble discipline, a means to form character, promote virtue, secure happiness. The wisest thinkers of the age have rejoiced to urge its claims as something more than a simple provision for food and raiment. Raising it above mere earthly aspects, and investing it with those moral interests that belong to the permanent being of our spiritual nature, they have demonstrated its fitness to elevate mankind, and prepare it to discharge the duties that revelation enforced. On no subject has there been a greater degree of valuable truth uttered. Among the foremost topics of the day, we recollect not one that has kindled a warmer glow in philanthropic hearts, or been more eloquently pressed on the meditative mind of the world. How much that was hidden to the eyes of former generations, or, if not hidden, was scarcely appreciated, has been brought forth into clear, intense light! What arguments have been found in the absolute wants of our immortal existence, in the brotherhood of the race, in the doctrines of Christianity, in its behalf! Viewed in certain connections, it must, indeed, be regarded as a curse; but false is that philosophy, and sullen that piety which contemplates it in no other bearing. The whole machinery of Providence, the example of Christ himself, prove that it has been adopted into the redeeming scheme of mercy, and that its office is now to combine with other instruments in exalting man to his lost position in the universe. Labor may look up to the heavens and be glad. Thorns and thistles may pierce its feet, but flowers bloom for its brow, and fruits ripen for its hand.

The literature of labor is an expression of modern intellect. It is a late growth, and, to a considerable extent, the product of our free institutions. If our republicanism had ended with a political system, its most important benefits would have been denied us. The greatest blessing of liberty is that it enables man to work out his destiny in humble obedience to the ordinations of infinite wisdom. Of what avail would our magnificent birth-right be—our ancestral honors—our franchise and sovereignty—if the unfettered limb and the fearless mind were to rest in the impotence of idleness? Our freedom is but a means for a vast end. Its opportunities for achieving a victory over the rude forces of nature, creating wealth, diffusing trade, improving social relations, and perfecting moral power, are its richest gifts. And hence nothing is more in accordance with our condition than a literature of labor. If the intelligence of this country were competent to originate a new form of government, placing man on equal footing with his fellows, and acknowledging his inherent claims to all the rights with which the Creator has endowed him, what more natural than that this same intelligence should cover the whole ground of his interests, stimulate energy, encourage invention, honor industry, and make the fresh Continent of the West a palace for the coronation of labor? It is labor that has written the strongest and soundest exposition of our national creed. It is this that has given the profoundest interpretation to our bill of rights, and presented a commentary on our Constitution that none can controvert. There is a logic in the simple spectacle which our country exhibits, that can not be resisted. It is not the language of books or art. Argument is not needed to strengthen, nor eloquence to animate it. The voice of nature speaks it in her own sublime images; and wherever it is heard, there is a benediction in its utterance to cheer the hope, and gladden the heart of all mankind.

The next point worthy of attention is the great increase in those departments of labor which require more than a common degree of intelligence and skill. Commerce, manufactures, and mining, included in one division, show that the proportion of persons connected with them has been advancing. Various reasons may be assigned for this change. The fixed capital of a country, created at first by the profits of agriculture, and the trade resulting from it, seeks investment in those arts of industry which furnish the implements of husbandry, the tools of the mechanic, and the textile fabrics used for clothing. As society progresses, the demand for manufactured articles increases. A greater proportion of persons becomes necessary to convert raw materials into such objects as a high state of civilization requires, and to carry on the operations of commerce in facilitating the interchange of products. The profit of the manufacturing, mining, and mechanic arts, estimated at 43 per cent., naturally offers inducements to this sort of investment, and hence the advance has been rapid in these branches of industry. But again, the vast influx of foreign population has tended to elevate the occupations of our native working classes, by relieving them of the humbler forms of labor, and making it their interest to cultivate those departments of industrial life which are dependent on tact, intelligence, and enterprise. Our circumstances have singularly contributed to enhance the value of American skill. A premium has been set on mind. There is nothing in the history of the modern world more striking than the fact, that just as our common schools and other modes of popular instruction had prepared the intellect of the masses for the most thorough and valuable service in the important walks of industry, it should have found such a broad opening in them for all its talent and activity. It is here that the advantages of education are so apparent. American operatives and mechanics are intellectual agents, and not wheels and pulleys in human shape. The worth of their labor is consequently enhanced. Resources are in their hands that belong to no corresponding class in any other country. Where thought is money, as it certainly is in the United States, the condition of the working classes leaves nothing to be desired; for it puts every kind of improvement within their reach, and leaves them to be the architects of their own fortunes.

Nor are the triumphs of American labor the only lessons of this attractive volume of statistics. Far from it. If these facts, detailing our past progress and present prospects, could be changed into pictures; if a panorama of the census could be made; who would not wish its broadest space and most glowing colors to be reserved for those scenes that would represent the gigantic steam-press—the district school-house—the Sabbath sanctuary—the happy homes of this free land? Europe may justly boast of her splendid monuments of art. The magnificence of the past is fixed in her carved stone and polished marble; but where has she a stature that breathes forth its music beneath the rising sun of the world? And yet, every heart in this chosen country is filled with the inspiration of the future; every hand is a ministry in its service; and every voice is ready with the exultant strains of its eloquence, or the loudest swell of its music, to celebrate the glories which it will bring to redeemed humanity.

THE ZONE OF PLANETS BETWEEN MARS AND JUPITER.

BY ELIAS LOOMIS, LL.D.

SEVENTY-FIVE years since, the only planets known to men of science were the same which were known to the Chaldean shepherds thousands of years ago. Between the orbit of Mars and that of Jupiter, there occurs an interval of no less than 350 millions of miles, in which no planet was known to exist before the commencement of the present century. Nearly three centuries ago, Kepler had pointed out something like a regular progression in the distances of the planets as far as Mars, which was broken in the case of Jupiter. Having despaired of reconciling the actual state of the planetary system with any theory he could form respecting it, he hazarded the conjecture that a planet really existed between the orbits of Mars and Jupiter, and that its smallness alone prevented it from being visible to astronomers. The remarkable passage containing this conjecture is found in his Prodromus, and is as follows: "When this plan, therefore, failed, I tried to reach my aim in another way of, I must confess, singular boldness. Between Jupiter and Mars I interposed a new planet, and another also between Venus and Mercury, both which it is possible are not visible on account of their minuteness, and I assigned to them their respective periods. In this way I thought that I might in some degree equalize their ratios, which ratios regularly diminished toward the sun, and enlarged toward the fixed stars."

But Kepler himself soon rejected this idea as improbable, and it does not appear to have received any favor from the astronomers of that time.

An astronomer of Florence, by the name of Sizzi, maintained that as there were only seven apertures in the head—two eyes, two ears, two nostrils, and one mouth—and as there were only seven metals and seven days in the week, so there could be only seven planets. These seven planets, according to the ancient systems of astronomy, were Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, the Sun, Venus, Mercury, and the Moon.

In 1772, Bode published a treatise on Astronomy, in which he first announced the singular relation between the mean distances of the planets from the sun, which has since been distinguished by his name. This famous law may be thus stated. If we set down the number four several times in a row, and to the second 4 add 3, to the third 4 add twice 3 or 6, to the next 4 add twice 6 or 12, and so on, as in the following Table, the resulting numbers will represent nearly the relative distances of the planets from the sun :

| | | | | | | |
|---|---|----|----|----|----|-----|
| 4 | 3 | 6 | 12 | 24 | 48 | 96 |
| 4 | 7 | 10 | 16 | 25 | 50 | 100 |

If the distance of the Earth from the Sun be called 10, then 4 will represent nearly the distance of Mercury; 7 that of Venus; 16 that of Mars; 52 that of Jupiter; and 100 that of Saturn. This law exhibited in a striking light the abrupt leap from Mars to Jupiter, and suggested the probability of a planet revolving in the intermediate region. This conjecture was rendered still more plausible by the discovery, in 1781, of the planet Uranus, whose distance from the sun was found to conform nearly with the law of Bode. In Germany, especially, a strong impression had been produced that a planet really existed between Mars and Jupiter, and the Baron de Zach went so far as to calculate, in 1784-5, the orbit of the ideal planet, the elements of which he published in the Berlin Almanac for 1789. In 1800, six astronomers, of whom the Baron was one, assembled at Lillienthal and formed an association of twenty-four observers, having for its object to effect the discovery of the unseen body. For this purpose the zodiac was divided into twenty-four zones, one of which was to be explored by each astronomer; and the conduct of the whole operation was placed under the superintendence of Schröter. Soon after the formation of this society, the planet was discovered, but not by any of those astronomers who were engaged expressly in searching for it. Piazzi, the celebrated Italian astronomer, while engaged in constructing his great catalogue of stars, was induced carefully to examine, several nights in succession, a part of the constellation Taurus, in which Wollaston, by mistake, had assigned the position of a star which did not really exist. On the 1st of January, 1801, Piazzi observed a small star, which on the following evening appeared to have changed its place. On the 3d he repeated his observations, and he now felt assured that the star had a retrograde motion in the zodiac. On the 24th of January he transmitted an account of his discovery to Oriani and Bode, communicating the position of the star on the 3d and 23d of that month. He continued to observe the star until the 11th of February, when he was seized with a dangerous illness which completely interrupted his labors. His letters to Oriani and Bode did not reach those astronomers until the latter end of March, at which time the planet had approached too near the sun to admit of further observations, and it was necessary for this purpose to wait until the month of September, when the planet would have extricated itself from the solar rays. Its re-discovery, after the lapse of so considerable a period subsequent to the most recent observation, could not be accomplished without a pretty accurate knowledge of the orbit in which it was moving; but the data communicated by Piazzi were insufficient for this purpose. After some delay, he communicated to astronomers all the observations made by himself down to the end of February. Professor Gauss found that they might all be satisfied within a few seconds by an elliptic orbit, of which he calculated the elements; and with the view of aiding astronomers in searching for the planet, he computed an ephemeris of its motion for several months. The planet was finally discovered by De Zach on the 31st of December, and by Olbers on the following evening. Piazzi conferred on it the name of Ceres, in allusion to the titular goddess of Sicily, the island in which it was discovered; and the sickle has been appropriately chosen for its symbol of designation.

The mean distance of Ceres, as determined by the calculations of Gauss, was 2.767. The distance assigned by Bode's law was 2.8. In this respect, therefore, the newly-discovered planet harmonized with the other bodies of the system to which it belonged. The new planet was, however, excessively minute; its diameter, according to Herschel's measurements, amounting to only 161 miles. Its inclination to the ecliptic exceeded ten degrees, and consequently it deviated from that plane more than either of the older planets.

The discovery of Piazzi was soon followed by another of a similar nature. Dr. Olbers, while engaged in searching for Ceres, had studied with minute attention the various configurations of all the small stars lying near her path. On the 28th of March, 1802, after observing the planet, he swept over the north wing of Virgo with an instrument termed a "Comet Seeker," and was astonished to find a star of the seventh magnitude, forming an equilateral triangle with two other small stars, whose positions were given in Bode's catalogue, where he was certain no star was visible in January and February preceding. In the course of less than three hours he found the right ascension had diminished and the north declination increased. On the following evening, as soon as the twilight permitted, he looked again for his star; it no longer formed an equilateral triangle with the stars above-mentioned, but had moved considerably in the direction indicated by the preceding night's observations. On the 30th, after again observing the planet, Dr. Olbers wrote to Bode at Berlin, and to Baron de Zach, giving an account of his discovery. "What a singular accident," he exclaims, "was it by which I found this stranger nearly in the same place where I had observed Ceres on the 1st of January!" The elements of the orbit were quickly determined by Professor Gauss, who found the most remarkable peculiarity consisted in the great inclination of its plane to the ecliptic, which amounted to $34^{\circ} 36'$. The orbit was found to be an ellipse of not much greater eccentricity than that of Mercury, with a mean distance nearly the same as that of Ceres. Dr. Olbers suggested Pallas as the name for this new member of our system.

A comparison of the relative magnitudes of the planetary orbits had suggested the existence of an unknown planet, revolving between the orbits of Mars and Jupiter. Instead of one planet, however, two had been discovered. Olbers remarked that the orbits of these two bodies approached very near each other at the descending node of Pallas, and he conjectured that they might possibly be the fragments of a larger planet which had once revolved in the same region, and had been shivered in pieces by some tremendous catastrophe; and he intimated that there might be many more similar fragments which had not yet been discovered. He also inferred, that though the orbits of all these fragments might be differently inclined to the ecliptic, yet, as they all had a common origin, their orbits would have two common points of intersection, situated in opposite regions of the heavens, through which every fragment would necessarily pass in the course of each revolution. He proposed, therefore, to search carefully, every month, the northwestern part of the constellation Virgo, and the western part of the constellation of the Whale, being the two opposite regions in which the orbits of Ceres and Pallas were found to intersect each other. Meanwhile the discovery of a third planet tended to confirm the truth of his hypothesis, and to encourage him in his arduous undertaking.

Professor Harding, of Lillienthal, undertook to construct a series of charts upon which should be represented the positions of all the small stars lying near the paths of Ceres and Pallas, with a view to assist the identification of these minute bodies. On the 1st of September, 1804, while engaged in exploring the heavens for this purpose, he perceived a small star in the constellation Pisces, very near to that part of the constellation of the Whale through which Olbers had asserted that the fragments of the shattered planet would be sure to pass. On the evening of the 4th he re-examined the neighborhood, and found that the star had changed its place. On the 5th and 6th, he observed it more accurately, and finding that the positions deduced from his observations confirmed the motion indicated by the estimates on September 1st and 4th, he announced the discovery to Dr. Olbers, at Bremen, on the 7th, who saw it the same evening. Professor Harding named his planet Juno. The elements of its orbit were calculated by Gauss, who found its mean distance from the sun to coincide nearly with the mean distances of Ceres and Pallas. The eccentricity surpassed that of any other member of the planetary system. Like Ceres and Pallas, it is remarkable for its extreme smallness. Herschel was unable to pronounce with certainty that its diameter exhibited any sensible magnitude.

Stimulated by the discovery of Juno, Olbers continued with unremitting assiduity to explore the two opposite regions of the heavens through which he conceived the fragments of the shattered planet must pass. At length, after he had been engaged nearly three years in this laborious pursuit, his perseverance was crowned with success. On the evening of the 29th of March, 1807, while occupied in sweeping over the north wing of Virgo, he discovered an object shining like a star of the sixth or seventh magnitude, which he concluded at once to be a planet, inasmuch as the previous examination of the vicinity had indicated no star in the position of the stranger. On the same evening he satisfied himself that it was really in motion, and continuing his observations until the 2d of April, he obtained sufficient evidence to justify the public announcement of his discovery of another new planet. Accordingly, on the following day he wrote to Professor Bode of Berlin, and to Baron de Zach of Gotha, and particularly mentioned that his second discovery was not the result of accident, but of a systematic search for a body of this nature. The elements of the orbit were determined by Gauss, who executed the calculations required for this purpose within ten hours after he obtained possession of the observations. The planet was found to revolve in the same region with Ceres, Pallas, and Juno, its mean distance from the sun being somewhat less than that of either of those bodies. At the request of Dr. Olbers, Gauss consented to name the planet, and decided upon Vesta, the symbol of designation being the altar on which burned the sacred fire in honor of the goddess. This planet is even smaller than either of the three others previously discovered, but it is remarkable for the brilliancy of its light. Near her opposition to the sun, a person with good sight may often distinguish her without a telescope.

Dr. Olbers continued his systematic examinations of the small stars in Virgo and Cetus, between the years 1808 and 1816, and was so closely on the watch for any moving body, that he considered it very improbable a planet could have passed through either of these regions in the interval, without being detected. No further discovery being made, the plan was relinquished in 1816.

In 1825, a fresh impulse was given to researches of this nature, by the resolution of the Berlin Academy of Sciences to procure the construction of a series of charts representing the positions of all the stars, down to the ninth magnitude, in a zone of the heavens extending fifteen degrees on each side of the equator. Only about two-thirds of the charts contemplated in this great undertaking have yet been executed.

About the year 1830, M. Hencke, an amateur astronomer of Driessen, in Germany, commenced a careful survey of the zone of the heavens comprised within the charts published by the Academy of Berlin. He extended those maps by the insertion of smaller stars, and made himself well acquainted with their various configurations. After fifteen years his perseverance met with its due reward. On the 8th of December, 1845, while engaged in comparing the map of the fourth hour of right ascension with the heavens, he noticed what appeared to be a star of the ninth magnitude, between two others of the same brightness in Taurus, which had not been noted in his previous examinations. Without waiting for any further observations, M. Hencke wrote to Professors Encke and Schumacher, stating his reasons for supposing that he had detected a new planet. On the 14th of December the Berlin astronomers found the stranger in a position where no star was marked on the corresponding chart of the Academy, and the motion was easily perceived the same evening. On this occasion the elements of the orbit were rapidly determined, not by Gauss individually, as on previous occasions of a similar kind, but by a host of young astronomers throughout Europe, who had become familiar with the methods of that illustrious master. The results of their calculations showed the body to be one of the family of asteroids. M. Hencke requested Professor Encke to name his new planet, and the Professor conferred on it the appellation of Astræa.

Encouraged by his success, M. Hencke continued his search for planetary bodies, extending and verifying the Berlin Academical charts, and by frequent comparison with the heavens acquiring an extensive knowledge of the configurations of the smaller stars in certain regions about the equator and ecliptic. On the 1st of July, 1847, while engaged in examining the seventeenth hour of right ascension; he perceived a small star, of about the ninth magnitude, which was not marked on the corresponding map of the Academy. On the 3d, he repeated his observation, and found that, during the intermediate period, its right ascension had sensibly diminished, leaving no doubt of its planetary nature. Information of the discovery was circulated by M. Hencke on the following day, and the planet was soon recognized at the principal observatories of Europe. The illustrious mathematician, Professor Gauss, was deputed by the discoverer to select a name for the stranger, and it received the name of Hebe, with a cup for the symbol, emblematic of the office of the goddess in mythology. The orbit is very eccentric, and inclined more than 14 degrees to the plane of the ecliptic.

The next two members of this remarkable group in order of discovery were found by Mr. Hind, at the observatory erected by Mr. Bishop, in the grounds of his private residence in the Regent's Park, London. So early as April, 1845, a search for planetary bodies was commenced, but in consequence of other classes of observation, no systematic plan of examination of the heavens was attempted. In November, 1846, a rigorous search was undertaken, the Berlin Academical charts being employed as far as they extend; while ecliptical charts, including stars to the tenth magnitude, were formed for other parts of the heavens, where the ecliptic passes beyond the limits of the Berlin maps. On the 13th of August, 1847, after nine months' close observation on the above system, an object resembling a star of the eighth magnitude was discovered, which was not marked on the corresponding Berlin map. Its planetary nature being immediately suspected, it was attentively observed, and in less than half an hour the motion in right ascension was detected. In the course of an hour the planet had retrograded two seconds of time, a sufficient change of place to be indubitable. An announcement of the discovery was made to astronomers generally on the following morning, and observations were soon obtained at most of the European observatories. At the suggestion of Mr. Bishop the planet was named Iris. The symbol is due to Professor Schumacher, and is composed of a semicircle representing the rainbow, with an interior star, and a base line for the horizon. Several observers have remarked decided variations in the light of this planet, which are not accounted for by change of distance from the earth and sun, and which there is strong reason to suppose are in a great measure independent of atmospheric conditions.

Continuing the plan of observation already described, Mr. Hind noticed, on the 18th of October, 1847, in the constellation Orion, a star of the eighth or ninth magnitude, which had not been previously visible in the position it then occupied. Micrometrical measures of its position, made after the lapse of about four hours from the time when he first observed it, established the existence of a proper motion, and it was immediately announced to astronomers as the eighth member of the group of small planets. At the suggestion of Sir John Herschel the new planet received the name Flora, and a flower, the "Rose of England," was chosen as the symbol. Its period of revolution is shorter than that of any other of the asteroids, being only about 1198 days. Flora, therefore, comes after Mars in order of mean distance from the sun, and approaches nearer to the earth than the rest of the group to which she belongs. The planet is somewhat ruddy, but without any hazy appearance, such as might be supposed to arise from an extensive atmosphere.

In the year 1848 another member of this interesting group was brought to light by Mr. Graham, at the private observatory of Markree Castle, Ireland, under the direction of Mr. Cooper. Having formed a chart of the stars near the equator, in the 14th hour of right ascension, on a more extended scale than that of the Berlin charts, he remarked, on the 25th of April, a star of the tenth magnitude in a position where none had been visible before, and noted it down for re-examination. On the following evening this object was found to have retrograded one minute, thus leaving no doubt of its planetary nature. On the 27th the discovery was announced to several astronomers in England and on the Continent, and soon became generally known through the circulars issued by Professor Schumacher. The name selected for this planet is Metis, with an eye and star for a symbol. This planet is remarkable for the near coincidence of its mean motion with that of Iris, the difference of their periodic times, according to the most recent calculations, amounting to less than one day.

On the 12th of April, 1849, Dr. Annibal de Gasparis, assistant astronomer at the Royal Observatory at Naples, while comparing the Berlin chart for the twelfth hour of right ascension with the heavens, perceived a star of between the ninth and tenth magnitude, in a position which he had found vacant at previous examinations of this region. Unfavorable weather interrupted his observations for that evening, but on the 14th he ascertained that it had sensibly changed its place, and was therefore a new planet. Professor Capocci, Director of the Neapolitan Observatory, named the planet Hygeia. The mean distance of this planet from the sun is, with perhaps a single exception, greater than that of any other known member of this group, corresponding to a revolution in 2041 days.

On the occasion of the discovery of Hygeia, Sir John Herschel had suggested that Parthenope would be a very appropriate name to commemorate the site of the discovery; the nymph having given her name to the city now called Naples. Signor de Gasparis states that he used his utmost exertions to realize for Sir John Herschel a Parthenope in the heavens, and his endeavors were crowned with success on the 11th of May, 1850. This new planet appeared like a star of the ninth magnitude.

On the evening of September 13, 1850, Mr. Hind noticed a star of the eighth magnitude in the constellation Pegasus, near another small one frequently examined on previous occasions, without any mention being made of its bright neighbor. Its peculiar bluish light satisfied him at once as to its planetary nature, and the micrometer was introduced to ascertain the difference of right ascension between the two objects, and to obtain conclusive proof of the discovery of a new planet. In less than an hour the brighter star had moved westward about two seconds of time, so that no doubt could be entertained in respect to its nature and position in the solar system. Mr. Hind selected for this planet the name Victoria, with a star and laurel-branch for its symbol. In case, however, this name should be considered objectionable, he proposed that of Clio, which name has been generally preferred by American astronomers.

Remarkable changes of brilliancy in this body have been noticed at the Washington Observatory. On the night of November 4, 1850, the planet appeared of the tenth magnitude. On the succeeding night it had diminished to the twelfth magnitude, while the star of comparison exhibited no perceptible change. Differences to a greater amount were observed between the 22d and 25th of February, 1851. On the nights of the 1st and 2d of March, 1851, it appeared as a star of the twelfth magnitude, and was observed without difficulty; the star of comparison being near, and of about the same magnitude. On the night of the 3d, Clio could barely be observed with the faintest illumination, while the same star of comparison used on the nights of the 1st and 2d appeared as before. On the night of the 4th, the planet appeared even more brilliant than it did on the nights of the 1st and 2d instant. These changes seem to suggest the probability that the light is reflected with unequal intensity from different sides of this asteroid. Similar differences of magnitude in the other asteroids have been noticed, particularly in Astræa.

The discovery of Victoria was soon followed by that of another asteroid by Dr. Annibal de Gasparis, at the Royal Observatory, Naples. In this case, a star map was not the means of discovering the planet, but its existence was indicated by a series of observations in zones of declination which had been undertaken for the express purpose of finding new planets. On the 2d of November, 1850, Dr. Gasparis met with the thirteenth asteroid in the constellation Cetus. It was sensibly fainter than stars of the ninth magnitude. M. Le Verrier, to whom was delegated the right of naming this planet, proposed Egeria, the counselor of Numa Pompilius. The orbit is more inclined to the plane of the ecliptic than that of most of the other planets.

The next member of the group of small planets in the order of discovery, was found by Mr. Hind in the constellation Scorpio, on the 19th of May, 1851, and four days later by Dr. Gasparis, at Naples. It appeared like a star of between the eighth and ninth magnitudes, with a full blue light, and seemed to be surrounded by a faint nebulous envelope or atmosphere, which could not be perceived about stars of equal brightness. The nature of this object was satisfactorily established within half an hour from the first glimpse of it on the 19th of May; repeated examinations of the vicinity on previous occasions having indicated no star in the position of the stranger. At the recommendation of Sir John Herschel the new planet was named Irene, in allusion to the peace prevailing at that time in Europe; the symbol proposed being a dove with an olive-branch and star on its head.

On the night of July 29, 1851, another small planet was discovered by Dr. Gasparis, at Naples, in the course of his zone observations, commenced with an especial view to the discovery of new planets. It shone as a fine star of the ninth magnitude; but owing to its low situation in the heavens, was not so generally observed during its first apparition as some of the other newly-discovered bodies. Dr. Gasparis named his planet Eunomia, who in classical mythology was one of the Seasons, a sister of Irene.

On the 17th of March, 1852, M. de Gasparis, at Naples, discovered another small planet near the bright star Regulus. It appeared like a small star of the tenth or eleventh magnitude, and has received the name of Psyche. Mr. Hind, of London, narrowly missed the honor of being the first discoverer of this body. On the 29th of January preceding, he entered upon his chart a star of the eleventh magnitude in the place where, according to subsequent computations, this planet ought to have been. The chart was immediately sent to the engraver, and not returned until March 18; but on the evening of that day he discovered that the above star was missing. He immediately commenced a search for the planet, and actually recorded it again on the 20th as a fixed star, but moonlight and unfavorable weather prevented him from establishing its planetary nature before he received the announcement of Dr. Gasparis' discovery.

On the 17th of April, 1852, another planet was discovered near Flora by Mr. R. Luther, at the Observatory of Bilk, near Düsseldorf. Professor Argelander, of Bonn, proposed for this planet the name of Thetis, which name was accepted by the discoverer, and has been adopted by astronomers.

On the 25th of June, 1852, Mr. Hind, at London, discovered another planet, having the appearance of a star of the ninth magnitude, and of a yellowish light. Mr. Airy, the Astronomer Royal, having been requested by Mr. Bishop to select a name for this planet, proposed to call it Melpomene. It is one of the nearest of the group of asteroids, making its revolution in about 1269 days.

On the 22d of August, 1852, Mr. Hind discovered another planet not far from the ecliptic in the constellation Aquarius. It appeared like a star of the ninth magnitude, and exhibited the same yellowish color which was remarked about Melpomene. Mr. Hind having been requested by Mr. Bishop to find a name for this planet, proposed to call it Fortuna.

The next planet was independently discovered by Professor de Gasparis on September 19th, and by M. Chacornac, assistant to M. Valz, at Marseilles, on the 20th of the same month. M. Chacornac was occupied in completing some ecliptic charts of the stars according to a plan adopted by Professor Valz in 1847, and on the night of September 20, he remarked a star of the ninth magnitude in a position where none had been seen before. M. Valz proposed the name Massilia for this object, in which Professor de Gasparis, who had a prior claim to the discovery, appears to have concurred. The inclination of its orbit to the ecliptic is less than that of any other known planet, Uranus not excepted.

On the 15th of November, 1852, another planet was discovered, at Paris, by M. Hermann Goldschmidt, a historical painter, residing in that city. M. Arago proposed to call it Lutetia. It resembled a star of the ninth or tenth magnitude.

On the night following the last discovery (November 16th), Mr. Hind, of London, detected a new planet with the assistance of one of the ecliptical star-maps at present in course of publication from Mr. Bishop's observatory. It was not much over the tenth magnitude, which is rather beyond the limit of the Berlin charts. Mr. J. C. Adams, President of the Astronomical Society of London, being requested to name the planet, proposed to call it Calliope.

On the 15th of December, 1852, another planet was detected by Mr. Hind. It had a pale bluish light, and resembled a star of the tenth or eleventh magnitude, and being not very far from perihelion, is probably one of the faintest members of the group. Mr. Bishop, at the request of Mr. Hind, has selected for this planet the name Thalia.

Thus within a period of nine months were discovered eight small planets belonging to the group between Mars and Jupiter, and four of them were discovered by Mr. Hind, of London, a fact altogether without precedent in the history of Astronomy—a result not of accident but of a systematic and persevering survey of the heavens.

On the 5th of April, 1853, Professor de Gasparis discovered in the constellation Leo, a very minute object, estimated as not brighter than a star of the twelfth magnitude, which on the following evening he recognized as a new planet in consequence of its proper motion. This discovery was ascribed to the circumstance that on the 5th of April, 1851, very near to the place where this planet was found, he had observed a star of the twelfth magnitude, which had subsequently vanished; for which reason he was led to examine the neighboring stars with unusual care. Professor Secchi having been invited by Professor de Gasparis to select a name for this planet, proposed the name of Themis; the same which Professor de Gasparis had originally proposed for Massilia. The mean distance of Themis from the sun is greater than that of any other known asteroid excepting Hygeia, corresponding to a period of 2038 days.

On the night after the preceding discovery, April 6th, M. Chacornac, at Marseilles, discovered another small planet. It appeared of a bluish tint, and of the size of a star of the ninth magnitude. M. Valz proposed to call this planet Phocæa, Marseilles having been founded by a colony from Phocæa.

On the 5th of May, 1853, Mr. R. Luther, director of the observatory at Bilk, near Düsseldorf, discovered a new planet like a star of the eleventh magnitude. This planet was christened by the celebrated Baron von Humboldt, who selected for it the name of Proserpina, with the symbol of a pomegranate and a star in its centre.

On the 8th of November, 1853, Mr. Hind discovered another planet within the limits of his ecliptical chart for the third hour of right ascension. It was as bright as stars of the ninth magnitude, and its light appeared remarkably blue. This planet has received the name of Euterpe.

On the 1st of March, 1854, Mr. R. Luther of Bilk, near Düsseldorf, discovered another planet. It appeared like a star of the tenth magnitude, and has received from Professor Encke the name Bellona; the symbol proposed being a whip and a lance.

On the same night as the preceding, but about two hours later, Mr. Albert Marth, at the Regent's Park Observatory in London, discovered another planet near Spica Virginis. It appeared like a star of the tenth or eleventh magnitude, and Mr. Bishop has proposed for it the name Amphitrite. On the 2d of March the same object was independently discovered at the Radcliffe Observatory, Oxford, England, by Mr. Pogson; and on the third of March it was discovered independently by M. Chacornac, assistant observer at the Observatory of Paris. The same impression of the Times contained two independent communications from Mr. Hind of London, and Mr. Johnson of Oxford, each containing the announcement of this discovery. Also on the 4th of February, at Marseilles, M. Chacornac noted a star of the tenth magnitude which is now wanting in that place, and which is shown to have been the body first recognised as a planet by Mr. Marth.

On the 22d of July, 1854, the thirtieth asteroid was discovered by Mr. Hind at Mr. Bishop's observatory in Regent's Park, London. It appeared like a star between the ninth and tenth magnitude. Professor de Morgan, who was requested by Mr. Bishop to find a name for this planet, has recommended Uranus.

On the 1st of September, 1854, the thirty-first asteroid was discovered at the Washington Observatory, by Mr. James Ferguson. It was situated near Egeria, and nearly equaled it in brightness. Mr. Ferguson has been employed for several years with the great equatorial telescope at Washington, and has spent a large portion of his time in observing the places of the newly-discovered asteroids. This is the only instance in which any American astronomer has been the first discoverer of a primary planet. Mr. Bond, of Cambridge, was the first discoverer of the faint satellite of Saturn, and several American astronomers have enjoyed the honor of having first discovered a comet. The honor of naming this new planet was left to Mr. Ferguson, and he has selected the name of Euphrosyne.

On the 28th of October, 1854, two new asteroids were discovered at Paris, one of them by Mr. Goldschmidt, the other by M. Chacornac. The former appeared as a star of somewhat less than the tenth magnitude, and has been named Pomona; the latter was somewhat smaller than a star of the ninth magnitude, and has been named Polymnia.

On reviewing the preceding sketch, we find that Mr. Hind, of London, has been the first discoverer of ten asteroids; M. de Gasparis of seven; Mr. Luther of three; while Olbers, Hencke, Chacornac, and Goldschmidt have each discovered two. We also see that, in several instances, the same asteroid has been independently discovered by more than one astronomer. Among all the astronomers of the present or any former age, Mr. Hind stands pre-eminent for his success in the discovery of new planetary bodies. These discoveries were all made at the private observatory of George Bishop, Esq., which was erected in the year 1836, in Regent's Park, London. The principal instrument of this observatory is an equatorial telescope, constructed by Mr. Dollond, of London, and equipped on the plan known as the English mounting. The solar focus of the telescope is ten feet ten inches, and the clear aperture of the object-glass seven inches. The circles are three feet in diameter; the hour circle reading by verniers to single seconds of time, and the declination circle to ten seconds of arc. The instrument is driven by clock-work; this part of the machinery in particular being very elaborately worked. The telescope is provided with a series of magnifying powers up to 1200.

In the year 1844, Mr. Bishop secured the services of J. R. Hind, Esq., then an assistant in the magnetical department of the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, where he had already distinguished himself by the zeal and ability with which, in addition to his ordinary duties, which were severe, he devoted himself to the labor of observing comets, and calculating the elements of their orbits.

Almost from the time of Mr. Hind's appointment, the observations took that character for which his talents peculiarly fitted him, viz., the search of the heavens for new comets, planets, etc. His labors were almost immediately rewarded with success. Two comets were discovered in 1846, and another in 1847, the latter of which became visible at noonday, when near its perihelion, and for which the King of Denmark's gold medal was awarded.

The search after small planets lying between Mars and Jupiter was still more successful. His plan for detecting them was to observe and map all the stars down to the eleventh magnitude for several degrees on each side of the ecliptic, and then by a subsequent observation noting whether any of them seemed to have changed its place, this being the only planetary characteristic observable. For the discoveries of Iris and Flora in 1847, a prize on the Lalande foundation was received from the Academy of Sciences at Paris in April, 1850; and in February, 1853, he received the gold medal of the Royal Astronomical Society of London for his numerous astronomical discoveries, and in particular for his discovery of eight small planets.

The rapid discovery of twenty-nine new asteroids, after a barren interval of almost forty years from the discovery of Vesta, is calculated to excite surprise; but it is explained by the diminutive size of the new planets, and the great increase in the number of observers, as well as the use of more powerful instruments. Vesta appears like a star of the sixth magnitude, Pallas of the seventh, while Ceres and Juno are of the eighth. Of the twenty-seven asteroids more recently discovered, none of them, if we except perhaps Iris and Flora, are larger than the ninth magnitude, while several are as small as the tenth, and one or two scarcely, if ever, rise as high as the tenth magnitude. The reason that Olbers was not more successful in his search was, that he employed a telescope of too feeble power, and did not extend his examination beyond stars of the eighth magnitude.

Some may conclude that the number of asteroids now known is so great, that the discovery of additional ones is a matter of no interest, and is unworthy the attention of astronomers. We regard the question in a very different light. If only one planet had hitherto been discovered between Mars and Jupiter, our idea of the simplicity and perfection of the solar system would have been satisfied, and there might have been found ingenious minds attempting to prove by a priori reasoning that no other planets could possibly exist, unless beyond the limits of the orbit of Neptune. But our theory of the solar system, although apparently simple, would not have been the true theory. Every new discovery shows the solar system to be more complex than we had supposed; and unless we prefer error (provided it has a show of simplicity) to truth, when it appears to our view complex, we shall value every new discovery in the solar system, because it promises to conduct us nearer to the true theory of the universe. Every new asteroid which is discovered, is a new fact to be explained. It presents a new test by which every theory is to be tried. If our theory be false, it is probable that some of these facts may be shown to be inconsistent with it. When the number of known facts is small, they may all frequently be explained by different and conflicting theories. As the number of known facts increases, some of them will probably be found inconsistent with one or other of the theories, until at last we reach a fact—the true experimentum crucis—which is inconsistent with every theory but one. Thus the true philosopher, instead of regarding the rapidly increasing number of asteroids with indifference, will watch each new discovery with growing interest, in the hope that it may furnish the key to the true theory of the solar system.

The preceding table exhibits a summary of the principal elements of thirty-one asteroids. The last two having been so recently discovered, their elements could not be included in the table. Column first shows the number of each planet in the order of its discovery; column second the name of the planet; column third shows the average distance from the sun (the distance of the earth from the sun being taken as unity); column fourth shows the number of days required to make one revolution about the sun; column fifth shows the eccentricity of the orbit, or the quantity by which it departs from the form of a circle; column sixth shows the number of degrees by which the plane of the orbit is inclined to the orbit of the earth; column seventh shows the position of the line in which the plane of the orbit intersects the orbit of the earth; and the last column shows the position of that point of the planet's orbit which is nearest the sun.

The existence of thirty-three planets revolving round the sun at distances closely allied to each other, and differing from all the other planets in their diminutive size, is one of the most singular phenomena in our solar system. This fact will appear the more striking if we draw a diagram representing the orbits of all the known planets in their proper proportions. We shall find that while the orbits of Mercury, Venus, the Earth, and Mars are quite detached from each other, and the orbits of Jupiter, Saturn, Uranus, and Neptune are separated by intervals which the imagination can with difficulty grasp, between Mars and Jupiter is a cluster of bodies whose orbits are so interlaced as to suggest the apprehension of frequent and inevitable collision.

The diagram on the following page represents the orbits of nine of these small planetary bodies, designed to be selected so as to afford a tolerable specimen of the whole. The other twenty-two orbits are omitted, to avoid the confusion of so many lines in a single diagram. In one respect this representation is calculated to convey an erroneous impression. All the orbits are represented as situated in the same plane, whereas, in reality, no two of them are situated in the same plane. These planes all pass through the sun, and are inclined to the earth's orbit in angles indicated in column sixth of the preceding Table. One-half of each orbit must therefore be below the earth's orbit, and the other half above it; and in order to indicate as fully as possible the actual position of these orbits, the portion which falls below the plane of the earth's orbit is indicated by a dotted line, while the remainder is indicated by a continuous black line. These orbits, then, do not really intersect each other as represented in the diagram. Indeed, no two of the planetary orbits intersect, although some of them approach within moderate distances of each other. The orbit of Fortuna approaches the orbit of Metis within less than the Moon's distance from the earth. The orbit of Massilia approaches almost equally near to the orbit of Astræa, and the orbit of Lutetia to that of Juno.

It is evident, then, at a glance, that these thirty-three small planets sustain to each other a relation different from that of the other members of the solar system. We see a family likeness running through the entire group, and it naturally suggests the idea of a common origin. This idea, as has been already stated, occurred to the mind of Olbers after the discovery of the second asteroid, and led to his celebrated theory that all these bodies originally constituted a single planet which had been broken into fragments by the operation of some internal force. Have we any means of testing the soundness of this theory?

If the earth should be broken into fragments by the operation of some internal force (such, for example, as that which causes the eruption of a volcano), the fragments might be projected in various directions and with very unequal velocities; but each would describe an ellipse of which the sun would occupy one of the foci—if we except the extreme but possible case of a fragment projected with such a velocity as to carry it beyond the limit of the sun's attraction. Leaving out of view the disturbance arising from the mutual attraction of the planets, which produces only minute effects, each fragment would continue to describe the same ellipse in its successive revolutions about the sun; in other words, these ellipses would all have a common point of intersection. The same conclusion must hold true for the asteroids, according to the theory of Olbers. The question then arises, have the orbits of the asteroids a common point of intersection? A single glance at the above diagram will settle this question in the negative. But Olbers replies that the orbits of the planets are disturbed by their mutual attractions. These orbits should originally have had a common point of intersection, but at each revolution they suffer a slight displacement, until, in the lapse of time, the position of the orbits has become so completely changed as to show scarcely a trace of their original intersection. Is such a result possible? A few simple considerations will satisfy us that if the orbits of the asteroids ever had a common point of intersection, such a result must have belonged to a period of time indefinitely remote.

The line in which the plane of a planet's orbit intersects some other plane selected for common reference is called technically the line of the nodes. If the asteroid orbits ever had a common point of intersection, all the nodal lines upon one of the orbits must have coincided. Now as two of the asteroid orbits are inclined less than one degree to the earth's orbit, we will, for greater convenience, employ the latter as the plane of reference. By referring to our Table on page 350, it will be seen that the ascending nodes of the asteroids are distributed, though unequally, through the four quadrants of the circle. Nine of them lie in the first quadrant, twelve in the second quadrant, six in the third, and four in the fourth. The nodes of all the planetary orbits are in constant motion, but the motion for a single year is extremely small. The annual motion of the node of Mercury is ten seconds; that of Venus twenty seconds; Mars twenty-five seconds, etc. The nodes of the asteroids, as far as the computation has been made, move at somewhat similar rates; the most rapid motion known being about fifty seconds a year. If we suppose the nodal lines of all these orbits to move steadily toward each other, it would require in some of them a motion of fifty seconds a year, continued for more than 6000 years, to bring them to a coincidence.

It should also be observed, that not only must the nodes of all the asteroids coincide, but the distance of the planets from the sun must be the same at that instant. Now the distances of these planets from the sun, when at their nodes, differ by more than a hundred millions of miles; so that to bring them all together requires something more than a change in the position of the nodes. We may bring about a coincidence, in the case of some of the asteroids, by supposing the longer diameter of the elliptic orbit to change its position in the plane of the orbit. Such a change does really take place in the case of every planetary orbit, but with none of the larger planets does it exceed twenty seconds a year. This motion for the asteroids, so far as it has been computed, is somewhat more rapid, amounting, in one instance, to seventy seconds a year; but even with this motion it would require the lapse of five thousand years to bring about an intersection in the case of many of the asteroid orbits. When now it is remembered that in order to give a common point of intersection to these thirty-one orbits all the nodal lines upon one of the orbits must coincide, and at the same instant all the distances from the sun must be equal to each other, we must be prepared to admit that such an occurrence could only have taken place myriads of years ago.

The preceding difficulties, however, are small in comparison with another which remains to be stated. The orbit of Hygeia completely incloses the orbit of Flora (and indeed several other orbits), and would still inclose them although the greater diameter of each of them were revolved through an entire circumference, since the least distance of Hygeia from the sun exceeds the greatest distance of Flora. The same is true of Themis, as compared with Flora and several other orbits. The least distance of Hygeia from the sun exceeds the greatest distance of Flora by more than twenty-five millions of miles. In order to render an intersection of these orbits possible, we must suppose a great variation of the eccentricity. But the change of eccentricity of the planetary orbits is exceedingly slow, and the present rate of increase of the eccentricity of Vesta must be continued twenty-seven thousand years to render the aphelion distance of that planet equal to the perihelion distance of Hygeia. Moreover, the eccentricity of the orbit of Vesta is now increasing, which implies that in past ages the interval between Vesta and Hygeia must have been greater than it is at present; whence the conclusion seems irresistible, that the orbits of Vesta and Hygeia can not have intersected for several myriads of years. When the secular variations of the elements of each of the asteroids have been computed, astronomers will be able to assign a limit of time beyond which the intersection of all the asteroid orbits must have occurred, if, indeed, such an intersection ever took place. The discovery of many of these bodies is so recent that, as yet, there has not been sufficient time for such a computation; but from what we already know, we hazard little in venturing the opinion that when this computation shall be made it will appear, that if the asteroid planets ever composed a single body which exploded, as Olbers supposed, such explosion must have occurred myriads of years ago. Indeed, the discovery of such a host of asteroids seems to have stripped the theory of Olbers of nearly all the plausibility it possessed when it was originally proposed; and it would seem hardly less reasonable to suppose that the Earth and Venus originally constituted but one body, than to admit the same for the thirty-one asteroids.

But if we reject the theory of Olbers, what do we conclude? That the asteroids bear no special relationship to each other? Do they not all clearly indicate a family resemblance? And if so, how do we account for this relationship?

There are several reasons for believing in some peculiar relationship between the asteroids.

1. Unlike the other planets of our system, they are all of diminutive size—the largest of them hardly exceeding one or two hundred miles in diameter. M. Le Verrier, after a close examination of the nature and amount of the influences exerted by the entire group of asteroids upon the nearer planets Mars and the Earth, has arrived at the conclusion that the sum total of the matter constituting the small planets situated between the mean distances 2.20 and 3.16 (including undiscovered as well as known asteroids), can not exceed about one-fourth of the mass of the earth.

2. The asteroids in their position occupy a zone entirely distinct from the other planets of the solar system. Between the orbits of Jupiter and Saturn—between Saturn and Uranus—is an immense interval furnishing space enough for a host of little bodies to circulate around the sun; but in not a solitary instance has any such body been found, except between Mars and Jupiter. Some may attempt to account for this circumstance by saying that astronomers have long been watching exclusively this portion of space, and have left all other regions entirely unexplored. An exploration conducted upon such a principle is simply a physical impossibility. If there were a small planet between the Earth and Mars, it would have stood the same chance of detection, in the explorations of the past ten years, as if it were situated between Mars and Jupiter; and, indeed, it would have stood a better chance of detection, inasmuch as it would appear of greater brightness on account of its proximity to us. If there were a small planet circulating between Jupiter and Saturn, it would have stood the same chance of detection as if it had been placed this side of Jupiter, except that it would appear somewhat fainter on account of its increased distance. The fact that we have discovered thirty-three small planets between Mars and Jupiter, and not a solitary one in any other portion of the solar system, points to something special in this region of the heavens. In other words, we have discovered a limited zone of little planetary bodies, and have not been able to discover a single body of the same class situated out of this zone.

3. The orbits of these little bodies present some special peculiarities.

If we refer to the Table on page 350, we shall perceive that the ascending nodes of the orbits are not distributed uniformly through the zodiac. Thus, within the space of 140 degrees, from longitude 38° to longitude 178° , we find the nodes of twenty-one orbits; while only ten are left for the remaining 220 degrees of the zodiac. A similar remark applies to the position of the perihelia. In the first half of the zodiac we find twenty-three perihelia, while only eight remain for the other half of the circumference. The inclinations of the orbits range from zero to 85° degrees; the eccentricities range from near zero up to more than one quarter; and it is remarkable that those orbits which have great eccentricity have generally great inclination to the ecliptic, while small inclination is generally accompanied by moderate eccentricity.

4. But the most striking peculiarity of these orbits is, that they all lock into one another like the links of a chain, so that if the orbits are supposed to be represented materially as hoops, they all hang together as one system. The orbits of Hygeia and Themis, being the largest of all the orbits, completely inclose nearly all of them, and lock into but a small number; while the orbits of Massilia, Astræa, Pallas, etc., lock into nearly all of the orbits; so that if we take hold of the orbit of Hygeia (supposed to be a material hoop), it will support the orbits of Iris, Thalia, Calliope, and two or three others, while these in turn lock into and support all the rest. Indeed, if we seize hold of any orbit at random, it will drag all the other orbits along with it. This feature of itself sufficiently distinguishes the asteroid orbits from all the other orbits of the solar system.

If we reject the theory that these asteroids were originally united in one solid body, it seems nevertheless difficult to avoid the conclusion that similar causes have operated in determining the orbits of this zone of planets. It is impossible to assign any cause for these resemblances without adopting some theory respecting the origin of the solar system. The theory of gradual condensation, as developed by Laplace in the nebular hypothesis, affords at least a plausible explanation of these phenomena.

Laplace supposed that the matter composing the bodies of our solar system originally existed in the condition of an immense nebula, extending beyond the limits of the most distant planet—that this nebulous mass had an exceedingly elevated temperature, and a slow rotation on its axis—that the nebula gradually cooled; and as it contracted in dimensions, its velocity of rotation, according to the principles of mechanics, increased, until the centrifugal force arising from the rotation became equal to the attraction of the central mass for the exterior zone, when this zone necessarily became detached from the central mass. As the central mass continued to contract in its dimensions and its velocity of rotation continued to increase, the centrifugal force again became equal to the attraction of the central mass for the exterior zone, and a second zone was detached. Thus a number of zones of nebulous matter were successively detached, until, by gradual condensation, the central mass became of comparatively small dimensions and great density.

The zones thus successively detached would form concentric rings of vapor, all revolving in the same direction round the sun. If the particles of each ring continued to condense without separating from each other, they would ultimately form a liquid or a solid ring. But generally each ring of vapor would break up into separate masses, revolving about the sun with velocities slightly different from each other. These masses would assume a spheroidal form; that is, they would form planets in the state of vapor. But if one of these masses was large enough to attract each of the others in succession to itself, the ring of vapor would be converted into a single spheroidal mass of vapor, and we should have a single planet of great mass for each zone of vapor detached. But if no one of these masses had a preponderating size, they would all continue to revolve about the sun in independent orbits, and would form a zone of little planets such as we have actually discovered between Mars and Jupiter.

With regard to the actual number of bodies belonging to this zone of planets, we can do little more than conjecture. Already we have one asteroid of the sixth magnitude, one of the seventh, four of the eighth, eighteen of the ninth, and nine of the tenth or eleventh. It would require 400 bodies as large as the largest of the asteroids to make a body one fourth of the size of the earth; and, according to Le Verrier, the sum of all the asteroids can not exceed this limit. When we consider the shortness of the period during which stars below the eighth magnitude have been systematically observed, we see room for the discovery of several more planets of the ninth magnitude, and perhaps three or four hundred more of inferior dimensions.

THE NEWCOMES.*

MEMOIRS OF A MOST RESPECTABLE FAMILY.

BY W. M. THACKERAY.

CHAPTER XLV.

A STAG OF TEN.

THE London season was very nearly come to an end, and Lord Farintosh had danced I don't know how many times with Miss Newcome, had drunk several bottles of the old Kew port, had been seen at numerous breakfasts, operas, races, and public places by the young lady's side, and had not as yet made any such proposal as Lady Kew expected for her granddaughter. Clive going to see his military friends in the Regent's Park once, and finish Captain Butts's portrait in barracks, heard two or three young men talking, and one say to another, "I bet you three to two Farintosh don't marry her, and I bet you even that he don't ask her." Then as he entered Mr. Butts's room, where these gentlemen were conversing, there was a silence and an awkwardness. The young fellows were making an "event" out of Ethel's marriage, and sporting their money freely on it.

To have an old countess hunting a young marquis so resolutely that all the world should be able to look on and speculate whether her game would be run down by that stanch toothless old pursuer—that is an amusing sport, isn't it? and affords plenty of fun and satisfaction to those who follow the hunt. But for a heroine of a story, be she ever so clever, handsome, and sarcastic, I don't think, for my part, at this present stage of the tale, Miss Ethel Newcome occupies a very dignified position. To break her heart in silence for Tomkins who is in love with another; to suffer no end of poverty, starvation, capture by ruffians, ill-treatment by a bullying husband, loss of beauty by the small-pox, death even at the end of the volume; all these mishaps a young heroine may endure (and has endured in romances over and over again), without losing the least dignity, or suffering any diminution of the sentimental reader's esteem. But a girl of great beauty, high temper, and strong natural intellect, who submits to be dragged hither and thither in an old grandmother's leash, and in pursuit of a husband who will run away from the couple, such a person, I say, is in a very awkward position as a heroine; and I declare if I had another ready to my hand (and unless there were extenuating circumstances), Ethel should be deposited at this very sentence.

But a novelist must go on with his heroine, as a man with his wife, for better or worse, and to the end. For how many years have the Spaniards borne with their gracious queen, not because she was faultless, but because she was there! So Chambers and grandees cried, God save her, Alabarderos turned out, drums beat, cannons fired, and people saluted Isabella Segunda, who was no better than the humblest washerwoman of her subjects. Are we much better than our neighbors? Do we never yield to our peculiar temptation, our pride, or our avarice, or our vanity, or what not? Ethel is very wrong, certainly. But recollect, she is very young. She is in other people's hands. She has been bred up and governed by a very worldly family, and taught their traditions. We would hardly, for instance, the staunchest Protestant in England would hardly be angry with poor little Isabella Segunda for being a Catholic. So if Ethel worships at a certain image which a great number of good folks in England bow to, let us not be too angry with her idolatry, and bear with our queen a little longer before we make our pronunciamiento.

No, Miss Newcome, yours is not a dignified position in life, however you may argue that hundreds of people in the world are doing like you. Oh, me! what a confession it is, in the very outset of life and blushing brightness of youth's morning, to own that the aim with which a young girl sets out, and the object of her existence, is to marry a rich man; that she was endowed with beauty so that she might buy wealth, and a title with it; that as sure as she has a soul to be saved, her business here on earth is to try and get a rich husband. That is the career for which many a woman is bred and trained. A young man begins the world with some aspirations at least; he will try to be good and follow the truth; he will strive to win honors for himself, and never do a base action; he will pass nights over his books, and forego ease and pleasure so that he may achieve a name. Many a poor wretch who is worn out now and old, and bankrupt of fame and money too, has commenced life at any rate with noble views, and generous schemes, from which weakness, idleness, passion, or overpowering hostile fortune have turned him away. But a girl of the world, bon Dieu! the doctrine with which she begins is that she is to have a wealthy husband: the article of faith in her catechism is, "I believe in elder sons, and a house in town, and a house in the country?" They are mercenary as they step fresh and blooming into the world out of the nursery. They have been schooled there to keep their bright eyes to look only on the prince and the duke, Croesus and Dives. By long cramping and careful process, their little natural hearts have been squeezed up, like the feet of their fashionable little sisters in China. As you see a pauper's child, with an awful premature knowledge of the pawnshop, able to haggle at market with her wretched halfpence, and battle bargains at hucksters' stalls, you shall find a young beauty, who was a child in the school-room a year since, as wise and knowing as the old practitioners on that exchange; as economical of her smiles, as dexterous in keeping back or producing her beautiful wares; as skillful in setting one bidder against another; as keen as the smartest merchant in Vanity Fair.

If the young gentlemen of the Life Guards Green who were talking about Miss Newcome and her suitors, were silent when Clive appeared among them, it was because they were aware not only of his relationship to the young lady, but his unhappy condition regarding her. Certain men there are who never tell their love, but let concealment, like a worm in the bud, feed on their damask cheeks; others again must be not always thinking, but talking about the darling object. So it was not very long before Captain Crackthorpe was taken into Clive's confidence, and through Crackthorpe very likely the whole mess became acquainted with his passion. These young fellows, who had been early introduced into the world, gave Clive small hopes of success, putting to him, in their downright phraseology, the point of which he was already aware, that Miss Newcome was intended for his superiors, and that he had best not make his mind uneasy by sighing for those beautiful grapes which were beyond his reach.

But the good-natured Crackthorpe, who had a pity for the young painter's condition, helped him so far (and gained Clive's warmest thanks for his good offices), by asking admission for Clive to certain evening parties of the beau-monde, where he had the gratification of meeting his charmer. Ethel was surprised and pleased, and Lady Kew surprised and angry at meeting Clive Newcome at these fashionable houses; the girl herself was touched very likely at his pertinacity in following her. As there was no actual feud between them, she could not refuse now and again to dance with her cousin; and thus he picked up such small crumbs of consolation as a youth in his state can get; lived upon six words vouchsafed to him in a quadrille, or brought home a glance of the eyes which she had presented to him in a waltz, or the remembrance of a squeeze of the hand on parting or meeting. How eager he was to get a card to this party or that! how attentive to the givers of such entertainments! Some friends of his accused him of being a tuft-hunter and flatterer of the aristocracy, on account of his politeness to certain people; the truth was, he wanted to go wherever Miss Ethel was; and the ball was blank to him which she did not attend.

This business occupied not only one season, but two. By the time of the second season, Mr. Newcome had made so many acquaintances, that he needed few more introductions into society. He was very well known as a good-natured, handsome young man, and a very good waltzer, the only son of an Indian officer of large wealth, who chose to devote himself to painting, and who was supposed to entertain an unhappy fondness for his cousin the beautiful Miss Newcome. Kind folks who heard of this little tendre, and were sufficiently interested in Mr. Clive, asked him to their houses in consequence. I dare say those people who were good to him may have been themselves at one time unlucky in their own love affairs.

When the first season ended without a declaration from my lord, Lady Kew carried off her young lady to Scotland, where it also so happened that Lord Farintosh was going to shoot, and people made what surmises they chose upon this coincidence. Surmises, why not? You who know the world, know very well that if you see Mrs. So-and-so's name in the list of people at an entertainment, on looking down the list you will presently be sure to come on Mr. Whatdyoucallem's. If Lord and Lady Blank, of Suchandsuch Castle, received a distinguished circle (including Lady Dash), for Christmas or Easter, without reading farther the names of the guests, you may venture on any wager that Captain Asterisk is one of the company. These coincidences happen every day; and some people are so anxious to meet other people, and so irresistible is the magnetic sympathy I suppose, that they will travel hundreds of miles in the worst of weather to see their friends, and break your door open almost, provided the friend is inside it.

I am obliged to own the fact, that for many months Lady Kew hunted after Lord Farintosh. This rheumatic old woman went to Scotland, where, as he was pursuing the deer, she stalked his lordship: from Scotland she went to Paris, where he was taking lessons in dancing at the Chaumière; from Paris to an English country house, for Christmas, where he was expected, but didn't come—not being, his professor said, quite complete in the Polka, and so on. If Ethel were privy to these manœuvres, or any thing more than an unwittingly consenting party, I say we would depose her from her place of heroine at once. But she was acting under her grandmother's orders, a most imperious, irresistible, managing old woman, who exacted every body's obedience, and managed every body's business in her family. Lady Ann Newcome being in attendance on her sick husband, Ethel was consigned to the Countess of Kew, her grandmother, who hinted that she should leave Ethel her property when dead, and while alive expected the girl should go about with her. She had and wrote as many letters as a Secretary of State almost. She was accustomed to set off without taking any body's advice, or announcing her departure until within an hour or two of the event. In her train moved Ethel, against her own will, which would have led her to stay at home with her father, but at the special wish and order of her parents. Was such a sum as that of which Lady Kew had the disposal (Hobson Brothers knew the amount of it quite well) to be left out of the family? Forbid it all ye powers! Barnes—who would have liked the money himself, and said truly that he would live with his grandmother any where she liked if he could get it—Barnes joined most energetically with Sir Brian and Lady Ann in ordering Ethel's obedience to Lady Kew. You know how difficult it is for one young woman not to acquiesce when the family council strongly orders. In fine, I hope there was a good excuse for the queen of this history, and that it was her wicked domineering old prime minister who led her wrong. Otherwise, I say, we would have another dynasty. Oh, to think of a generous nature, and the world, and nothing but the world, to occupy it!—of a brave intellect, and the milliner's bandboxes, and the scandal of the coterie, and the fiddle-faddle etiquette of the court for its sole exercise! of the rush and hurry from entertainment to entertainment; of the constant smiles and cares of representation; of the prayerless rest at night, and the awaking to a godless morrow! This was the course of life to which Fate, and not her own fault, altogether, had for a while handed over Ethel Newcome. Let those pity her who can feel their own weakness and misgiving; let those punish her who are without fault themselves.

Clive did not offer to follow her to Scotland. He knew quite well that the encouragement he had had was only of the smallest; that as a relation she received him frankly and kindly enough, but checked him when he would have adopted another character. But it chanced that they met in Paris, whither he went in the Easter of the ensuing year, having worked to some good purpose through the winter, and dispatched, as on a former occasion, his three or four pictures to take their chance at the Exhibition.

Of these it is our pleasing duty to be able to corroborate, to some extent, Mr. F. Bayham's favorable report. Fancy sketches and historical pieces our young man had eschewed; having convinced himself either that he had not an epic genius, or that to draw portraits of his friends was a much easier task than that which he had set himself formerly. While all the world was crowding round a pair of J. J.'s little pictures, a couple of chalk heads were admitted into the Exhibition (his great picture of Captain Crackthorpe on horseback, in full uniform, I must own was ignominiously rejected), and the friends of the parties had the pleasure of recognizing in the miniature-room, No. 1246, Portrait of an Officer—viz., Augustus Butts, Esq., of the Life Guards Green; and portrait of the Rev. Charles Honeyman, No. 1272. Miss Sherriek the hangers refused; Mr. Binnie, Clive had spoiled, as usual, in the painting; the chalk heads, however, before named, were voted to be faithful likenesses, and executed in a very agreeable and spirited manner. F. Bayham's criticism on these performances, it need not be said, was tremendous. Since the days of Michael Angelo you would have thought there never had been such drawings. In fact, F. B., as some other critics do, clapped his friend so boisterously on the back, and trumpeted their merits with such prodigious energy as to make his friends themselves sometimes uneasy.

Mr. Clive, whose good father was writing home more and more wonderful accounts of the Bundelcund Bank, in which he had engaged, and who was always pressing his son to draw for more money, treated himself to comfortable rooms at Paris, in the very same hotel where the young Marquis of Farintosh occupied lodgings much more splendid, and where he lived, no doubt, so as to be near the professor, who was still teaching his lordship the Polka. Indeed, it must be said that Lord Farintosh made great progress under this artist, and that he danced very much better in his third season than in the first and second years after he had come upon the town. From the same instructor the Marquis learned the latest novelties in French conversation, the choicest oaths and phrases (for which he was famous), so that although his French grammar was naturally defective, he was enabled to order a dinner at Philippe's, and to bully a waiter, or curse a hackney coachman with extreme volubility. A young nobleman of his rank was received with the distinction which was his due, by the French sovereign of that period; and at the Tuilleries, and the houses of the French nobility, which he visited, Monsieur le Marquis de Farintosh excited considerable remark, by the use of some of the phrases which his young professor had taught to him. People even went so far as to say that the Marquis was an awkward and dull young man, of the very worst manners.

Whereas the young Clive Newcome—and it comforted the poor fellow's heart somewhat, and be sure pleased Ethel, who was looking on at his triumphs—was voted the most charming young Englishman who had been seen for a long time in our salons. Madame de Florac, who loved him as a son of her own, actually went once or twice into the world in order to see his début. Madame de Moncontour inhabited a part of the Hotel de Florac, and received society there. The French people did not understand what bad English she talked, though they comprehended Lord Farintosh's French blunders. "Monsieur Newcome is an artist! What a noble career!" cries a great French lady, the wife of a Marshal, to the astonished Miss Newcome. "This young man is the cousin of the charming Mees? You must be proud to possess such a nephew, Madame!" says another French lady to the Countess of Kew (who, you may be sure, is delighted to have such a relative). And the French lady invites Clive to her receptions expressly in order to make herself agreeable to the old Comtesse. Before the cousins have been three minutes together in Madame de Florac's salon, she sees that Clive is in love with Ethel Newcome. She takes the boy's hand and says, "J'ai votre secret, mon ami;" and her eyes regard him for a moment as fondly, as tenderly, as ever they looked at his father. Oh, what tears have they shed, gentle eyes! Oh, what faith has it kept, tender heart! If love lives through all life; and survives through all sorrow; and remains steadfast with us through all changes; and in all darkness of spirit burns brightly; and, if we die, deplores us forever, and loves still equally; and exists with the very last gasp and throb of the faithful bosom—whence it passes with the pure soul, beyond death; surely it shall be immortal? Though we who remain are separated from it, is it not ours in heaven? If we love still those we lose, can we altogether lose those we love? Forty years have passed away. Youth and dearest memories revisit her, and Hope almost wakes up again out of its grave, as the constant lady holds the young man's hand, and looks at the son of Thomas Newcome.

CHAPTER XLVI. THE HÔTEL DE FLORAC.

SINCE the death of the Duc d'Ivry, the husband of Mary Queen of Scots, the Comte de Florac, who is now the legitimate owner of the ducal title, does not choose to bear it, but continues to be known in the world by his old name. The old Count's world is very small. His doctor, and his director, who comes daily to play his game at piquet; his daughter's children, who amuse him by their laughter, and play round his chair in the garden of his hotel; his faithful wife, and one or two friends as old as himself, form his society. His son, the Abbé, is with them but seldom. The austerity of his manners frightens his old father, who can little comprehend the religionism of the new school. After going to hear his son preach through Lent at Notre Dame, where the Abbé de Florac gathered a great congregation, the old Count came away quite puzzled at his son's declamations. "I do not understand your new priests," he says; "I knew my son had become a Cordelier; I went to hear him, and found he was a Jacobin. Let me make my salut in quiet, my good Léonore. My director answers for me, and plays a game at trictrac into the bargain with me." Our history has but little to do with this venerable nobleman. He has his chamber looking out into the garden of his hotel; his faithful old domestic to wait upon him, his House of Peers to attend when he is well enough, his few acquaintances to help him to pass the evening. The rest of the hotel he gives up to his son, the Vicomte de Florac, and Madame la Princesse de Moncontour, his daughter-in-law.

When Florac has told his friends of the Club why it is he has assumed a new title—as a means of reconciliation (a reconciliation all philosophical, my friends) with his wife à la Higg of Manchester, who adores titles like all Anglaises, and has recently made a great succession, every body allows that the measure was dictated by prudence, and there is no more laughter at his change of name. The Princess takes the first floor of the hotel at the price paid for it by the American General, who has returned to his original pigs at Cincinnati. Had not Cincinnati himself pigs on his farm, and was he not a general and member of Congress too? The honest Princess has a bedchamber, which, to her terror, she is obliged to open of reception-evenings, when gentlemen and ladies play cards there. It is fitted up in the style of Louis XVI. In her bed is an immense looking-glass, surmounted by stucco cupids; it is an alcove which some powdered Venus, before the Revolution, might have reposed in. Opposite that looking-glass, between the tall windows, at some forty feet distance, is another huge mirror, so that when the poor Princess is in bed, in her prim old curl-papers, she sees a vista of elderly princesses twinkling away into the dark perspective; and is so frightened that she and Betsy, her Lancashire maid, pin up the jonquil silk curtains over the bed-mirror after the first night; though the Princess never can get it out of her head that her image is still there, behind the jonquil hangings, turning as she turns, waking as she wakes, etc. The chamber is so vast and lonely that she has a bed made for Betsy in the room. It is, of course, whisked away into a closet on reception-evenings. A boudoir, rosetendre, with more cupids and nymphs by Boucher, sporting over the door-panels—nymphs who may well shock old Betsy and her old mistress—is the Princess's morning-room. "Ah, Mum, what would Mr. Humper at Manchester, Mr. Jowls of Newcome (the minister whom, in early days, Miss Higg used to sit under) say if they was browt into this room!" But there is no question of Mr. Jowls and Mr. Humper, excellent dissenting divines, who preached to Miss Higg, being brought into the Princesse de Moncontour's boudoir.

That paragraph, respecting a conversion in high life, which F. B. in his enthusiasm inserted in the "Pall Mall Gazette," caused no small excitement in the Florac family. The Florac family read the "Pall Mall Gazette," knowing that Clive's friends were engaged in that periodical. When Madame de Florac, who did not often read newspapers, happened to cast her eye upon that poetic paragraph of F. B.'s, you may fancy with what a panic it filled the good and pious lady. Her son become a Protestant! After all the grief and trouble his wildness had occasioned to her, Paul forsake his religion! But that her husband was so ill and aged as not to be able to bear her absence, she would have hastened to London to rescue her son out of that perdition. She sent for her younger son, who undertook the embassy; and the Prince and Princesse de Moncontour, in their hotel at London, were one day surprised by the visit of the Abbé de Florac.

As Paul was quite innocent of any intention of abandoning his religion, the mother's kind heart was very speedily set at rest by her envoy. Far from Paul's conversion to Protestantism, the Abbé wrote home the most encouraging accounts of his sister-in-law's precious dispositions. He had communications with Madame de Moncontour's Anglican director, a man of not powerful mind, wrote M. l'Abbé, though of considerable repute for eloquence in his sect. The good dispositions of his sister-in-law were improved by the French clergyman, who could be most captivating and agreeable when a work of conversion was in hand. The visit reconciled the family to their English relative, in whom good nature and many other good qualities were to be seen, now that there were hopes of reclaiming her. It was agreed that Madame de Moncontour should come and inhabit the Hôtel de Florac at Paris: perhaps the Abbé tempted the worthy lady by pictures of the many pleasures and advantages she would enjoy in that capital. She was presented at her own court by the French embassadress of that day; and was received at the Tuileries with a cordiality which flattered and pleased her.

Having been presented herself, Madame la Princesse in turn presented to her august sovereign Mrs. T. Higg and Miss Higg, of Manchester, Mrs. Samuel Higg, of Newcome; the husbands of those ladies (the Princess's brothers) also sporting a court-dress for the first time. Sam Higg's neighbor, the member for Newcome, Sir Bryan Newcome, Bart., was too ill to act as Higg's sponsor before majesty; but Barnes Newcome was uncommonly civil to the two Lancashire gentlemen; though their politics were different to his, and Sam had voted against Sir Bryan at his last election. Barnes took them to dine at a club—recommended his tailor—sent Lady Clara Pulleyn to call on Mrs. Higg—who pronounced her to be a pretty young woman and most haffable. The Countess of Dorking would have been delighted to present these ladies had the Princess not luckily been in London to do that office. The Hobson Newcomes were very civil to the Lancashire party, and entertained them splendidly at dinner. I believe Mrs. and Mr. Hobson themselves went to court this year, the latter in a deputy lieutenant's uniform.

If Barnes Newcome was so very civil to the Higg family, we may suppose he had good reason. The Higgs were very strong in Newcome, and it was advisable to conciliate them. They were very rich, and their account would not be disagreeable at the Bank. Madame de Moncontour's—a large easy private account—would be more pleasant still. And Hobson Brothers having entered largely into the Anglo-Continental Railway, whereof mention has been made, it was a bright thought of Barnes to place the Prince of Moncontour, etc. etc., on the French Direction of the Railway; and to take the princely prodigal down to Newcome with his new title, and reconcile him to his wife and the Higg family. Barnes, we may say, invented the principality; rescued the Vicomte de Florac out of his dirty lodgings in Leicester Square, and sent the Prince of Moncontour back to his worthy middle-aged wife again. The disagreeable dissenting days were over. A brilliant young curate of Doctor Bulders, who also wore long hair, straight waistcoats, and no shirt collars, had already reconciled the Vicomtesse de Florac to the persuasion whereof the ministers are clad in that queer uniform. The landlord of their hotel in St. James's got his wine from Sherrick, and sent his families to Lady Whittlesea's Chapel. The Rev. Charles Honeyman's eloquence and amiability were appreciated by his new disciple: thus the historian has traced here, step by step, how all these people became acquainted.

Sam Higg, whose name was very good on 'Change in Manchester and London, joined the direction of the Anglo-Continental. A brother had died lately, leaving his money among them, and his wealth had added considerably to Madame de Florac's means; his sister invested a portion of her capital in the Railway in her husband's name. The shares were at a premium, and gave a good dividend. The Prince de Moncontour took his place with great gravity at the Paris board, whither Barnes made frequent flying visits. The sense of capitalism sobered and dignified Paul de Florac: at the age of five-and-forty he was actually giving up being a young man, and was not ill-pleased at having to enlarge his waistcoats, and to show a little gray in his mustache. His errors were forgotten: he was bien vu by the government. He might have had the Embassy Extraordinary to Queen Pomaré; but the health of Madame la Princesse was delicate. He paid his wife visits every morning: appeared at her parties and her opera-box, and was seen constantly with her in public. He gave quiet little dinners still, at which Clive was present sometimes; and had a private door and key to his apartments, which were separated by all the dreary length of the reception-rooms from the mirrored chamber and jonquil couch where the Princess and Betsy reposed. When some of his London friends visited Paris he showed us these rooms, and introduced us duly to Madame la Princesse. He was as simple and as much at home in the midst of these splendors, as in the dirty little lodgings in Leicester Square, where he painted his own boots, and cooked his herring over the tongs. As for Clive, he was the infant of the house, Madame la Princesse could not resist his kind face; and Paul was as fond of him in his way, as Paul's mother in hers. Would he live at the Hôtel de Florac? There was an excellent atelier in the pavilion, with a chamber for his servant. No! you will be most at ease in apartments of your own. You will have here but the society of women. I do not rise till late: and my affairs, my board, call me away for the greater part of the day. Thou wilt but be ennuyé to play trictrac with my old father. My mother waits on him. My sister au second is given up entirely to her children, who always have the pâtée. Madame la Princesse is not amusing for a young man. Come and go when thou wilt, Clive, my garçon, my son: thy cover is laid. Wilt thou take the portraits of all the family? Hast thou want of money? I had at thy age and almost ever since, mon ami: but now we swim in gold, and when there is a Louis in my purse, there are ten francs for thee. To shew his mother that he did not think of the Reformed Religion, Paul did not miss going to mass with her on Sunday. Sometimes Madame Paul went too, between whom and her mother-in-law there could not be any liking, but there was now great civility. They saw each other once a day: Madame Paul always paid her visit to the Comte de Florac: and Betsy, her maid, made the old gentleman laugh by her briskness and talk. She brought back to her mistress the most wonderful stories which the old man told her about his doings during the emigration—before he married Madame la Comtesse—when he gave lessons in dancing, parbleu! There was his fiddle still, a trophy of those old times. He chirped, and coughed, and sang, in his cracked old voice, as he talk about them. "Lor!

bless you, Mum," says Betsy, "he must have been a terrible old man!" He remembered the times well enough, but the stories he sometimes told over twice or thrice in an hour. I am afraid he had not repented sufficiently of those wicked old times: else why did he laugh and giggle so when he recalled them? He would laugh and giggle till he was choked with his old cough: and old St. Jean, his man, came and beat M. le Comte on the back, and made M. le Comte take a spoonful of his sirup.

Between two such women as Madame de Florac and Lady Kew, of course there could be little liking or sympathy. Religion, love, duty, the family, were the French lady's constant occupation—duty and the family, perhaps, Lady Kew's aim too—only the notions of duty were different in either person. Lady Kew's idea of duty to her relatives being to push them on in the world: Madame de Florac's to soothe, to pray, to attend them with constant watchfulness, to strive to mend them with pious counsel. I don't know that one lady was happier than the other. Madame de Florac's eldest son was a kindly prodigal: her second had given his whole heart to the church: her daughter had centred hers on her own children, and was jealous if their grandmother laid a finger on them. So Léonore de Florac was quite alone. It seemed as if Heaven had turned away all her children's hearts from her. Her daily business in life was to nurse a selfish old man, into whose service she had been forced in early youth by a paternal decree which she never questioned; giving him obedience, striving to give him respect—every thing but her heart, which had gone out of her keeping. Many a good woman's life is no more cheerful; a spring of beauty, a little warmth and sunshine of love, a bitter disappointment, followed by pangs and frantic tears, then a long monotonous story of submission. "Not here, my daughter, is to be your happiness," says the priest; "whom Heaven loves it afflicts." And he points out to her the agonies of suffering saints of her sex; assures her of their present beatitudes and glories; exhorts her to bear her pains with a faith like theirs; and is empowered to promise her a like reward.

The other matron is not less alone. Her husband and son are dead, without a tear for either—to weep was not in Lady Kew's nature. Her grandson, whom she had loved perhaps more than any human being, is rebellious and estranged from her; her children separated from her, save one whose sickness and bodily infirmity the mother resents as disgraces to herself. Her darling schemes fail somehow. She moves from town to town, and ball to ball, and hall to castle, forever uneasy and always alone. She sees people scared at her coming; is received by sufferance and fear rather than by welcome; likes perhaps the terror which she inspires, and to enter over the breach rather than through the hospitable gate. She will try and command wherever she goes; and trample over dependents and society, with a grim consciousness that it dislikes her, a rage at its cowardice, and an unbending will to dominate. To be old, proud, lonely, and not have a friend in the world—that is her lot in it. As the French lady may be said to resemble the bird which the fables say feeds her young with her blood; this one, if she has a little natural liking for her brood, goes hunting hither and thither and robs meat for them. And so I suppose, to make the simile good, we must compare the Marquis of Farintosh to a lamb for the nonce, and Miss Ethel Newcome to a young eaglet. Is it not a rare provision of nature (or fiction of poets, who have their own natural history) that the strong-winged bird can soar to the sun and gaze at it, and then come down from heaven and pounce on a piece of carrion?

After she became acquainted with certain circumstances, Madame de Florac was very interested about Ethel Newcome, and strove in her modest way to become intimate with her. Miss Newcome and Lady Kew attended Madame de Moncontour's Wednesday evenings. "It is as well, my dear, for the interests of the family that we should be particularly civil to these people," Lady Kew said; and accordingly she came to the Hôtel de Florac, and was perfectly insolent to Madame la Princesse every Thursday evening. Toward Madame de Florac, even Lady Kew could not be rude. She was so gentle as to give no excuse for assault: Lady Kew vouchsafed to pronounce that Madame de Florac was "très grande-dame"—"of the sort which is almost impossible to find nowadays," Lady Kew said, who thought she possessed this dignity in her own person. When Madame de Florac, blushing, asked Ethel to come and see her, Ethel's grandmother consented with the utmost willingness. "She is very dévote I have heard, and will try and convert you. Of course you will hold your own about that sort of thing; and have the good sense to keep off theology. There is no Roman Catholic parti in England or Scotland that is to be thought of for a moment. You will see they will marry young Lord Derwentwater to an Italian princess; but he is only seventeen, and his directors never lose sight of him. Sir Bartholomew Fawkes will have a fine property when Lord Campion dies, unless Lord Campion leaves the money to the convent where his daughter is—and, of the other families, who is there? I made every inquiry purposely—that is, of course, one is anxious to know about the Catholics as about one's own people: and little Mr. Rood, who was one of my poor brother Steyne's lawyers, told me there is not one young man of that party at this moment who can be called a desirable person. Be very civil to Madame de Florac; she sees some of the old legitimists, and you know I am brouillée with that party of late years."

"There is the Marquis de Montluc, who has a large fortune for France," said Ethel, gravely; "he has a humpback, but he is very spiritual. Monsieur de Cadillan paid me some compliments the other night, and even asked George Barnes what my dot was. He is a widower, and has a wig and two daughters. Which do you think would be the greatest incumbrance, grandmamma—a humpback, or a wig and two daughters? I like Madame de Florac; for the sake of the borough, I must try and like poor Madame de Moncontour, and I will go and see them whenever you please."

So Ethel went to see Madame de Florac. She was very kind to Madame de Préville's children, Madame de Florac's grandchildren; she was gay and gracious with Madame de Moncontour. She went again and again to the Hôtel de Florac, not caring for Lady Kew's own circle of statesmen and diplomatists, Russian, and Spanish, and French, whose talk about the courts of Europe—who was in favor at St. Petersburg, and who was in disgrace at Schoenbrunn—naturally did not amuse the lively young person. The goodness of Madame de Florac's life, the tranquil grace and melancholy kindness with which the French lady received her, soothed and pleased Miss Ethel. She came and reposed in Madame de Florac's quiet chamber, or sate in the shade in the sober old garden of her hotel; away from all the trouble and chatter of the salons, the gossip of the embassies, the fluttering ceremonial of the Parisian ladies' visits in their fine toilets, the fadaises of the dancing dandies, and the pompous mysteries of the old statesmen who frequented her grandmother's apartment. The world began for her at night; when she went in the train of the old Countess from hotel to hotel, and danced waltz after waltz with Prussian and Neapolitan secretaries, with princes' officers of ordonnance—with personages even more lofty very likely—for the court of the Citizen King was then in its splendor; and there must surely have been a number of nimble young royal highnesses who would like to dance with such a beauty as Miss Newcome. The Marquis of Farintosh had a share in these polite amusements. His English conversation was not brilliant as yet, although his French was eccentric; but at the court balls, whether he appeared in his uniform of the Scotch Archers, or in his native Glenlivat tartan, there certainly was not in his own or the public estimation a handsomer young nobleman in Paris that season. It has been said that he was greatly improved in dancing; and, for a young man of his age, his whiskers were really extraordinarily large and curly.

Miss Newcome, out of consideration for her grandmother's strange antipathy to him, did not inform Lady Kew that a young gentleman by the name of Clive occasionally came to visit the Hôtel de Florac. At first, with her French education, Madame de Florac never would have thought of allowing the cousins to meet in her house; but with the English it was different. Paul assured her that in the English chateaux, les Meess walked for entire hours with the young men, made parties of the fish, mounted to horse with them, the whole with the permission of the mothers. "When I was at Newcome, Miss Ethel rode with me several times," Paul said;

"à preuve that we went to visit an old relation of the family, who adores Clive and his father." When Madame de Florac questioned her son about the young Marquis to whom it was said Ethel was engaged, Florac flouted the idea. "Engaged! This young Marquis is engaged to the Théâtre des Variétés, my mother. He laughs at the notion of an engagement. When one charged him with it of late at the club; and asked how Mademoiselle Louqsor—she is so tall, that they call her the Louqsor—she is an Odalisque Obélisque, ma mère; when one asked how the Louqsor would pardon his pursuit of Miss Newcome? my Ecossois permitted himself to say in full club, that it was Miss Newcome pursued him—that nymph, that Diane, that charming and peerless young creature! On which, as the others laughed, and his friend

Monsieur Walleye applauded, I dared to say in my turn, 'Monsieur le Marquis, as a young man, not familiar with our language, you have said what is not true, Milor, and therefore luckily not mischievous. I have the honor to count of my friends the parents of the young lady of whom you have spoken. You never could have intended to say that a young Miss who lives under the guardianship of her parents, and is obedient to them, whom you meet in society all the nights, and at whose door your carriage is to be seen every day, is capable of that with which you charge her so gayly. These things say themselves, Monsieur, in the coulisses of the theatre, of women from whom you learn our language; not of young persons pure and chaste, Monsieur de Farintosh! Learn to respect your compatriots; to honor youth and innocence every where, Monsieur!—and when you forget yourself, permit one who might be your father to point where you are wrong.”

“And what did he answer?” asked the Countess.

“I attended myself to a soufflet,” replied Florac; “but his reply was much more agreeable. The young insultery, with many blushes, and a gros juron as his polite way is, said, he had not wished to say a word against that person. ‘Of whom the name,’ cried I, ‘ought never to be spoken in these places.’ Herewith our little dispute ended.”

So, occasionally, Mr. Clive had the good luck to meet with his cousin at the Hôtel de Florac, where, I daresay, all the inhabitants wished he should have his desire regarding this young lady. The Colonel had talked early to Madame de Florac about this wish of his life, impossible then to gratify, because Ethel was engaged to Lord Kew. Clive, in the fullness of his heart, imparted his passion to Florac, and in answer to Paul’s offer to himself, had shown the Frenchman that kind letter in which his father bade him carry aid to “Léonore de Florac’s son,” in case he should need it. The case was all clear to the lively Paul. “Between my mother and your good Colonel there must have been an affair of the heart in the early days during the emigration.” Clive owned his father had told him as much, at least that he himself had been attached to Mademoiselle de Blois. “It is for that that her heart yearns toward thee, that I have felt myself entrained toward thee since I saw thee”—Clive momentarily expected to be kissed again. “Tell thy father that I feel—am touched by his goodness with an eternal gratitude, and love every one that loves my mother.” As far as wishes went, these two were eager promoters of Clive’s little love affair; and Madame la Princesse became equally not less willing. Clive’s good looks and good-nature had had their effects upon that good-natured woman, and he was as great a favorite with her as with her husband. And thus it happened that when Miss Ethel came to pay her visit, and sat with Madame de Florac and her grandchildren in the garden, Mr. Newcome would sometimes walk up the avenue there, and salute the ladies.

If Ethel had not wanted to see him, would she have come? Yes; she used to say she was going to Madame de Préville’s, not to Madame de Florac’s, and would insist, I have no doubt, that it was Madame de Préville whom she went to see (whose husband was a member of the Chamber of Deputies, a Conseiller d’Etat, or other French big-wig), and that she had no idea of going to meet Clive, or that he was more than a casual acquaintance at the Hôtel de Florac. There was no part of her conduct in all her life which this lady, when it was impugned, would defend more strongly than this intimacy at the Hôtel de Florac. It is not with this I quarrel especially. My fair young readers, who have seen a half-dozen of seasons, can you call to mind the time when you had such a friendship for Emma Tomkins, that you were always at the Tomkins’s, and notes were constantly passing between your house and hers? When her brother, Paget Tomkins, returned to India, did not your intimacy with Emma fall off? If your younger sister is not in the room, I know you will own as much to me. I think you are always deceiving yourselves and other people. I think the motive you put forward is very often not the real one; though you will confess, neither to yourself, nor to any human being, what the real motive is. I think that what you desire you pursue, and are as selfish in your way as your bearded fellow-creatures are. And as for the truth being in you, of all the women in a great acquaintance, I protest there are but—never mind. A perfectly honest woman, a woman who never flatters, who never manages, who never cajoles, who never conceals, who never uses her eyes, who never speculates on the effect which she produces, who never is conscious of unspoken admiration, what a monster, I say, would such a female be! Miss Hopkins, you have been a coquette since you were a year old; you worked on your papa’s friends in the nurse’s arms by the fascination of your lace frock and pretty new sash and shoes; when you could just toddle, you practiced your arts upon other children in the square, poor little lambkins sporting among the daisies; and munc in ovilia, mox in reluctantes dracones, proceeding from the lambs to reluctant dragons, you tried your arts upon Captain Paget Tomkins, who behaved so ill, and went to India without—without making those proposals which, of course, you never expected. Your intimacy was with Emma. It has cooled. Your sets are different. The Tomkins’s are not quite, etc. etc. You believe Captain Tomkins married a Miss O’Grady, etc. etc. Ah, my pretty, my sprightly Miss Hopkins, be gentle in your judgment of your neighbors!

CHAPTER XLVII.

CONTAINS TWO OR THREE ACTS OF A LITTLE COMEDY.

ALL this story is told by one, who, if he was not actually present at the circumstances here narrated, yet had information concerning them, and could supply such a narrative of facts and conversations as is, indeed, not less authentic than the details we have of other histories. How can I tell the feelings in a young lady's mind; the thoughts in a young gentleman's bosom? As Professor Owen or Professor Agassiz takes a fragment of a bone, and builds an enormous forgotten monster out of it, wallowing in primeval quagmires, tearing down leaves and branches of plants that flourished thousands of years ago, and perhaps may be coal by this time—so the novelist puts this and that together: from the footprint finds the foot; from the foot, the brute who trod on it; from the brute, the plant he browsed on, the marsh in which he swam—and thus in his humble way a physiologist too, depicts the habits, size, appearance of the beings whereof he has to treat; traces this slimy reptile through the mud, and describes his habits filthy and rapacious; prods down this butterfly with a pin, and depicts his beautiful coat and embroidered waistcoat; points out the singular structure of yonder more important animal, the megatherium of his history.

Suppose then, in the quaint old garden of the Hôtel de Florac, two young people are walking up and down in an avenue of lime-trees, which are still permitted to grow in that ancient place. In the centre of that avenue is a fountain, surmounted by a Triton so gray and moss-eaten, that though he holds his conch to his swelling lips, curling his tail in the arid basin, his instrument has had a sinecure for at least fifty years; and did not think fit even to play when the Bourbons, in whose time he was erected, came back from their exile. At the end of the lime-tree avenue is a broken-nosed damp Faun, with a marble panpipe, who pipes to the spirit ditties which I believe never had any tune. The perron of the hotel is at the other end of the avenue; a couple of Cæsars on either side of the door-window, from which the inhabitants of the hotel issue into the garden—Caracalla frowning over his mouldy shoulder at Nerva, on to whose clipped hair the roofs of the gray chateau have been dribbling for ever so many long years. There are more statues gracing this noble place. There is Cupid, who has been at the point of kissing Psyche this half century at least, though the delicious event has never come off, through all those blazing summers and dreary winters; there is Venus and her Boy under the damp little dome of a cracked old temple. Through the alley of this old garden, in which their ancestors have disported in hoops and powder, Monsieur de Florac's chair is wheeled by St. Jean, his attendant; Madame de Préville's children trot about, and skip, and play at cache-cache. The R. P. de Florac (when at home) paces up and down and meditates his sermons; Madame de Florac sadly walks sometimes to look at her roses; and Clive and Ethel Newcome are marching up and down; the children, and their bonne of course being there, jumping to and fro; and Madame de Florac, having just been called away to Monsieur le Comte, whose physician has come to see him.

Ethel says, "How charming and odd this solitude is; and how pleasant to hear the voices of the children playing in the neighboring Convent-garden," of which they can see the new Chapel rising over the trees.

Clive remarks that "the neighboring hotel has curiously changed its destination. One of the members of the Directory had it; and, no doubt, in the groves of its garden, Madame Tallien, and Madame Récamier, and Madame Beauharnais have danced under the lamps. Then a Marshal of the Empire inhabited it. Then it was restored to its legitimate owner, Monsieur le Marquis de Bricquabracque, whose descendants, having a law-suit about the Bricquabracque succession, sold the hotel to the Convent."

After some talk about nuns, Ethel says, "There were convents in England. She often thinks she would like to retire to one;" and she sighs as if her heart were in that scheme.

Clive, with a laugh, says, "Yes. If you could retire after the season, when you were very weary of the balls, a convent would be very nice. At Rome he had seen San Pietro in Montorio and Sant Onofrio, that delightful old place where Tasso died: people go and make a retreat there. In the ladies' convents, the ladies do the same thing—and he doubts whether they are much more or less wicked after their retreat, than gentlemen and ladies in England or France."

Ethel. Why do you sneer at all faith? Why should not a retreat do people good? Do you suppose the world is so satisfactory, that those who are in it never wish for a while to leave it? (She heaves a deep sigh and looks down toward a beautiful new dress of many flounces, which Madame de Flouncival, the great milliner, has sent her home that very day.)

Clive. I do not know what the world is, except from afar off. I am like the Peri who looks into Paradise and sees angels within it. I live in Charlotte Street, Fitzroy Square: which is not within the gates of Paradise. I take the gate to be somewhere in Davies Street, leading out of Oxford Street into Grosvenor Square. There's another gate in Hay Hill: and another in Bruton Street, Bond—

Ethel. Don't be a goose.

Clive. Why not? It is as good to be a goose, as to be a lady—no, a gentleman of fashion. Suppose I were a Viscount, an Earl, a Marquis, a Duke, would you say Goose? No, you would say Swan.

Ethel. Unkind and unjust!—ungenerous to make taunts which common people make: and to repeat to me those silly sarcasms which your low Radical literary friends are always putting in their books! Have I ever made any difference to you? Would I not sooner see you than the fine people? Would I talk with you, or with the young dandies most willingly? Are we not of the same blood, Clive; and of all the grandees I see about, can there be a grander gentleman than your dear old father? You need not squeeze my hand so. Those little imps are look—that has nothing to do with the question. Viens Léonore! Tu connois bien, Monsieur, n'est ce-pas? qui te fait de si jolis dessins?

Léonore. Ah, oui! Vous m'en ferez toujours n'est-ce-pas Monsieur Clive? des chevaux, et puis des petites filles avec leurs gouvernantes, et puis des maisons—et puis—et puis des maisons encore—oh est bonne Maman?

(Exit little LEONORE down an alley.)

Ethel. Do you remember when we were children, and you used to make drawings for us? I have some now that you did—in my geography book, which I used to read and read with Miss Quigley.

Clive. I remember all about our youth, Ethel.

Ethel. Tell me what you remember?

Clive. I remember one of the days, when I first saw you, I had been reading the "Arabian Nights" at school—and you came in in a bright dress of shot silk, amber and blue—and I thought you were like that fairy-princess who came out of the crystal box—because—

Ethel. Because why?

Clive. Because I always thought that fairy somehow must be the most beautiful creature in all the world—that is, 'why and because.' Do not make me May Fair courtesies. You know whether you are good-looking or not: and how long I have thought you so. I remember when I thought I would like to be Ethel's knight, and that if there was any thing she would have me do, I would try and achieve it in order to please her. I remember when I was so ignorant I did not know there was any difference in rank between us.

Ethel. Ah, Clive!

Clive. Now it is altered. Now I know the difference between a poor painter and a young lady of the world. Why haven't I a title and a great fortune? Why did I ever see you, Ethel; or, knowing the distance which it seems fate has placed between us, why have I seen you again?

Ethel (innocently). Have I ever made any difference between us? Whenever I may see you, am I not too glad? Don't I see you sometimes when I should not—no—I do not say when I should not; but when others, whom I am bound to obey, forbid me? What harm is there in my remembering old days? Why should I be ashamed of our relationship?—no, not ashamed—why should I forget it? Don't do that, Sir; we have shaken hands twice already. Léonore! Xavier!

Clive. At one moment you like me; and at the next you seem to repent it. One day you seem happy when I come; and another day you are ashamed of me. Last Tuesday, when you came with those fine ladies to the Louvre, you seemed to blush when you saw me copying at my picture; and that stupid young lord looked quite alarmed because you spoke to me. My lot in life is not very brilliant; but I would not change it against that young man's—no, not with all his chances.

Ethel. What do you mean with all his chances?

Clive. You know very well. I mean I would not be as selfish, or as dull, or as ill-educated—I won't say worse of him—not to be as handsome, or as wealthy, or as noble as he is. I swear I would not now change my place against his, or give up being Clive Newcome to be my Lord Marquis of Farintosh, with all his acres and titles of nobility.

Ethel. Why are you forever harping about Lord Farintosh and his titles? I thought it was only women who were jealous—you gentlemen say so—(Hurriedly).—I am going to-night with grandmamma to the Minister of the Interior, and then to the Russian ball; and to-morrow to the Tuileries. We dine at the Embassy first; and on Sunday, I suppose, we shall go to the Rue d'Aguesseau. I can hardly come here before Mon— Madame de Florac! Little Léonore is very like you—resembles you very much. My cousin says he longs to make a drawing of her.

Madame de Florac. My husband always likes that I should be present at his dinner. Pardon me, young people, that I have been away from you for a moment.

[Exit CLIVE, ETHEL, and Madame DE F. into the house.]

CONVERSATION II.—Scene 1.

Miss Newcome arrives in Lady Kew's carriage, which enters the court of the Hôtel de Florac.

Saint Jean. Mademoiselle—Madame la Comtesse is gone out; but Madame has charged me to say, that she will be at home to the dinner of M. le Comte, as to the ordinary.

Miss Newcome. Madame de Préville is at home?

Saint Jean. Pardon me, Madame is gone out with M. le Baron, and M. Xavier, and Mademoiselle de Préville. They are gone, Miss, I believe, to visit the parents of Monsieur le Baron; of whom, it is probably to-day the fête: for Mademoiselle Léonore carried a bouquet—no doubt for her grandpapa. Will it please Mademoiselle to enter? I think Monsieur the Count sounds me. (Bell rings.)

Miss Newcome. Madame la Prince—Madame la Vicomtesse is at home, Monsieur St. Jean? Saint Jean. I go to call the people of Madame la Vicomtesse.

[Exit old SAINT JEAN to the carriage: a Lackey comes presently in a gorgeous livery, with buttons like little cheese-plates.]

The Lackey. The Princess is at home, Miss, and will be most 'appy to see you, Miss. (Miss trips up the great stair: a gentleman out of livery has come forth to the landing, and introduces her to the apartments of Madame la Princesse.)

The Lackey to the servants on the box. Good-morning, Thomas. How dy' do, old Backstopper?

Backstopper. How de do, Jim. I say, you couldn't give a feller a drink of beer, could yer, Moncontour? It was precious wet last night, I can tell you. 'Ad to stop for three hours at the Napolitain Embassy, where we was a dancing. Me and some chaps went into Bob Parsom's and had a drain. Old Cat came out and couldn't find her carriage, not by no means, could she, Tommy? Blest if I didn't nearly drive her into a wegetable cart. I was so uncommon scruey! Who's this a hentering at your pot-coshare? Billy, my fine feller!

Clive Newcome (by the most singular coincidence). Madame la Princesse?

Lackey. We, Munseer. (He rings a bell: the gentleman in black appears as before on the landing-place up the stair.) [Exit CLIVE.] Backstopper. I say, Bill: is that young chap often a-coming about here? They'd run pretty in a curricule, wouldn't they? Miss N. and Master N. Quiet old woman! Jest look to that mare's 'ead, will you, Billy? He's a fine young feller, that is. He gave me a sowering the other night. Whenever I sor him in the Park, he was always riding an ansun hanimal. What is he? They said in our 'all he was a hartis. I can 'ardly think that. Why, there used to be a hartis come to our club, and painted two or three of my 'ossea, and my old woman too.

Lackey. There's hartises and hartises, Backstopper. Why there's some on 'em comes here with more stars on their coats than Dukes has got. Have you never 'eard of Mossyer Verny, or Mossyer Gudang?

Backstopper. They say this young gent is sweet on Miss N.; which, I guess, I wish he may git it.

Tommy. He! he! he!

Backstopper. Brayvo, Tommy. Tom ain't much of a man for conversation, but he's a precious one to drink. Do you think the young gent is sweet on her, Tommy? I sor him often prowling about our 'ouse in Queen Street, when we was in London.

Tommy. I guess he wasn't let in in Queen Street. I guess hour little Buttons was very near turned away for saying we was at home to him. I guess a footman's place is to keep his mouth hopen—no, his heyes hopen—and his mouth shut. (He lapses into silence.)

Lackey. I think Thomis is in love, Thomis is. Who was that young woman I saw you a dancing of at the Showmier, Thomis? How the young Marquis was a cuttin' of it about there! The pleace was obliged to come up and stop him dancing. His man told old Buzfuz up-stairs, that the Marquis's goings on is awful. Up till four or five every morning; blind hookey, shampaign, the dooce's own delight. That party have had I don't know how much in diamonds—and they quarrel and swear at each other, and fling plates: it's tremendous.

Tommy. Why doesn't the Marquis man mind his own affairs? He's a supersellious beast: and will no more speak to a man, except he's out-a-livery, than he would to a chimbley swip. He! Cuss him, I'd fight 'im for 'alf a crown.

Lackey. And we'd back you, Tommy. Buzfuz up-stairs ain't supersellious; nor is the Prince's walet nether. That old Sangjang's a rum old gunvor. He was in England with the Count, fifty years ago—in the hemigration—in Queen Hann's time, you know. He used to support the Old Count. He says he remembers a young Musseer Newcome then, that used to take lessons from the Shevallier, the Countess' father—there's my bell. [Exit Lackey.] Backstopper. Not a bad chap that. Sports his money very free—sings an uncommon good song.

Thomas. Pretty voice, but no cultiwation.

Lackey (who re-enters). Be here at two o'clock for Miss N. Take any thing? Come round the corner. There's a capital shop round the corner. [Exeunt Servants.]

SCENE II.

Ethel. I can't think where Madame de Moncontour has gone. How very odd it was that you should come here—that we should both come here to-day! How surprised I was to see you at the Minister's! Grandmammas was so angry! "That boy pursues us wherever we go," she said. I am sure I don't know why we shouldn't meet, Clive. It seems to be wrong even my seeing you by chance here. Do you know, Sir, what a scolding I had about—about going to Brighton with you? My grandmother did not hear of it till we were in Scotland, when that foolish maid of mine talked of it to her maid; and there was oh, such a tempest! If there were a Bastile here, she would like to lock you into it. She says that you are always upon our way—I don't know how, I am sure. She says, but for you I should have been—you know what I should have been: but I am thankful that I wasn't, and Kew has got a much nicer wife in Henrietta Pulleyn, than I could ever have been to him. She will be happier than Clara, Clive. Kew is one of the kindest creatures in the world—not very wise; not very strong: but he is just such a kind, easy, generous little man, as will make a girl like Henrietta quite happy.

Clive. But not you, Ethel?

Ethel. No, nor I him. My temper is difficult, Clive, and I fear few men would bear with me. I feel, somehow, always very lonely. How old am I? Twenty—I feel sometimes as if I was a hundred; and in the midst of all these admirations and fêtes and flatteries, so tired, oh, so tired! And yet if I don't have them, I miss them. How I wish I was religious like Madame de Florac; there is no day that she does not go to church. She is forever busy with charities, clergymen, conversions; I think the Princess will be brought over ere long—that dear old Madame de Florac! and yet she is no happier than the rest of us. Hortense is an empty little thing, who thinks of her prosy fat Camille with spectacles, and of her two children, and of nothing else in the world besides. Who is happy, Clive?

Clive. You say Barnes's wife is not.

Ethel. We are like brother and sister, so I may talk to you. Barnes is very cruel to her. At Newcome, last winter, poor Clara used to come into my room with tears in her eyes morning after morning. He calls her a fool; and seems to take a pride in humiliating her before company. My poor father has luckily taken a great liking to her; and before him, for he has grown very hot-tempered since his illness, Barnes leaves poor Clara alone. We were in hopes that the baby might make matters better, but as it is a little girl, Barnes chooses to be very much disappointed. He wants papa to give up his seat in Parliament, but he clings to that more than any thing. Oh, dear me, who is happy in the world? What a pity Lord Highgate's father had not died sooner! He and Barnes have been reconciled. I wonder my brother's spirit did not revolt against it. The old lord used to keep a great sum of money at the bank, I believe; and the present one does so still: he has paid all his debts off: and Barnes is actually friends with him. He is always abusing the Dorkings, who want to borrow money from the bank, he says. This eagerness for money is horrible. If I had been Barnes I would never have been reconciled with Mr. Belsize, never, never! And yet they say he was quite right; and grandmamma is even pleased that Lord Highgate should be asked to dine in Park Lane. Poor papa is there: come to attend his parliamentary duties as he thinks. He went to a division the other night; and was actually lifted out of his carriage and wheeled into the lobby in a chair. The ministers thanked him for coming. I believe he thinks he will have his peerage yet. Oh, what a life of vanity ours is!

Enter Madame de Moncontour. What are you young folks a-talkin' about—Balls and Operas? When first I was took to the Opera I did not like it—and fell asleep. But now, oh, it's 'eav'nly to hear Grisi sing!

The Clock. Ting, Ting!

Ethel. Two o'clock already! I must run back to grandmamma. Good-by, Madame de Moncontour; I am so sorry I have not been able to see dear Madame de Florac. I will try and come to her on Thursday—please tell her. Shall we meet you at the American minister's to-night, or at Madame de Brie's to-morrow? Friday is your own night—I hope grandmamma will bring me. How charming your last music was! Good-by, mon cousin! You shall not come down stairs with me, I insist upon it, Sir: and had much best remain here, and finish your drawing of Madame de Moncontour.

Princess. I've put on the velvet, you see, Clive—though it's very 'ot in May. Good-by, my dear. [Exit ETHEL.]

As far as we can judge from the above conversation, which we need not prolong—as the talk between Madame de Moncontour and Monsieur Clive, after a few complimentary remarks about Ethel, had nothing to do with the history of the Newcomes—as far as we can judge, the above little colloquy took place on Monday: and about Wednesday, Madame la Comtesse de Florac received a little note from Clive, in which he said, that one day when she came to the Louvre, where he was copying, she had admired a picture of a Virgin and Child, by Sasso Ferrato, since when he had been occupied in making a water-color drawing after the picture, and hoped she would be pleased to accept the copy from her affectionate and grateful servant, Clive Newcome. The drawing would be done the next day, when he would call with it in his hand. Of course Madame de Florac received this announcement very kindly; and sent back by Clive's servant a note of thanks to that young gentleman.

Now on Thursday morning, about one o'clock, by one of those singular coincidences which, etc. etc., who should come to the Hôtel de Florac but Miss Ethel Newcome? Madame la Comtesse was at home, waiting to receive Clive and his picture; but Miss Ethel's appearance frightened the good lady, so much so that she felt quite guilty at seeing the girl, whose parents might think—I don't know what they might not think—that Madame de Florac was trying to make a match between the young people. Hence arose the words uttered by the Countess, after a while, in CONVERSATION III.

Madame de Florac (at work). And so you like to quit the world, and to come to our triste old hotel? After to-day you will find it still more melancholy, my poor child.

Ethel. And why?

Madame de F. Some one who has been here to égayer our little meetings will come no more.

Ethel. Is the Abbé de Florac going to quit Paris, Madame?

Madame de F. It is not of him that I speak, thou knowest it very well, my daughter. Thou hast seen my poor Clive twice here. He will come once again, and then no more. My conscience reproaches me that I have admitted him at all. But he is like a son to me, and was so confided to me by his father. Five years ago, when we met, after an absence—of how many years!—Colonel Newcome told me what hopes he had cherished for his boy. You know well, my daughter, with whom those hopes were connected. Then he wrote me that family arrangements rendered his plans impossible—that the hand of Miss Newcome was promised elsewhere. When I heard from my son Paul how these negotiations were broken, my heart rejoiced, Ethel, for my friend's sake. I am an old woman now, who have seen the world, and all sorts of men. Men more brilliant no doubt I have known, but such a heart as his, such a faith as his, such a generosity and simplicity as Thomas Newcome's—never!

Ethel (smiling). Indeed, dear lady, I think with you.

Madame de F. I understand thy smile, my daughter. I can say to thee, that when we were children almost, I knew thy good uncle. My poor father took the pride of his family into exile with him. Our poverty only made his pride the greater. Even before the emigration a contract had been passed between our family and the Count de Florac. I could not be wanting to the word given by my father. For how many long years have I kept it! But when I see a young girl who may be made the victim—the subject of a marriage of convenience, as I was—my heart pities her. And if I love her, as I love you, I tell her my thoughts. Better poverty, Ethel: better a cell in a convent, than a union without love. Is it written eternally that men are to make slaves of us? Here in France, above all, our fathers sell us every day. And what a society ours is! Thou wilt know this when thou art married. There are some laws so cruel that nature revolts against them, and breaks them—or we die in keeping them. You smile. I have been nearly fifty years dying—n'est-ce pas?—and am here an old woman, complaining to a young girl. It is because our recollections of youth are always young, and because I have suffered so, that I would spare those I love a like grief. Do you know that the children of those who do not love in marriage seem to bear an hereditary coldness, and do not love their parents as other children do? They witness our differences and our indifferences, hear our recriminations, take one side or the other in our disputes, and are partisans for father or mother. We force ourselves to be hypocrites, and hide our wrongs from them; we speak of a bad father with false praises; we wear feint smiles over our tears and deceive our children—deceive them, do we? Even from the exercise of that pious deceit there is no woman but suffers in the estimation of her sons. They may shield her as champions against their father's selfishness or cruelty. In this case, what a war! What a home, where the son sees a tyrant in the father, and in the mother but a trembling victim! I speak not for myself—whatever may have been the course of our long wedded life, I have not to complain of these ignoble storms. But when the family chief neglects his wife, or prefers another to her, the children too, courtiers as we are, will desert her. You look incredulous about domestic love. Tenax, my child, if I may so surmise, I think you can not have seen it.

Ethel (blushing and thinking, perhaps, how she esteems her father, how her mother, and how much they esteem each other). My father and mother have been most kind to all their children, madam; and no one can say that their marriage has been otherwise than happy. My mother is the kindest and most affectionate mother, and—(Here a vision of Sir Brian alone in his room, and nobody really caring for him so much as his valet, who loves him to the extent of fifty pounds a year and perquisites; or, perhaps, Miss Cann, who reads to him, and plays a good deal of evenings, much to Sir Brian's liking—here this vision, we say, comes and stops Miss Ethel's sentence.)

Madame de F. Your father, in his infirmity—and yet he is five years younger than Colonel Newcome—is happy to have such a wife and such children. They comfort his age; they cheer his sickness; they confide their griefs and pleasures to him—is it not so? His closing days are soothed by their affection.

Ethel. Oh, no, no! And yet it is not his fault or ours that he is a stranger to us. He used to be all day at the bank, or at night in the House of Commons, or he and mamma went to parties, and we young ones remained with the governess. Mamma is very kind. I have never, almost, known her angry; never with us; about us, sometimes, with the servants. As children, we used to see papa and mamma at breakfast; and then when she was dressing to go out. Since he has been ill, she has given up all parties. I wanted to do so too. I feel ashamed in the world, sometimes, when I think of my poor father at home, alone. I wanted to stay, but my mother and my grandmother forbade me. Grandmamma has a fortune, which she says I am to have; since then they have insisted on my being with her. She is very clever, you know: she is kind too in her way; but she can not live out of society. And I, who pretend to revolt, I like it too; and I, who rail and scorn flatterers—oh, I like admiration! I am pleased when the women hate me, and the young men leave them for me. Though I despise many of these, yet I can't help drawing them toward me. One or two of them I have seen unhappy about me, and I like it; and if they are indifferent I am angry, and never tire till they come back. I love beautiful dresses; I love fine jewels; I love a great name and a fine house—oh, I despise myself, when I think of these things! When I lie in bed, and say I have been heartless and a coquette, I cry with humiliation: and then rebel and say, Why not?—and to-night—yes, to-night—after leaving you, I shall be wicked, I know I shall.

Madame de F. (sadly). One will pray for thee, my child.

Ethel (sadly). I thought I might be good once. I used to say my own prayers then. Now I speak them but by rote, and feel ashamed—yes, ashamed to speak them. Is it not horrid to say them, and next morning to be no better than you were last night? Often I revolt at these as at other things, and am dumb. The Vicar comes to see us at Newcome, and eats so much dinner, and pays us such court, and “Sir Brian’s” papa, and “Your ladyship’s” mamma. With grand-mamma I go to hear a fashionable preacher—Clive’s uncle, whose sister lets lodgings at Brighton; such a queer, blushing, pompous, honest old lady. Do you know that Clive’s aunt lets lodgings at Brighton?

Madame de F. My father was an usher in a school. Monsieur de Florac gave lessons in the emigration. Do you know in what?

Ethel. Oh, the old nobility! that is different, you know. That Mr. Honeyman is so affected that I have no patience with him!

Madame de F. (with a sigh). I wish you could attend the services of a better church. And when was it you thought you might be good, Ethel?

Ethel. When I was a girl. Before I came out. When I used to take long rides with my dear Uncle Newcome; and he used to talk to me in his sweet simple way; and he said I reminded him of some one he once knew.

Madame de F. Who—who was that, Ethel?

Ethel (looking up at Gerard’s picture of the Countess de Florac). What odd dresses you wore in the time of the Empire, Madame de Florac! How could you ever have such high waists, and such wonderful frâises! (MADAME DE FLORAC kisses ETHEL. Tableau.)

Enter SAINT JEAN, preceding a gentleman with a drawing-board under his arm.

Saint Jean. Monsieur Clave!

[Exit SAINT JEAN.]

Clive. How do you do, Madame le Comtesse? Mademoiselle, j’ai l’honneur de vous souhaiter le bon jour.

Madame de F. Do you come from the Louvre? Have you finished that beautiful copy, mon ami?

Clive. I have brought it for you. It is not very good. There are always so many petites demoiselles copying that Sasso Ferrato; and they chatter about it so, and hop from one easel to another; and the young artists are always coming to give them advice—so that there is no getting a good look at the picture. But I have brought you the sketch; and am so pleased that you asked for it.

Madame de F. (surveying the sketch). It is charming—charming! What shall we give to our painter for his chef-d’œuvre?

Clive (kisses her hand). There is my pay! And you will be glad to hear that two of my portraits have been received at the Exhibition. My uncle, the clergyman, and Mr. Butta, of the Life-Guards.

Ethel. Mr. Butta—quel nom! Je ne connois aucun M. Butta!

Clive. He has a famous head to draw. They refused Crackthorpe, and—and one or two other heads I sent in.

Ethel (tossing up hers). Miss Mackenzie’s, I suppose!

Clive. Yes, Miss Mackenzie’s. It is a sweet little face; too delicate for my hand though.

Ethel. So is a wax-doll’s a pretty face. Pink cheeks; china-blue eyes; and hair the color of old Madame Hempensfeld’s—not her last hair—her last but one. (She goes to a window that looks into the court.)

Clive (to the Countess). Miss Mackenzie speaks more respectfully of other people’s eyes and hair. She thinks there is nobody in the world to compare to Miss Newcome.

Madame de F. (aside). And you, mon ami? This is the last time, entendez-vous? You must never come here again. If M. le Comte knew it he never would pardon me. Encore! (He kisses her ladyship’s hand again.)

Clive. A good action gains to be repeated. Miss Newcome, does the view of the court-yard please you? The old trees and the garden are better. That dear old Faun without a nose! I must have a sketch of him: the creepers round the base are beautiful.

Miss N. I was looking to see if the carriage had come for me. It is time that I return home.

Clive. That is my Brougham. May I carry you any where? I hire him by the hour; and I will carry you to the end of the world.

Miss N. Where are you going, Madame de Florac?—to show that sketch to M. le Comte? Dear me! I don’t fancy that M. de Florac can care for such things! I am sure I have seen many as pretty on the quays for twenty-five sous. I wonder the carriage is not come for me.

Clive. You can take mine without my company, as that seems not to please you.

Miss N. Your company is sometimes very pleasant—when you please. Sometimes, as last night, for instance, you are not particularly lively.

Clive. Last night, after moving heaven and earth to get an invitation to Madame de Brie—I say, heaven and earth, that is a French phrase—I arrive there: I find Miss Newcome engaged for almost every dance, walking with M. de Klingenspohr, galloping with Count de Capri, galloping and waltzing with the most noble the Marquis of Farintosh. She will scarce speak to me during the evening; and when I wait till midnight, her grandmamma whisks her home, and I am left alone for my pains. Lady Kew is in one of her high moods, and the only words she condescends to say to me are, “Oh, I thought you had returned to London,” with which she turns her venerable back upon me.

Miss N. A fortnight ago you said you were going to London. You said the copies you were about here would not take you another week, and that was three weeks since.

Clive. It were best I had gone.

Miss N. If you think so, I can not but think so.

Clive. Why do I stay and hover about you, and follow you—you know I follow you. Can I live on a smile vouchsafed twice a-week, and no brighter than you give to all the world? What do I get, but to hear your beauty praised, and to see you, night after night, happy and smiling and triumphant, the partner of other men? Does it add zest to your triumph, to think that I behold it? I believe you would like a crowd of us to pursue you.

Miss N. To pursue me; and if they find me alone by chance, to compliment me with such speeches as you make? That would be pleasant indeed! Answer me here in return, Clive. Have I ever disguised from any of my friends the regard I have for you? Why should I? Have not I taken your part when you were maligned? In former days, when—when Lord Kew asked me, as he had a right to do then—I said it was as a brother I held you; and always would. If I have been wrong, it has been for two or three times in seeing you at all—or seeing you thus; in letting you speak to me as you do—injure me as you do. Do you think I have not had hard enough words said to me about you, but that you must attack me too in turn? Last night only, because you were at the ball. It was very, very wrong of me to tell you I was going there. As we went home, Lady Kew—Go, Sir. I never thought you would have seen in me this humiliation.

Clive. Is it possible that I should have made Ethel Newcome shed tears? O, dry them, dry them. Forgive me, Ethel, forgive me! I have no right to jealousy, or to reproach you—I know that. If others admire you, surely I ought to know that they—they do but as I do: I should be proud, not angry, that they admire my Ethel—my sister, if you can be no more.

Ethel. I will be that always, whatever harsh things you think or say of me. There, Sir, I am not going to be so foolish as to cry again. Have you been studying very hard? Are your pictures good at the Exhibition? I like you with your mustaches best, and order you not to cut them off again. The young men here wear them. I hardly knew Charles Beardmore when he arrived from Berlin the other day, like a sapper and miner. His little sisters cried out, and were quite frightened by his apparition. Why are you not in diplomacy? That day, at Brighton, when Lord Farintosh asked whether you were in the army? I thought to myself, why is he not?

Clive. A man in the army may pretend to any thing, n'est-ce-pas? He wears a lovely uniform. He may be a General, a K.C.B., a Viscount, an Earl. He may be valiant in arms, and wanting a leg, like the lover in the song. It is peace-time, you say? so much the worse career for a soldier. My father would not have me, he said, forever dangling in barracks, or smoking in country billiard rooms. I have no taste for law: and as for diplomacy, I have no relations in the Cabinet, and no uncles in the House of Peers. Could my uncle, who is in Parliament, help me much, do you think; or would he, if he could?—or Barnes, his noble son and heir, after him?

Ethel (musing). Barnes would not, perhaps, but papa might even still, and you have friends who are fond of you.

Clive. No—one can help me; and my art, Ethel, is not only my choice and my love, but my honor too. I shall never distinguish myself in it: I may take smart likenesses, but that is all. I am not fit to grind my friend Ridley's colors for him. Nor would my father, who loves his own profession so, make a good general probably. He always says so. I thought better of myself when I began as a boy; and was a conceited youngster, expecting to carry it all before me. But as I walked the Vatican, and looked at Raphael, and at the great Michael—I knew I was but a poor little creature; and in contemplating his genius, shrunk up till I felt myself as small as a man looks under the dome of St. Peter's. Why should I wish to have a great genius? Yes, there is one reason why I should like to have it.

Ethel. And that is?

Clive. To give it you, if it pleased you, Ethel. But I might wish for the roc's egg: there is no way of robbing the bird. I must take a humble place, and you want a brilliant one. A brilliant one! Oh, Ethel, what a standard we folks measure fame by! To have your name in the "Morning Post," and to go to three balls every night. To have your dress described at the Drawing Room; and your arrival, from a round of visits in the country, at your town house; and the entertainment of the Marchioness of Farin—

Ethel. Sir, if you please, no calling names.

Clive. I wonder at it. For you are in the world, and you love the world, whatever you may say. And I wonder that one of your strength of mind should so care for it. I think my simple old father is much finer than all your grandees: his single-mindedness more lofty than all their bowing, and haughtiness, and scheming. What are you thinking of, as you stand in that pretty attitude, like Mnemosyne—with your finger on your chin?

Ethel. Mnemosyne! who was she? I think I like you best when you are quiet and gentle, and not when you are flaming out and sarcastic, Sir. And so you think you will never be a famous painter? They are quite in society here. I was so pleased, because two of them dined at the Tuileries when grandmamma was there; and she mistook one, who was covered all over with crosses, for an ambassador, I believe, till the Queen called him Monsieur Delaroche. She says, there is no knowing people in this country. And do you think you will never be able to paint as well as M. Delaroche?

Clive. No—never.

Ethel. And—and—you will never give up painting?

Clive. No—never. That would be like leaving your friend who was poor; or deserting your mistress, because you were disappointed about her money. They do those things in the great world, Ethel.

Ethel (with a sigh). Yes.

Clive. If it is so false, and base, and hollow, this great world—if its aims are so mean, its successes so paltry, the sacrifices it asks of you so degrading, the pleasures it gives you so wearisome, shameful even, why does Ethel Newcome cling to it? Will you be fairer, dear, with any other name than your own? Will you be happier, after a month, at bearing a great title, with a man whom you can't esteem, tied forever to you, to be the father of Ethel's children, and the lord and master of her life and actions? The proudest woman in the world consent to bend herself to this ignominy, and own that a coronet is a bribe sufficient for her honor! What is the end of a Christian life, Ethel; a girl's pure nurture—it can't be this! Last week, as we walked in the garden here, and heard the nuns singing in their chapel, you said how hard it was that poor women should be imprisoned so, and were thankful that in England we had abolished that slavery. Then you cast your eyes to the ground, and mused as you paced the walk; and thought, I know, that perhaps their lot was better than some others'.

Ethel. Yes, I did. I was thinking, that almost all women are made slaves one way or other, and that these poor nuns perhaps were better off than we are.

Clive. I never will quarrel with nun or matron for following her vocation. But for our women, who are free, why should they rebel against Nature, shut their hearts up, sell their lives for rank and money, and forego the most precious right of their liberty? Look, Ethel, dear. I love you so, that if I thought another had your heart, an honest man, a loyal gentleman, like—like him of last year even, I think I could go back with a God bless you, and take to my pictures again, and work on in my own humble way. You seem like a queen to me, somehow; and I am but a poor, humble fellow, who might be happy, I think, if you were. In those balls, where I have seen you surrounded by those brilliant young men, noble and wealthy, admirers like me, I have often thought, "How could I aspire to such a creature, and ask her to forego a palace to share the crust of a poor painter?"

Ethel. You spoke quite scornfully of palaces just now, Clive. I won't say a word about the—the regard which you express for me. I think you have it. Indeed, I do. But it were best not said, Clive; best for me, perhaps, not to own that I know it. In your speeches, my poor boy—and you will please not to make any more, or I never can see you or speak to you again, never—you forgot one part of a girl's duty; obedience to her parents. They would never agree to my marrying any one below—any one whose union would not be advantageous in a worldly point of view. I never would give such pain to the poor father, or to the kind soul who never said a harsh word to me since I was born. My grandmother is kind, too, in her way. I came to her of my own free will. When she said she would leave me her fortune, do you think it was for myself alone that I was glad? My father's passion is to make an estate, and all my brothers and sisters will be but slenderly portioned. Lady Kew said she would help them if I came to her—and—it is the welfare of those little people that depends upon me, Clive. Now do you see, brother, why you must speak to me so no more? There is the carriage. God bless you, dear Clive.

(Clive sees the carriage drive away after Miss Newcome has entered it without once looking up to the window where he stands. When it is gone, he goes to the opposite windows of the salon, which are open, toward the garden. The chapel music begins to play from the convent, next door. As he hears it, he sinks down, his head in his hands.)

Enter Madame de Florac. (She goes to him with anxious looks.) What hast thou, my child? Hast thou spoken?

Clive (very steadily). Yes.

Madame de F. And she loves thee? I know she loves thee.

Clive. You hear the organ of the convent?

Madame de F. Qu'as-tu?

Clive. I might as well hope to marry one of the sisters of yonder convent, dear lady. (He sinks down again, and she kisses him.)

Clive. I never had a mother; but you seem like one.

Madame de F. Mon fils, O mon fils!

THE REDEEMED PROFLIGATE.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

IN the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, a young man came limping down, on foot, to the town of Chatham. He was a poor traveler, with not a farthing in his pocket. He came down to Chatham to enlist in a cavalry regiment, if a cavalry regiment would have him; if not, to take King George's shilling from any corporal or sergeant who would put a bunch of ribbons in his hat. His object was, to get shot; but he thought he might as well ride to death as be at the trouble of walking.

His name was Richard, but he was better known as Dick. He dropped his own surname on the road down, and took up that of Doubledick. He was passed as Richard Doubledick; age twenty-two; height, five feet ten; native place, Exmouth; which he had never been near in his life. There was no cavalry in Chatham when he limped over the bridge with half a shoe to his dusty foot, so he enlisted into a regiment of the line, and was glad to get drunk and forget all about it.

This young man had gone wrong and run wild. His heart was in the right place, but it was sealed up. He had been betrothed to a good and beautiful girl, whom he had loved better than she—or perhaps even he—believed; but, in an evil hour, he had given her cause to say to him, solemnly, "Richard, I will never marry any other man. I will live single for your sake, but Mary Marshall's lips"—her name was Mary Marshall—"never shall address another word to you on earth. Go, Richard! Heaven forgive you!" This finished him. This brought him down to Chatham. This made him Private Richard Doubledick, with a determination to be shot.

There was not a more dissipated and reckless soldier in Chatham barracks in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, than Private Richard Doubledick. He associated with the dregs of every regiment, he was as seldom sober as he could be, and was constantly under punishment. It became clear to the whole barracks that Private Richard Doubledick would very soon be flogged.

Now, the Captain of Richard Doubledick's company was a young gentleman not above five years his senior, whose eyes had an expression in them which affected Private Richard Doubledick in a very remarkable way. They were bright, handsome, dark eyes—what are called laughing eyes generally, and, when serious, rather steady than severe—but they were the only eyes now left in his narrowed world that Private Richard Doubledick could not stand. Unabashed by evil report and punishment, defiant of every thing else and every body else, he had but to know that those eyes looked at him for a moment, and he felt ashamed. He could not so much as salute Captain Taunton in the street, like any other officer. He was reproached and confused—troubled by the mere possibility of the Captain's looking at him. In his worst moments he would rather turn back and go any distance out of his way, than encounter those two handsome, dark, bright eyes.

One day, when Private Richard Doubledick came out of the Black Hole, where he had been passing the last eight-and-forty hours, and in which retreat he spent a good deal of his time, he was ordered to betake himself to Captain Taunton's quarters. In the stale and squalid state of a man just out of the Black Hole, he had less fancy than ever for being seen by the Captain; but he was not so mad yet as to disobey orders, and consequently went up to the terrace overlooking the parade-ground, where the officers' quarters were: twisting and breaking in his hands as he went along, a bit of the straw that had formed the decorative furniture of the Black Hole.

"Come in!" cried the Captain, when he knocked with his knuckles at the door. Private Richard Doubledick pulled off his cap, took a stride forward, and felt very conscious that he stood in the light of the dark bright eyes.

There was a silent pause. Private Richard Doubledick had put the straw in his mouth, and was gradually doubling it up into his wind-pipe and choking himself.

"Doubledick," said the Captain, "do you know where you are going to?"

"To the Devil, Sir!" faltered Doubledick.

"Yes," returned the Captain. "And very fast."

Private Richard Doubledick turned the straw of the Black Hole in his mouth, and made a miserable salute of acquiescence.

"Doubledick," said the Captain, "since I entered his Majesty's service, a boy of seventeen, I have been pained to see many men of promise going that road; but I have never been so pained to see a man determined to make the shameful journey, as I have been, ever since you joined the regiment, to see you."

Private Richard Doubledick began to find a film stealing over the floor at which he looked; also to find the legs of the Captain's breakfast-table turning crooked, as if he saw them through water.

"I am only a common soldier, Sir," said he. "It signifies very little what such a poor brute comes to."

"You are a man," returned the Captain with grave indignation, "of education and superior advantages; and if you say that, meaning what you say, you have sunk lower than I had believed. How low that must be, I leave you to consider: knowing what I know of your disgrace, and seeing what I see."

"I hope to get shot soon, Sir," said Private Richard Doubledick; "and then the regiment, and the world together, will be rid of me."

The legs of the table were becoming very crooked. Doubledick, looking up to steady his vision, met the eyes that had so strong an influence over him. He put his hand before his own eyes, and the breast of his disgrace-jacket swelled as if it would fly asunder.

"I would rather," said the young Captain, "see this in you, Doubledick, than I would see five thousand guineas counted out upon this table for a gift to my good mother. Have you a mother?"

"I am thankful to say she is dead, Sir."

"If your praises," returned the Captain, "were sounded from mouth to mouth through the whole regiment, through the whole army, through the whole country, you would wish she had lived to say with pride and joy, 'He is my son!'"

"Spare me, Sir," said Doubledick. "She would never have heard any good of me. She would never have had any pride and joy in owning herself my mother. Love and compassion she might have had, and would have always had, I know; but not—Spare me, Sir! I am a broken wretch, quite at your mercy!" And he turned his face to the wall, and stretched out his imploring hand.

"My friend—" began the Captain.

"God bless you, Sir!" sobbed Private Richard Doubledick.

"You are at the crisis of your fate. Hold your course unchanged, a little longer, and you know what must happen. I know even better than you can imagine, that after that has happened, you are lost. No man who could shed those tears, could bear those marks."

"I fully believe it, Sir," in a low, shivering voice, said Private Richard Doubledick.

"But a man in any station can do his duty," said the young Captain, "and, in doing it, can earn his own respect, even if his case should be so very unfortunate and so very rare, that he can earn no other man's. A common soldier, poor brute though you called him just now, has this advantage in the stormy times we live in, that he always does his duty before a host of sympathizing witnesses. Do you doubt that he may so do it as to be extolled through a whole regiment, through a whole army, through a whole country? Turn while you may yet retrieve the past, and try."

"I will! I ask for only one witness, Sir," cried Richard, with a bursting heart.

"I understand you. I will be a watchful and a faithful one."

I have heard from Private Richard Doubledick's own lips, that he dropped down upon his knee, kissed that officer's hand, arose, and went out of the light of the dark bright eyes, an altered man.

In that year, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, the French were in Egypt, in Italy, in Germany, where not? Napoleon Bonaparte had likewise begun to stir against us in India, and most men could read the signs of the great troubles that were coming on. In the very next year, when we formed an alliance with Austria against him, Captain Taunton's regiment was on service in India. And there was not a finer non-commissioned officer in it—no, nor in the whole line—than Corporal Richard Doubledick.

In eighteen hundred and one, the Indian army were on the coast of Egypt. Next year was the year of the proclamation of the short peace, and they were recalled. It had then become well known to thousands of men, that wherever Captain Taunton with the dark bright eyes, led, there, close to him, ever at his side, firm as a rock, true as the sun, and brave as Mars, would be certain to be found, while life beat in their hearts, that famous soldier, Sergeant Richard Doubledick.

Eighteen hundred and five, besides being the great year of Trafalgar, was a year of hard fighting in India. That year saw such wonders done by a Sergeant-Major, who cut his way single-handed through a solid mass of men, recovered the colors of his regiment which had been seized from the hand of a poor boy shot through the heart, and rescued his wounded captain, who was down, and in a very jungle of horses' hoofs and sabres—saw such wonders done, I say, by this brave Sergeant-Major, that he was specially made the bearer of the colors he had won; and Ensign Richard Doubledick had risen from the ranks.

Sorely cut up in every battle, but always re-inspired by the bravest of men—for, the fame of following the old colors, shot through and through, which Ensign Richard Doubledick had saved, inspired all breasts—this regiment fought its way through the Peninsular war, up to the investment of Badajos in eighteen hundred and twelve. Again and again it had been cheered through the British ranks until the tears had sprung into men's eyes at the mere hearing of the mighty British voice so exultant in their valor; and there was not a drummer-boy but knew the legend, that wherever the two friends, Major Taunton with the dark bright eyes, and Ensign Richard Doubledick who was devoted to him, were seen to go, there the boldest spirits in the English army became wild to follow.

One day, at Badajos—not in the great storming, but in repelling a hot sally of the besieged upon our men at work in the trenches, who had given way, the two officers found themselves hurrying forward, face to face, against a party of French infantry who made a stand. There was an officer at their head, encouraging his men—a courageous, handsome, gallant officer, of five-and-thirty—whom Doubledick saw hurriedly, almost momentarily, but saw well. He particularly noticed this officer waving his sword, and rallying his men with an eager and excited cry, when they fired in obedience to his gesture, and Major Taunton dropped.

It was over in ten minutes more, and Doubledick returned to the spot where he had laid the best friend man ever had, on a coat spread upon the wet clay. Major Taunton's uniform was opened at the breast, and on his shirt were three little spots of blood.

"Dear Doubledick," said he, "I am dying."

"For the love of Heaven, no!" exclaimed the other, kneeling down beside him, and passing his arm round his neck to raise his head. "Taunton! My preserver, my guardian angel, my witness! Dearest, truest, kindest of human beings! Taunton! For God's sake!"

The bright dark eyes—so very, very dark now, in the pale face—smiled upon him; and the hand he had kissed thirteen years ago, laid itself fondly on his breast.

"Write to my mother. You will see Home again. Tell her how we became friends. It will comfort her, as it comforts me."

He spoke no more, but faintly signed for a moment toward his hair as it fluttered in the wind. The Ensign understood him. He smiled again when he saw that, and gently turning his face over on the supporting arm, as if for rest, died, with his hand upon the breast in which he had revived a soul.

No dry eye looked on Ensign Richard Doubledick that melancholy day. He buried his friend on the field, and became a lone, bereaved man. Beyond his duty he appeared to have but two remaining cares in life; one, to preserve the little packet of hair he was to give to Taunton's mother; the other, to encounter that French officer who had rallied the men under whose fire Taunton fell. A new legend now began to circulate among our troops; and it was, that when he and the French officer came face to face once more, there would be weeping in France.

The war went on—and through it went the exact picture of the French officer on the one side, and the bodily reality upon the other—until the battle of Toulouse was fought. In the returns sent home, appeared these words: "Severely wounded, but not dangerously, Lieutenant Richard Doubledick."

At Midsummer time, in the year eighteen hundred and fourteen, Lieutenant Richard Doubledick, now a browned soldier, seven and thirty years of age, came home to England, invalided. He brought the hair with him, near his heart. Many a French officer had he seen since that day; many a dreadful night, in searching with men and lanterns for his wounded, had he relieved French officers lying disabled; but the mental picture and the reality had never come together.

Though he was weak and suffered pain, he lost not an hour in getting down to Frome, in Somersetshire, where Taunton's mother lived. In the sweet, compassionate words of the inspired writer, "he was the only son of his mother, and she was a widow."

It was a Sunday evening, and the lady sat at her quiet garden window, reading the Bible; reading to herself, in a trembling voice, that very passage in it, as I have heard him tell. He heard the words: "Young man, I say unto thee, arise!"

He had to pass the window; and the bright dark eyes of his debased time seemed to look at him. Her heart told her who he was; she came to the door, quickly, and fell upon his neck.

"He saved me from ruin, made me a human creature, won me from infamy and shame. Oh, God forever bless him! As He will, He will!"

"He will!" the lady answered. "I know he is in Heaven!" Then she piteously cried, "But, oh, my darling boy, my darling boy!"

Never, from the hour when Private Richard Doubledick enlisted at Chatham, had the Private, Corporal, Sergeant, Sergeant-Major, Ensign, or Lieutenant, breathed his right name, or the name of Mary Marshall, or a word of the story of his life, into any ear, except his reclaimer's. That previous scene in his existence was closed. He had firmly resolved that his expiation should be, to live unknown; to disturb no more the peace that had long grown over his old offenses; to let it be revealed when he was dead, that he had striven and suffered, and had never forgotten; and then, if they could forgive him and believe him—well, it would be time enough—time enough!

But, that night, remembering the words he had cherished for two years, "Tell her how we became friends. It will comfort her, as it comforts me," he related every thing. It gradually seemed to him, as if in his maturity he had recovered a mother; it gradually seemed to her, as if in her bereavement she had found a son. During his stay in England, the quiet garden into which he had slowly and painfully crept, a stranger, became the boundary of his home; when he was able to rejoin his regiment in the spring, he left the garden, thinking, was this indeed the first time he had ever turned his face toward the old colors with a woman's blessing!

He followed them—so ragged, so scarred and pierced now, that they would scarcely hold together—to Quatre Bras, and Ligny. He stood beside them, in an awful stillness of many men, shadowy through the mist and drizzle of a wet June forenoon, on the field of Waterloo. And down to that hour, the picture in his mind of the French officer had never been compared with the reality.

The famous regiment was in action early in the battle, and received its first check in many an eventful year, when he was seen to fall. But it swept on to avenge him, and left behind it no such creature in the world of consciousness as Lieutenant Richard Doubledick.

Through pits of mire, and pools of rain; along deep ditches, once roads, that were pounded and plowed to pieces by artillery, heavy wagons, tramp of men and horses, and the struggle of every wheeled thing that could carry wounded soldiers; jolted among the dying and the dead, so disfigured by blood and mud as to be hardly recognizable for humanity; undisturbed by the moaning of men and the shrieking of horses, which, newly taken from the peaceful pursuits of life, could not endure the sight of the stragglers lying by the wayside, never to resume their toilsome journey; dead, as to any sentient life that was in it, and yet alive; the form that had been Lieutenant Richard Doubledick, with whose praises England rang, was conveyed to Brussels. There, it was tenderly laid down in hospital; and there it lay, week after week, through the long bright summer days, until the harvest, spared by war, had ripened and was gathered in.

Over and over again, the sun rose and set upon the crowded city; over and over again, the moonlight nights were quiet on the plains of Waterloo; and all that time was a blank to what had been Lieutenant Richard Doubledick. Rejoicing troops marched into Brussels, and marched out; brothers and fathers, sisters, mothers, and wives came thronging thither, drew their lots of joy or agony, and departed; so many times a day the bells rang; so many times the shadows of the great buildings changed; so many lights sprang up at dusk; so many feet passed here and there upon the pavements; so many hours of sleep and cooler air of night succeeded: indifferent to all, a marble face lay on a bed, like the face of a recumbent statue on the tomb of Lieutenant Richard Doubledick.

Slowly laboring, at last, through a long, heavy dream of confused time and place, representing faint glimpses of army surgeons whom he knew, and of faces that had been familiar to his youth—dearest and kindest among them, Mary Marshall's, with a solicitude upon it more like reality than any thing he could discern—

Lieutenant Richard Doubledick came back to life. To the beautiful life of a calm autumn-evening sunset. To the peaceful life of a fresh quiet room with a large window standing open; a balcony beyond, in which were moving leaves and sweet-smelling flowers; beyond again, the clear sky, with the sun full in his sight, pouring its golden radiance on his bed.

It was so tranquil and so lovely that he thought he had passed into another world; and he said, in a faint voice, "Taunton, are you near me?"

A face bent over him. Not his; his mother's.

"I came to nurse you. We have nursed you many weeks. You were moved here long ago. Do you remember nothing?"

"Nothing."

The lady kissed his cheek, and held his hand, soothing him.

"Where is the regiment? What has happened? Let me call you mother. What has happened, mother?"

"A great victory, dear. The war is over, and the regiment was the bravest in the field."

His eyes kindled, his lips trembled, he sobbed, and the tears ran down his face. He was very weak; too weak to move his hand.

"Was it dark just now?" he asked presently.

"No."

"It was only dark to me? Something passed away, like a black shadow. But, as it went, and the sun—oh, the blessed sun, how beautiful it is!—touched my face, I thought I saw a light white cloud pass out at the door. Was there nothing that went out?"

She shook her head, and, in a little while, he fell asleep: she still holding his hand, and soothing him:

From that time he recovered. Slowly, for he had been desperately wounded in the head, and had been shot in the body; but making some little advance every day. When he had gained sufficient strength to converse as he lay in bed, he soon began to remark that Mrs. Taunton always brought him back to his own history. Then he recalled his preserver's dying words, and thought, "it comforts her."

One day, he awoke out of a sleep, refreshed, and asked her to read to him. But the curtain of the bed, softening the light, which she always drew back when he awoke, that she might see him from her table at the bedside where she sat at work, was held undrawn; and a woman's voice spoke, which was not hers.

"Can you bear to see a stranger?" it said softly. "Will you like to see a stranger?"

"Stranger!" he repeated. The voice awoke old memories, before the days of Private Richard Doubledick.

"A stranger now, but not a stranger once," it said in tones that thrilled him. "Richard, dear Richard, lost through so many years, my name—"

He cried out her name, "Mary!" and she held him in her arms, and his head lay on her bosom.

"I am not breaking a rash vow, Richard.

These are not Mary Marshall's lips that speak. I have another name."

She was married.

"I have another name, Richard. Did you ever hear it?"

"Never!"

He looked into her face, so pensively beautiful, and wondered at the smile upon it through her tears.

"Think again, Richard. Are you sure you never heard my altered name?"

"Never!"

"Don't move your head to look at me, dear Richard. Let it lie here, while I tell my story. I loved a generous, noble man; loved him with my whole heart; loved him for years and years; loved him faithfully, devotedly; loved him with no hope of return; loved him, knowing nothing of his highest qualities—not even knowing that he was alive. He was a brave soldier. He was honored and beloved by thousands of thousands, when the mother of his dear friend found me, and showed me that in all his triumphs he had never forgotten me. He was wounded in a great battle. He was brought, dying, here, into Brussels. I came to watch and tend him, as I would have joyfully gone, with such a purpose, to the dreariest ends of the earth. When he knew no one else, he knew me. When he suffered most, he bore his sufferings barely murmuring, content to rest his head where yours rests now. When he lay at the point of death, he married me, that he might call me Wife before he died. And the name, my dear love, that I took on that forgotten night—"

"I know it now!" he sobbed. "The shadowy remembrance strengthens. It is come back. I thank Heaven that my mind is quite restored! My Mary, kiss me; lull this weary head to rest, or I shall die of gratitude. His parting words are fulfilled. I see Home again!"

Well! They were happy. It was a long recovery, but they were happy through it all. The snow had melted on the ground, and the birds were singing in the leafless thickets of the early spring, when those three were first able to ride out together, and when people flocked about the open carriage to cheer and congratulate Captain Richard Doubledick.

But, even then, it became necessary for the Captain, instead of returning to England, to complete his recovery in the climate of Southern France. They found a spot upon the Rhone, within a ride of the old town of Avignon, and within view of its broken bridge, which was all they could desire; they lived there, together, six months; then returned to England: Mrs. Taunton, growing old after three years—though not so old as that her bright dark eyes were dimmed—and remembering that her strength had been benefited by the change, resolved to go back for a year to those parts. So she went with a faithful servant, who had often carried her son in his arms; and she was to be rejoined and escorted home, at the year's end, by Captain Richard Doubledick.

She wrote regularly to her children (as she called them now), and they to her. She went to the neighborhood of Aix; and there, in their own chateau, near the farmer's house she rented, she grew into intimacy with a family belonging to that part of France. The intimacy began in her often meeting among the vineyards a pretty child: a girl with a most compassionate heart, who was never tired of listening to the solitary English lady's stories of her poor son and the cruel wars. The family were as gentle as the child, and at length she came to know them so well, that she accepted their invitation to pass the last month of her residence abroad under their roof. All this intelligence she wrote home, piecemeal, as it came about, from time to time; and, at last, inclosed a polite note from the head of the chateau, soliciting, on the occasion of his approaching mission to that neighborhood, the honor of the company of cet homme si justement célèbre, Monsieur le Capitaine Richard Doubledick.

Captain Doubledick, now a hardy, handsome man in the full vigor of life, broader across the chest and shoulders than he had ever been before, dispatched a courteous reply, and followed it in person. Traveling through all that extent of country after three years of Peace, he blessed the better days on which the world had fallen. The corn was golden, not drenched in unnatural red; was bound in sheaves for food, not trodden under foot by men in mortal fight. The smoke rose up from peaceful hearths, not blazing ruins. The carts were laden with the fair fruits of the earth, not with wounds and death. To him who had so often seen the terrible reverse, these things were beautiful indeed, and they brought him in a softened spirit to the old chateau near Aix, upon a deep blue evening.

It was a large chateau of the genuine old ghostly kind, with round towers and extinguishers and a high leaden roof, and more windows than Aladdin's Palace. The lattice blinds were all thrown open, after the heat of the day, and there were glimpses of rambling walls and corridors within. Then, there were immense outbuildings fallen into partial decay, masses of dark trees, terrace-gardens, balustrades; tanks of water, too weak to play, and too dirty to work; statues, weeds, and thickets of iron-railing that seemed to have overgrown themselves like the shrubberies, and to have branched out in all manner of wild shapes. The entrance doors stood open, as doors often do in that country when the heat of the day is past; and the Captain saw no bell or knocker, and walked in.

He walked into a lofty stone hall, refreshingly cool and gloomy after the glare of a Southern day's travel. Extending along the four sides of this hall, was a gallery, leading to suits of rooms; and it was lighted from the top. Still, no bell was to be seen.

"Faith," said the Captain, halting, aahamed of the clanking of his boots, "this is a ghostly beginning!"

He started back, and felt his face turn white. In the gallery, looking down at him, stood the French officer; the officer whose picture he had carried in his mind so long and so far. Compared with the original, at last—in every lineament how like it was!

He moved, and disappeared, and Captain Richard Doubledick heard his steps coming quickly down into the hall. He entered through an archway. There was a bright, sudden look upon his face. Much such a look as it had worn in that fatal moment.

Monsieur le Capitaine Richard Doubledick? Enchanted to receive him! A thousand apologies! The servants were all out in the air. There was a little fête among them in the garden. In effect, it was the fête day of my daughter, the little cherished and protected of Madame Taunton.

He was so gracious and so frank, that Monsieur le Capitaine Richard Doubledick could not withhold his hand. "It is the hand of a brave Englishman," said the French officer, retaining it while he spoke. "I could respect a brave Englishman, even as my foe; 'how much more as my friend! I, also, am a soldier."

"He has not remembered me, as I have remembered him; he did not take such note of my face, that day, as I took of his," thought Captain Richard Doubledick. "How shall I tell him!"

The French officer conducted his guest into a garden, and presented him to his wife—an engaging and beautiful woman, sitting with Mrs. Taunton in a whimsical old-fashioned pavilion. His daughter, her fair young face beaming with joy, came running to embrace him; and there was a boy-baby to tumble down among the orange-trees on the broad steps, in making for his father's legs. A multitude of children-visitors were dancing to sprightly music; and all the servants and peasants about the chateau were dancing too. It was a scene of innocent happiness that might have been invented for the climax of the scenes of Peace which had soothed the Captain's journey.

He looked on, greatly troubled in his mind, until a resounding bell rang, and the French officer begged to show him his rooms. They went up-stairs into the gallery from which the officer had looked down; and Monsieur le Capitaine Richard Doubledick was cordially welcomed to a grand outer chamber, and a smaller one within, all clocks, and draperies, and hearths, and brazen dogs, and tiles, and cool devices, and elegance, and vastness.

"You were at Waterloo," said the French officer.

"I was," said Captain Richard Doubledick. "And at Badajos."

Left alone with the sound of his own stern voice in his ears, he sat down to consider, What shall I do, and how shall I tell him? At that time, unhappily, many deplorable duels had been fought between English and French officers, arising out of the recent war; and these duels, and how to avoid this officer's hospitality, were the uppermost thought in Captain Richard Doubledick's mind.

He was thinking, and letting the time run out in which he should have dressed for dinner, when Mrs. Taunton spoke to him outside the door, asking if he could give her the letter he had brought from Mary? "His mother above all," the Captain thought. "How shall I tell her?"

"You will form a friendship with your host, I hope," said Mrs. Taunton, whom he hurriedly admitted, "that will last for life. He is so true-hearted and so generous, Richard, that you can hardly fail to esteem one another. If He had been spared," she kissed (not without tears) the locket in which she wore his hair, "he would have appreciated him with his own magnanimity, and would have been truly happy that the evil days were past, which made such a man his enemy."

She left the room; and the Captain walked, first to one window whence he could see the dancing in the garden, then to another window whence he could see the smiling prospect and the peaceful vineyards.

"Spirit of my departed friend," said he, "is it through thee these better thoughts are rising in my mind! Is it thou who hast shown me, all the way I have been drawn to meet this man, the blessings of the altered time! Is it thou who hast sent thy stricken mother to me, to stay my angry hand! Is it from thee the whisper comes, that this man did his duty as thou didst—and as I did, through thy guidance, which has wholly saved me here on earth—and that he did no more!"

He sat down, with his head buried in his hands, and, when he rose up, made the second strong resolution of his life: That neither to the French officer, nor to the mother of his departed friend, nor to any soul while either of the two was living, would he breathe what only he knew. And when he touched that French officer's glass with his own, that day at dinner, he secretly forgave him in the name of the Divine Forgiver of injuries.

Here my story ends. But I might go on and tell how the son of Major Richard Doubledick, and the son of that French officer, friends as their fathers were before them, fought side by side in one cause, with their respective nations, like long-divided brothers whom the better times have brought together, fast united.

COINCIDENCES.

THERE are a thousand mysterious circumstances occurring every day of our lives, the solution of which philosophy fails to reach. And because this is the case, the wise heads dispose of them in a very summary way, by denying the facts.

There are a thousand strange and mysterious sympathies linking us with each other and drawing our hearts together, so that, even when separated far away, we often have the same thoughts and feelings at the same precise moment of time. The same sigh heaves breasts ocean-wide apart, when the same longing desire springs up for communion face to face. And these, these same philosophers dispose of quite as summarily, by calling them "striking coincidences"—as if this were any explanation of the phenomena.

The wildest dreams of the night are not more wild and strange than those traits of the human mind in our waking hours, and which, unaccounted for as they may be, still demonstrate to us a hidden chain of sympathies running down the whole course of life, and binding our hearts together. Call them by what name we will—they are still there, and still the same. We can not get rid of them by denying their existence—and it does not explain them to call them "coincidences."

The following sketch, although, perhaps, not strictly professional in its character, is drawn from notes made at the time the incidents occurred. I had formed a close intimacy with Albert Carver, a gentleman of about my own age, and in many respects of similar tastes and feelings, who had purchased a large estate in — County, New York, about three miles from my office, upon which he had erected very costly and elegant buildings. He lived alone, having no family but his servants. He sought no society, and it was by the merest accident that our acquaintance began, which soon ripened into the closest and most familiar friendship. I never passed his house without calling, and often drove down there in the evening to spend an hour or two with him, and my visit was not rarely drawn out to the early hours of the morning.

He had one of the finest, and most manly, and intelligent faces I ever saw, and his mind was filled with large stores of information, which he had acquired from books and extensive travel at home and abroad, and intercourse with men. To me he was always talkative—to others, taciturn. He was not what you would call cheerful, though he was far from being morose or gloomy, and when he smiled—which was very rarely—it was a calm, cold smile, that seemed frozen upon his face. He was kind to every one, and lavish in his generosity to the poor.

During an intercourse of more than two years he had never spoken to me on the subject of his health, and though thin and remarkably pale, he seemed always to be well. I was therefore not a little surprised, when one evening, which we were spending perhaps more cheerfully than usual, he referred to the subject in a way that led me, on my return home, to make a note of our conversation. In answer to his remark, I said that I had never suspected him of being the subject of disease. He replied,

"Yet, I am dying, my friend; I feel it ever—" day more and more—dying by inches. You will tell me I have no disease. Well—perhaps I have not—at least, none within the reach of medical skill. Yet, I have a disease—a malady rather, which is slowly and steadily sapping the foundations of life. You have never felt my pulse, Doctor. Put your finger on it now.”

He turned up the sleeve of his elegant dressing-gown and extended his wrist. I felt of his pulse for two or three minutes, thinking I might possibly detect some intermission or variation in it which would betray a hidden disease, although I never had any reason to suspect any. But it was as calm, and regular, and healthy a pulse as ever I felt.

“Your heart, at all events, is sound,” I said, as I relinquished his hand.

There was a singular expression in the glance which he turned upon me as I said this; or, rather, in the steady and intense gaze which he fixed upon my face, and which he did not remove till my eye sunk under it. What did it mean? Was it possible that, after all the time through which our acquaintance had extended, I had overlooked a derangement of mind—or was such a malady just now about to develop itself? If such a suspicion crossed my mind at the time, it was instantly dissipated when he spoke.

“There are maladies, Doctor, which are out of sight of the eye, and which do not manifest themselves in the alteration of any of the functions of the body, and yet as surely and effectually waste away the powers of life as the plague or the cholera. You could discover no variation in my pulse?”

I shook my head.

“Nor I,” he continued. “I have examined it every day for many months—not as the chimerical hypochondriac who is always feeling it to see if he is not ill, but with the simple curiosity to see how much a man may suffer, and how calm he may keep his own heart. I can not now tell you all I mean; but what I wish you to understand is this, that when I first began to suffer as I do now, my heart would struggle at times as if it would break from my bosom, or burst. I taught it to be calm—to beat as it does now, and has through years of untold misery.”

He paused; and, as I looked up, I met his eye fixed upon me with the same steady gaze, which gradually faded away into his ordinary cold smile, and he made some remark upon another subject. But it was impossible for me to draw away my thoughts from the impression he had made upon my mind, and I soon left.

“Come oftener and see me, Doctor,” he said, as he gave me the usual warm grasp of his hand. “I would come to your office if I knew when to find you at home, for you are all the society I have, and I am always glad to see you come. You can drive down here any or every evening, and rest yourself after your day’s ride, and be secure for an hour or two against being called out—stop a moment. My brother has sent me, to-day, a few bottles of what he says is excellent wine, and you shall try it. I know nothing about it, for I drink nothing but water.”

“And I am in the same predicament. Good-night.”

“Don’t forget that I am sick,” said he, laughing, as I stepped into my carriage, “and come often to see how I am. I shall not promise to take any of your medicine, however, till I am worse.”

Had it not been for my entire confidence in the straightforward truthfulness of my friend, I should have suspected him of jesting with me. As it was, our conversation was rarely out of my mind for the three days that intervened before I saw him again. I then received a note from him, inviting me to spend the evening with him. He wanted to see me professionally now, he said, as well as to have my company for the evening. I was struck with a sort of nervousness of the writing, and half made up my mind to drive down at once and see him.

Having another call to make in his neighborhood, I however deferred it till late in the afternoon, and then drove to his house. It was almost dark when I arrived. He was walking on the piazza, and as I alighted and shook his hand, I was surprised at the alteration in his countenance. It was not exactly haggard, but there was an expression of wild and excited anxiety upon it which alarmed me, as I immediately recurred to the last evening I had passed with him, and his conversation at that time. He tried to smile as he met me, but the smile was full of distress.

I, of course, immediately inquired after his health, and he said,

“Never mind that now—I have kept tea waiting, expecting you, and we will talk about that afterward.”

At the table he ate nothing, and only sipped a cup of tea while I was eating. We soon retired to the library, and he handed me the cigars with which we usually regaled ourselves, but he took none himself. He noticed my look of surprise, and said,

“No—I have neither slept nor eaten nor smoked since you were here. I can not. I have taken out a bottle of wine repeatedly, and prepared to open it, for I felt that it might benumb my senses. But it is the resort of fools, and I will not drink it for such a purpose. It is my mind, Doctor; I feel as if some terrible calamity were hanging over me—a dreadful presentiment of evil—and I can not banish it. I have had the same feelings before, but not so intense. I have soon subdued them, for my mind is usually its own master.”

He paced the floor for a few moments in a silence which I did not know how to break. I began to feel that there was some mystery in the case—some terrible cause which was at the bottom of this.

Presently he drew a chair to my side and sat down.

"You could find nothing the matter with my pulse the other night," he said; "see how it is now," and he extended his arm.

The hot blood was coursing through it in wild and rapid torrents.

"Can you stop it—can you do any thing to arrest that flood?" he asked.

"There is some cause for this which I am ignorant of, my dear friend," I replied; "and till I know what it is I can do nothing to remove it."

"It is for that very purpose I have wanted to see you to-night," said he. "I want to talk to you about myself—to tell you the cause, and see what the confidence will do to aid me in bearing this new accession of agony. It is said that there is relief in sympathy, and that the mind eases itself by unburdening its griefs to another. I know nothing of this, for I have never before sought human sympathy, though, God knows, I have needed it as few others need it, for years. I owe it to myself that I am wretched as I am, and my punishment is just. There are the cigars. Now smoke on, and do not look at me till I am done, and then you may curse me, if you will, as I curse myself."

During the whole narration of what follows I did not look at him, but I felt all the time, as he sat near me, that he never but once removed his eye from mine. I give his story in his own words, as nearly as I can recollect them, omitting such of the details as are not necessary.

"I told you three nights since that I was dying, and you said my heart was sound. This only shows how men of your profession—who are accustomed to judge of the ravages of disease by physical symptoms—are too apt to overlook those moral affections that are often the disease which, without those outward manifestations, silently, yet surely gnaws, and cankers, and eats out the heart. Three nights since my pulse was calm and even as an infant's—now it is rushing on, mad as a swollen mountain torrent. Yet I was then suffering and dying of the same malady which is killing me now. Then I could control all the external signs of it—now I am subdued by it.

"My father was a poor country clergyman, and from my earliest years I was fond of study. This inclination he encouraged to its utmost extent; and being unable, from his limited means, to send me away to school, he took upon himself the whole task of my education. He was a man of rare powers of mind and most extensive learning. So much gratified was he with my progress and the development of my mind, that at the age of eighteen he became very anxious that I should spend at least one year in college, for the sake of mingling more with young men of my own age, and thinking that I might derive advantages there which I could not at home. I have often thought there was some unconscious feeling of pride mixed up in his mind with this wish, for when afterward I graduated with the honors of my class, he was filled with exultation and delight, and I never saw his humble demeanor before lost, as it seemed to be then, in the almost haughty air with which he received the congratulations of my teachers. But let that pass. It was only a momentary and pardonable flashing up of his human feelings above his uniform Christian humility.

"It was necessary that I should have the means of meeting the expenses of this year; and for the first time in his life I saw his poverty weighing heavily on his mind; and it was the only cause, since the death of his wife, years before, that had interrupted the uniform cheerfulness and equanimity of his character. I therefore proposed that I should spend a year in teaching before I entered college, and this at once quieted all his anxiety.

"I need not speak now of my own feelings, nor the dawning of ambition which began already to cast forward bright flashes of light on my future life. They were there, however, and I felt a good deal of self-satisfaction in taking this first step toward making my own way in the world. I had my day-dreams, as all boys have, and had begun to build airy castles, which, like all others built on the same foundation, are doomed to perish. It never entered into my head that at the age of thirty I should be, what I am now—rich and wretched.

"In my daily wanderings, during my leisure hours, about the neighborhood of the little village where I was patiently pursuing my humble occupation, I frequently met a lady of middle age, attended by another much younger, whom I judged to be her daughter. Meeting so often seemed to give us a sort of claim to acquaintance which we mutually acknowledged by a bow when we passed each other. This amount of recognition continued to nearly the close of the year which I passed in the place, and would probably have extended no farther, as I made no effort to form acquaintances, and was so entirely absorbed in my duties and studies that I did not even know where they lived, but for an accident which brought us together.

"In one of my rambles, about a mile from the village, I took refuge from a sudden shower under the portico of the nearest house. It was a neat cottage with a small yard in front, planted out tastefully with shrubbery, and trailing roses were carefully trained up the pillar of the piazza. There was an air of beauty and refinement about the whole place which had often struck me when passing, and I now found myself speculating about the occupants.

"I was looking at the fine beds of choice flowers interspersed here and there through the closely shaven grass plat, when the door opened, and the lady I have mentioned invited me to come in till the rain was over. I learned that Mrs. Montrose was the widow of a merchant in the city, who had died a few years before, leaving her in easy circumstances, and she had selected this place as her residence. Here she was living in retirement with her daughter.

Edith, the young lady I had met with her in her walks.

"I can not describe Edith. She was far from being beautiful, but there was something in the quiet and earnest welcome with which she received me that induced me to call again and again. I became a frequent visitor at the house, and talked of my hopes and dreams of life, till at length I found the calm blue eyes, and ever-thoughtful face of Edith, lingering in my memory after I had left her. All this was new to me. A chord was touched in my heart that had never vibrated before. A new power was gaining control over me, and gradually I yielded to its sweet and delightful influence.

"I entered college and distinguished myself throughout the single year that I spent there. Edith Montrose was then in all my dreams of the future. I could have yielded up all my hopes, which ambition had begun to point to, for her. We wrote frequently to each other, and the spell gathered stronger and stronger about my heart. We loved as, I believe, few others ever love. It was no bright fancy, no transient passion to burn in my heart for a few days and expire. It was the deepest and intensest affection, and cast forward upon life the brightest and most gorgeous hues. It was a passion which excited me in all my studies and pursuits, for I felt then that it would be a pride and joy to cast all the honors my loftiest expectations looked to into the lap of Edith. I love her now as I loved her then, and as I have loved her ever since, cruelly as I wronged her.

"Let me pass rapidly over the rest, till the fatal hour that made me a villain. I betrayed her and ruined her. And not her alone. Guilt such as mine reaches in its effects farther than the one object of its aim. Her shame could not be concealed, and the discovery of it was fatal to her mother. She sunk and died almost as soon as the blow fell. Edith came to me, and besought me to marry her. I know not what devil was in my heart to drive me on, but I put her off with some specious excuse, and she submitted. She would have borne disgrace forever for me, without a murmur, if she could only know that I loved her still. And I did, with all the intensity of my strong heart. But my ambition was again urging me on, and pointing upward, and I began to feel that she stood in my way, and, double villain that I was, I deserted her, and left her to her shame.

"There are, probably, hours in the life of every villain, not entirely lost, in which he repents and wishes to repair the wrongs he has done. It was so with me. I sought her again, and she wept tears of joy on my breast as she laid her babe in my arms. We sat long together that night, and talked of the past and looked forward to the future, till she fell asleep on my bosom. We were sitting thus when I saw the corner of a letter in the bosom of her dress. I know not what possessed me to take it out and read it. It was in the handwriting of a man, and its contents set my heart on fire with jealousy.

"It was true, all I had said to her that night. I had come to her full of repentance and joyful resolution to atone for all the past, and she slept not on my bosom more trustfully than my heart reposed in the quiet peace of doing right, and the whole tenderness of the past seemed compressed into that one short hour, as with her head on my breast, and our babe in my arms, I forgot all the ambition and pride that had been my master before, and blissfully dreamed that now I had found rest. It was then that I discovered that fatal note. I knew the child was my own, but now its mother was playing the wanton, while she pretended still to love me. With wonderful coolness of purpose I laid her head from my breast, so softly that she did not wake, and, with the babe in my arms, I left the house.

"I provided a nurse, but from that hour the child pined away, till one day, in the momentary absence of the woman, some one entered the house and stole it away. I, of course, suspected that Edith had discovered it, and had taken this method of reclaiming it. But this I could never ascertain.

"I believe that I wronged Edith in my suspicions. But never till the child was gone did I stop to think, and then it was too late for us all. How I cursed myself then in my deep shame and humiliation. I gathered her letters and put them in a package with her picture, and they have never left me in all my wanderings for years.

"In casting about in my mind the subject of a profession, I had fixed upon the law. Now I applied myself with ten-fold diligence, for I had a double purpose to answer—to attain to eminence, and, above all, to forget. In the former I was rapidly succeeding, and partially in the latter, when I resolved upon another step which I thought one of policy, but which only added another brazen link to the chain of my destiny, and involved another innocent victim in my fate.

"Do you believe in a special Providence, Doctor? I do—one that keeps a sleepless watch over us at every moment, and so orders our lives as to make our voluntary acts often bring about the retribution that our crimes call for. One of my clients, a man of large wealth and influence, and at whose house I often visited, had a daughter, whose beauty alone, aside from her great intelligence, and the character of her father, was calculated to attract admirers of whom she had not a few. Should I class myself among the number? Could I make her my wife, I should secure at once the whole weight of her father's influence and his numerous friends, not only in my profession, but in those higher and more public objects which my ambition was reaching after. It was with me a cool matter of business—not so much, by a great deal, of dollars and cents, as of reputation and gratified pride.

"My proposals were accepted, and I felt a sudden and sharp pang as I heard the consent. Often before the day came did I draw back from the commission of the act which I felt in my heart was base and mean. But I stifled the accusing voice and persevered.

At length the day came on—the day in which I was to perjure myself—to betray Edith again, and her whom I was about to make my wife. The vows were said, and we sat down with our guests at the supper-table. All was joy and hilarity in the brilliantly lighted room. Was the shade of Edith by my side the cause of my shuddering with a silent fear? No, not then; but a servant whispered in my ear that a lady wished to speak to me a moment in the library.

"It was Edith, and with the sight of her came back all the love of former years. But now how hopelessly. Pride, ambition, all sank down in one instant to the narrow measure of shame and remorse. All other considerations and obligations were forgotten. The vow I had just spoken—the bride I had a moment ago made mine—the hopes and aspirations of life—all that I had dreamed of being—all that was expected from me by others—vanished from my mind and was whelmed in the agony and shame and guilt of the past.

"She spoke to me: She called me by name. I threw myself on my knees beside her. I took her unresisting hand in mine. I besought her to fly with me—to be mine—mine forever.

"She started and cast me from her as if I had been a viper that had stung her. Her eye, usually calm as the evening sky in its sunset hues, burned with indescribable fury. It seemed the wrath of a pent-up volcano.

"'Be yours!' she said, with a fierce calmness that was awfully contradicted by her looks, 'be yours! murderer of my mother—destroyer of my own rest—traitor, twice perjured.'

"I sank to the floor, crushed down with the weight of my remorse. I heard the outer door shut, and sprang to my feet. She was gone. I rushed to the window, and pressing my wild and haggard face against it, saw her passing out of sight. It was the last time I ever saw her.

"I turned away from the window, and met the face of my new-made wife. The pallid hue of her countenance—her compressed lip—her flashing eye—her look of ineffable scorn, told me at a glance that she had heard or understood the whole; she waited to speak no word, and I had none to say. She left the room, and left me forever. Efforts were afterward made to annul our marriage, but they failed, and thus the innocent was chained to the guilty for life. The hope of reparation to her or Edith was gone forever.

"For weeks afterward I was in a raving delirium. What comfort could it bring to me, on my restoration to consciousness and health, that I found myself, by the will of a rich uncle on my mother's side, possessed of large wealth? The capacity to enjoy it was gone. I would have given it all to be again the guiltless man

I was when I first knew Edith, and be again worthy of her love. It was now too late. I was given up a prey to the bitterest remorse. I yielded passively to the decree. I could not complain of my punishment, for it was right and just. I deserved it all. I could not justify my deeds unto myself.

"I went abroad and spent three years in travel—visiting all the classic haunts of the old world, if possible to learn to forget. I failed in this, and came home to try in quiet and retirement to teach myself to bear suffering. In this I have succeeded, so far as external manifestations of it are concerned, but the canker has been steadily gnawing away at my heart."

Thus ended my friend's story, which I have given very briefly, for it was almost midnight when he finished it. It was a history of crime and shame of which I could not have suspected him. It was capable of no palliation, and I attempted none. What could I say? We maintained an unbroken silence for some minutes.

A pile of newspapers lay unopened on the table by my side. They had been accumulating for some days. I took up one and opened it, and my eye fell upon the list of deaths. I always read them, especially when the age is mentioned at which the individuals die, for I want to see how many die in their youth. It is a fancy I have. In this list I saw the name of a female of the same name with my friend. I mentioned it to him, thinking it might divert his mind for a moment from himself. He read it, and for a moment his face became, if possible, more deadly pale, while he sat with the paper clenched firmly in his hand. Then rising slowly from his seat, with his eye fixed as if seeing some object at a great distance, he extended his arms beseechingly, as he passionately exclaimed,

"Edith, my early and only loved! will you not come to me, Edith?"

It was the death of his wife he had read.

It was Edith who had stolen the child. She had believed entirely in all Albert had said to her on the fatal night in which he robbed her of her babe, and had sunk to sleep trustingly on his heart. She had never been false to him in a single thought; but through all her life of shame and sin, and in spite of his mean and cruel desertion, she had loved and trusted on. She knew in her heart that he would one day come back, and then he would atone for all—such is woman's true-hearted affection, and now all her hopes were about to be realized. Her heart was at peace. Why should she not sleep now where she ought to have slept months before, and dream of the bliss she was soon to taste?—ay, why not? And she did sleep.

But when she woke and found him gone, and her child gone, then she felt, for the first time, that she had been deceived, and she believed that all his honeyed words which he had spoken that night were only intended to beguile her and allay suspicion—were all false, and spoken to lull her mother's heart to sleep that he might rob her of her jewel. Then she believed that all the vows and pretended love of years were but the cunning wiles of a villain to destroy her peace. She was almost frenzied now. What should she do?

Was it the strong instinct of the mother that guided her, as soon as her mind had settled down into a sort of calmness, in her search—guided her at last to the discovery of her betrayer, and then by tracking his footsteps day after day, unseen by him, to follow him at last to the house where he had placed her child? I do not know. But this she did, and after watching for days for an opportunity, at last succeeded in carrying it away. She then returned to her old home, and sold the place, and left that part of the country. Albert was in the city, and she went there to be near him, not actuated by her affection for him—for that she had lost, or at least persuaded herself that she had—but goaded on now by a feeling of most malignant vengeance. She could watch him in all his paths, and the time will come, she said to herself, when she could punish him for his treachery.

And the time did come. She heard that he was about to be married, and she determined to call upon the lady and tell her the history of her shame, and who was the author; and thus dash the cup from his lips before he could taste it. But she was a few minutes too late. Ignorant how soon it was to take place, she had selected the very evening of the marriage; and when she arrived, she learned from a servant that it was done, but on this very account the retribution was ten-fold more severe upon her victim.

These facts, and those that follow, I heard by one of those singular "coincidences" I have spoken of. It was about two months after my interview with Carver that I was summoned to his house in great haste. The horses attached to a stage-coach, while descending a hill, had been frightened, and dashed the coach in pieces in front of his door, and all the passengers were more or less injured. On my arrival I found my friend in a state of the highest excitement, yet not so but he could give me an account of the accident. None of the passengers were seriously injured, he told me, except a lady, and she lay insensible. He directed me to the room where she was lying, and as I was entering the door he called me back, and taking my hand, said,

"Doctor, you must save her. She must not die now. Restore her to life, or to her reason, if only for one hour, and all I have is yours."

"Why, what is this, my friend?"

"It is Edith, Doctor. Edith; and—"

"I understand you, my friend. All shall be done that human skill can do."

Promising to let him know soon as to her state, I left him. When I entered the room she was beginning to show signs of reanima-tion, under the use of such restoratives as the housekeeper had been diligently using; and it was not long before I was able to satisfy myself that her injuries were not likely to be serious. I communicated this to Carver at once, and he begged to be allowed to see her. I assured him he should do so as soon as it was prudent, and left him, promising to call in the evening. Upon my return I found him anxiously waiting for me, with a face radiant with joy. He had seen her—told her all—pointed her to his wasted form and features as evidence of his remorseful repentance, and she— But let me tell in my own way the substance of what she told us that night as we sat by her bedside. In a few days she had entirely recovered.

* * * *

The parsonage stood a few rods from the church in the outskirts of the little village of M—. Here, for nearly twenty years, had lived the minister of the parish, a noble-hearted and self-denying man. He was not married—some said because he had met with a disappointment in his early life—and others because he was too poor to support a wife and family. Neither of these reasons was the true one.

The population about him were generally poor and humble, but they loved and almost worshiped their minister. He was with them in sickness and sorrow, and aided them in all their trials and difficulties with his counsels and his prayers, and he rejoiced with them in all their happiness. Although not more than forty years old, he was looked up to, not as a leader only, but almost as a father, by his little flock, and every one wondered where he found the means that enabled him to do so many deeds of charity.

He was sitting one evening in his study when a lady was introduced, leading by the hand a little girl of about two years. She was a stranger, and he arose and kindly asked her to be seated. There was an air of melancholy sadness about her face which touched his heart, and he asked her if he could be of any service to her.

"I have arrived in your village," she replied, "but a few moments since, where I intend to make my residence, and I have called immediately upon you to state to you my wishes and ask your advice."

"And what do you wish to do," he kindly inquired.

"I would make myself useful in some way among your people—in any way, so that I may do them good."

"We are a humble people, and you will find a life among such as we are to have few charms for one who has been accustomed to live in better society. We have to use much of self-denial and patience, and be content with giving sympathy when, perhaps, we feel that we need it as much ourselves. You have not, perhaps, inquired or well-considered the character of the people among whom you have come."

"It makes little difference to me where I am, so I am afar from the distractions of the world, and where I can do good while I am bringing up my child out of the reach of temptations."

"I fear you will hardly find the place, this side of heaven, where temptations are not; for they come alike to rich and poor, even under the sheltering wing of our Saviour. He suffered them himself—but you are weeping—pardon me if I have said any thing to cause these tears."

"I have suffered much," she replied, "and your words of kindness touch me. Perhaps I might teach the children. If they are poor, they still need instruction; and I am rich—that is, I have enough to support myself and some to spare. I should be a burden to no one, and might do some good."

"Well, we will see, when you have had time to know what we are. You are wearied now. I have no accommodations which I can ask you to accept, but I will direct you to lodgings for the night. I have not inquired your name."

"Edith Montrose."

"And your child?" he asked, taking the hand of the little girl, whose tired head had fallen asleep on its mother's knee.

"It is Edith, also."

The minister called his servant, and directed him to take his lantern and show Mrs. Montrose to the house of Mrs. Wilson, and say that he requested her to accommodate her.

"You will find her a kindly woman," he said, "although one of my humblest parishioners."

When Edith laid her head on her humble pillow that night, and wet it with her tears, they were not tears of sorrow alone. The bitter repentance of the past was mingled with sincere and joyous resolutions for the future, and earnest prayers that all the dark and sinful past, so full of shame, and sorrow, and revenge, might be blotted from her memory and her heart. She slept that night more peacefully than she had slept for years.

In a few days she purchased a cottage at the other extremity of the village from the parsonage, and supplied it with the little furniture she needed. She called at the cottages of the poor, and learned their wants, and relieved them. She was by the side of the sick, and soothed them with her gentle voice, while her own hand administered their medicines. She taught their children to read, and gave them lessons of virtue. Thus Edith won her way silently to the hearts of all the humble cottagers, and became a sort of guardian angel to the village. But to none did she communicate the history of her life, though they often wondered, when they looked upon her quiet face, why the angel had chosen to live in such a place as theirs, rather than in its home in heaven. The good minister, too, forgot the cautiousness with which he had first received her, and felt that she was relieving him of a large part of his labors. But the reserve which she always maintained toward him, as well as others, with regard to her former life, and her shrinking from confidence with any, deterred him from seeking any familiarity with her till accident brought it about.

Edith found, even here, that sorrow belongs to this world; for her child sickened and died—the child of her shame, but for all that, the child of her earnest and faithful love. The memories of the past had been dying, one by one, and now the last link was broken. She was alone now—utterly alone. Yet unconsciously she clung to that past with an indefinable longing, and she could not consent that the only object that bound her to it should be severed entirely from her sight; and so the grave was dug, and the dead child was buried among the clustering rose-bushes that grew in front of her window, where the rain and the dew-drops, laden with the sweet fragrance of the flowers, might fall upon her bed, and where she could look forth in the smiling days or the moonlit nights and see that she was sleeping well. It was at this time that the minister seemed, for the first, to comprehend entirely the deep fountains of feeling and love that were flowing in Edith's heart; and as the twilight closed in when they had finished the burial and heaped up and smoothed down the green turf over the little grave, he entered the house with her and sat down. It was late that night when he returned to his home. They had talked earnestly and long of the future—of what was to be done by both of them for the benefit of their humble neighbors—they had talked of the glorious hope that was linking them and drawing them on to the world to come; and they had prayed together for strength and grace to aid them in their labors of love.

When he sat down in his study that night, he looked around with a strange feeling that something was wanting there. He felt that he was alone. And every night after that, for days and weeks, he felt it more and more; for now he was a frequent visitor at Edith's cottage, and when he came from there he always entered his own home with a sigh.

Nor is it wonderful that Edith detected in herself a sort of satisfaction and pleasure in his society and sympathy, which she was by no means disposed to repel. It seemed to her that the avenues of joy and peace were again opening in her heart; and should she not let in the heavenly guests? She did; and thus months rolled on—months of sad repentance, but largely mingled with holy and calm promises of rest—till the minister one evening told his love, and she throw herself upon his heart and wept tears of joy, such as she had wept once before, though she forgot them now.

There can be no doubt but Edith really believed she loved the minister, and when she had once consented to be his wife, did look forward with a degree of satisfaction such as she had not felt for many years, to her bridal-day. Her heart, crushed and broken and bowed down in sorrow for so many long and years, had rebounded at the voice of love, and she did feel as if the object she had yearned for all her life long was about to be won. Old joys came back—not the memory of them, for that would have poisoned all her present bliss, but the very joys themselves. She felt again as she had felt when, in her girlhood, she had listened to the words of love which Albert poured into her ear; but his name or his image did not rise now to mingle with her thoughts, or, if they did, she put them down with an iron resolution that forbade them to intrude. She longed and wished to be loved as she believed the minister loved her, and she hoped in that love to find rest. Thus she persuaded herself that she loved him, though something would every now and then rise in her mind like a prophecy of evil.

But as the day drew near on which they were to be married, she began to fear that she was deceiving herself and him. At first she banished the suspicion at once as hateful; but the next moment she found herself examining her heart, and unconsciously comparing her present feelings with those she used to have for Albert. The comparison was unfavorable to her present position, and as old and long-forgotten thoughts came back, the habit of years began to resume its mastery, and she found Albert oftener in her mind than the minister. Her memory accused her; the image of the maniac, Albert, as she last saw him, with eyes of fire glaring from the window; the grave of their child—his child and hers; all these rose in her thoughts, and she could not banish them. Indeed, she found after a little time that she did not care to repel them. She loved them and cherished them more and more every day.

Finally, the night preceding the bridal arrived. She had requested the minister to leave her to herself and the communion of her own thoughts that night; and as the twilight drew on, she sat by the window gazing upon the little grave in the clustering rose-bushes. She sat thus till almost midnight, gathering to herself all the holy memories of her pure but humble girlhood, and all the unhallowed love and revenge of her after years.

What should she do? Should she wait for to-morrow and keep her vow? Distracted with hesitation, and tortured with doubts, she could not decide. She had undeceived herself, how should she undeceive the minister? how make him the talk of the place, and bring sorrow and despair to a heart whose nobleness and love she could not despise, even if she could no longer accept it for herself? That she earnestly yearned and longed for the bliss of such love she could not—she did not—deny. But it could not be his.

The voices of other days were sounding in her ear, and telling her that her destiny lay not here; that there was an early love, which, to her, it would be sin to forget. She had not forgotten it. Its memory was seared and burned in upon her heart. Again and again she trod over, in her memory, all the tear-washed paths of the past, and that evening lived over again years of sorrow.

Wild and wavering, she arose and paced the narrow room of her cottage. She opened the door, and walked out into the gentle moonlight. Its rays were sleeping on the little mound before the window, and she knelt beside it, when suddenly she seemed to hear a voice, as if at a great distance, yet distinct and plain as if spoken at the portals of her ear; and the voice said, "Come to me, Edith!"

All her doubts and hesitation were gone. She arose joyfully and entered the cottage. Her resolution was fully formed. She knew the voice, and she could not refuse to listen. Did it call her to the embrace of love, or did it compel her to tread the path of thorns still longer, it mattered not to her. She had persuaded herself that, in the love of the minister, she had found the well under the shade of the palm-trees. She now opened her eyes to see that she was still in the midst of the desert, though that voice, she hoped, might call her to a green and shady rest.

"Yes, Albert," she replied, "I will come!"

But she could not leave the minister without some explanation. So much true love as, she felt in her heart of hearts, he bore for her, ought not to receive from her even the semblance of being slighted, or scorned, or trifled with. If she deserted him, and left him to the utter desolation and ruin which must fall upon his spirit, ought she not to make him some reparation? Would he not curse her in his heart if she did not? And would he not, with all that nobleness of soul that belonged to him, appreciate the step she was about to take, even with all its bitter consequences to herself, if she put him in possession of the simple story of her life, with its burden of sin and sorrow? Might he not thank her for not linking his pure life to one of so much guilt, and pray for her rest?

With a hurried hand, but a calm soul, she wrote the story, and laid it where she knew he would find it in the morning, when he should come to lead her forth to their bridal. One deep sigh as she placed it there bore witness to the sorrow she felt for its effect upon him, though no tear fell from her eye. Then hastily arranging the furniture of her apartment, and making a small bundle of such clothing as she might need, she passed forth from her cottage-door a homeless wanderer. One instant she paused by the side of the little grave. She seemed agitated by a powerful emotion, which she instantly pressed down and subdued, as a single tear fell upon the sod, and then she turned away to retrace her path of sorrow and shame.

The morning star rose on her footsteps as she left the spot. Shall it be an omen for good to her weary and toil-worn spirit?

It never occurred to her how vain might be her search for Albert; that she had no clew to lead her to the spot where he was; but in the morning she was far on her way. She went first to the city where she had last seen him; but he had been gone and unheard-of for years. She went and stood upon the deserted hearthstone of her early days. She was herself forgotten there, and they only remembered him as the one who had ruined Edith Montrose. But she knelt there in the home of her childhood, where she had been pure and where she had fallen, and prayed—prayed for pardon and peace, and that before she died she might also be able to say to him that she forgave him; and she shed again bitter tears of sorrow and repentance.

It was but two days after when the accident occurred which brought them together.

A LAWYER'S STORY.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

I SERVED my time—never mind in whose office; and I started in business for myself, in one of our English country towns—I decline stating which. I hadn't a quarter of the capital I ought to have had to begin with; and my friends in the neighborhood were poor and useless enough, with one exception. That exception was Mr. Frank Gatliffe, son of Mr. Gatliffe, member for the county, the richest man and the proudest for many a mile round about our parts. You won't trace any particulars by the name of Gatliffe. I'm not bound to commit myself or any body else by mentioning names. I have given you the first that came into my head.

Well! Mr. Frank was a staunch friend of mine, and ready to recommend me whenever he got the chance. I had given him a little timely help—for a consideration, of course—in borrowing money at a fair rate of interest: in fact, I had saved him from the Jews. The money was borrowed while Mr. Frank was at college. He came back from college, and stopped at home a little while; and then there got spread about all our neighborhood, a report that he had fallen in love, as the saying is, with his young sister's governess, and that his mind was made up to marry her. You want to know her name, don't you? What do you think of Smith?

Speaking as a lawyer, I consider Report, in a general way, to be a fool and a liar. But, in this case, report turned out to be something very different. Mr. Frank told me he was really in love, and said upon his honor (an absurd expression which young chaps of his age are always using) he was determined to marry Smith the governess—the sweet, darling girl, as he called her; but I'm not sentimental, and I call her Smith the governess. Mr. Frank's father, being as proud as Lucifer, said "No" as to marrying the governess, when Mr. Frank wanted him to say "Yes." He was a man of business, was old Gatliffe, and he took the proper business course. He sent the governess away with a first-rate character and a spanking present; and then he looked about him to get something for Mr. Frank to do. While he was looking about, Mr. Frank bolted to London after the governess, who had nobody alive belonging to her to go to but an aunt—her father's sister. The aunt refuses to let Mr. Frank in without the squire's permission. Mr. Frank writes to his father, and says he will marry the girl as soon as he is of age, or shoot himself. Up to town comes the squire, and his wife, and his daughter; and a lot of sentimentality, not in the slightest degree material to the present statement, takes place among them; and the upshot of it is, that old Gatliffe is forced into withdrawing the word No, and substituting the word Yes.

I don't believe he would ever have done it, though, but for one lucky peculiarity in the case. The governess's father was a man of good family—pretty nigh as good as Gatliffe's own. He had been in the army; had sold out; set up as a wine-merchant—failed—died: ditto his wife, as to the dying part of it. No relation, in fact, left for the squire to make inquiries about but the father's sister, who had behaved, as old Gatliffe said, like a thorough-bred gentlewoman, in shutting the door against Mr. Frank in the first instance. So, to cut the matter short, things were at last made up pleasant enough. The time was fixed for the wedding, and an announcement about it—Marriage in High Life and all that—put into the county paper. There was a regular biography, besides, of the governess's father, so as to stop people from talking; a great flourish about his pedigree, and a long account of his services in the army; but not a word, mind ye, of his having turned wine-merchant afterward. Oh, no—not a word about that! I knew it, though, for Mr. Frank told me. He hadn't a bit of pride about him. He introduced me to his future wife one day when I met them out walking, and asked me if I did not think he was a lucky fellow. I don't mind admitting that I did, and that I told him so. Ah! but she was one of my sort, was that governess. Stood, to the best of my recollection, five feet four. Good lissome figure, that looked as if it had never been boxed up in a pair of stays. Eyes that made me feel as if I was under a pretty stiff cross-examination the moment she looked at me. Fine red, fresh, kiss-and-come-again sort of lips. She has had a family of children since the time I am talking of; and her cheeks are a trifle fatter, and her complexion is a shade or two redder now, than when I first met her out walking with Mr. Frank.

The marriage was to take place on a Wednesday. I decline mentioning the year or the month. I had started as an attorney on my own account—say six weeks, more or less, and was sitting alone in my office on the Monday morning before the wedding-day, trying to see my way clear before me, and not succeeding particularly well, when Mr. Frank suddenly bursts in, as white as any ghost that ever was painted, and says he's got the most dreadful case for me to advise on, and not an hour to lose in acting on my advice.

"Is this in the way of business, Mr. Frank?" says I, stopping him just as he was beginning to get sentimental. "Yes or no, Mr. Frank?" rapping my new office paper-knife on the table to pull him up short all the sooner.

"My dear fellow"—he was always familiar with me—"it's in the way of business, certainly; but friendship—"

I was obliged to pull him up short again, and regularly examine him as if he had been in the witness-box, or he would have kept me talking to no purpose half the day.

"Now, Mr. Frank," said I, "I can't have any sentimentality mixed up with business matters. You please to stop talking, and let me ask questions. Answer in the fewest words you can use. Nod when nodding will do instead of words."

I fixed him with my eye for about three seconds, as he sat groaning and wriggling in his chair. When I'd done fixing him, I gave another rap with my paper-knife on to the table to startle him up a bit. Then I went on.

"From what you have been stating up to the present time," says I, "I gather that you are in a scrape which is likely to interfere seriously with your marriage on Wednesday?" (He nodded, and I cut in again before he could say a word.) "The scrape affects the young lady you are about to marry, and goes back to the period of a certain transaction in which her late father was engaged some years ago?" (He nods, and I cut in once more.) "There is a party who turned up after seeing the announcement of your marriage in the paper, who is cognizant of what he oughtn't to know, and who is prepared to use his knowledge of the same to the prejudice of the young lady and of your marriage, unless he receives a sum of money to quiet him? Very well. Now, first of all, Mr. Frank, state what you have been told by the young lady herself about the transaction of her late father. How did you first come to have any knowledge of it?"

"She was talking to me about her father one day, so tenderly and prettily, that she quite excited my interest about him," begins Mr. Frank; "and I asked her, among other things, what had occasioned his death. She said she believed it was distress of mind, in the first instance; and added, that this distress was connected with a shocking secret, which she and her mother had kept from every body; but which she could not keep from me, because she was determined to begin her married life by having no secrets from her husband." Here Mr. Frank began to get sentimental again, and I pulled him up short once more with the paper-knife.

"She told me," Mr. Frank went on, "that the great mistake of her father's life was his selling out of the army and taking to the wine trade. He had no talent for business; things went wrong with him from the first. His clerk, it was strongly suspected, cheated him—"

"Stop a bit," says I, "What was that suspected clerk's name?"

"Davager," says he.

"Davager," says I, making a note of it. "Go on, Mr. Frank."

"His affairs got more and more entangled," says Mr. Frank; "he was pressed for money in all directions; bankruptcy, and consequent dishonor (as he considered it) stared him in the face. His mind was so affected by his troubles that both his wife and daughter, toward the last, considered him to be hardly responsible for his own acts. In this state of desperation and misery, he—" Here Mr. Frank began to hesitate.

We have two ways in the law, of drawing evidence off nice and clear from an unwilling client or witness. We give him a fright, or we treat him to a joke. I treated Mr. Frank to a joke.

"Ah!" says I. "I know what he did. He had a signature to write; and, by the most natural mistake in the world, he wrote another gentleman's name instead of his own—eh?"

"It was to a bill," says Mr. Frank, looking very crestfallen, instead of taking the joke. "His principal creditor wouldn't wait till he could raise the money, or the greater part of it. But he was resolved, if he sold off every thing, to get the amount and repay—"

"Of course!" says I. "Drop that. The forgery was discovered. When?"

"Before even the first attempt was made to negotiate the bill. He had done the whole thing in the most absurdly and innocently wrong way. The person whose name he had used was a staunch friend of his, and a relation of his wife's; a good man as well as a rich one. He had influence with the chief creditor, and he used it nobly. He had a real affection for the unfortunate man's wife, and he proved it generously."

"Come to the point," says I. "What did he do? In a business way, what did he do?"

"He put the false bill into the fire, drew a bill of his own to replace it, and then—only then—told my dear girl and her mother all that had happened. Can you imagine any thing nobler?" asks Mr. Frank.

"Speaking in my professional capacity, I can't imagine any thing greener," says I. "Where was the father? Off, I suppose?"

"Ill in bed," said Mr. Frank, coloring. "But he mustered strength enough to write a contrite and grateful letter the same day, promising to prove himself worthy of the noble moderation and forgiveness extended to him, by selling off every thing he possessed to repay his money debt. He did sell off every thing, down to some old family pictures that were heir-looms; down to the little plate he had; down to the very tables and chairs that furnished his drawing-room. Every farthing of the debt was paid; and he was left to begin the world again, with the kindest promises of help from the generous man who had forgiven him. It was too late. His crime of one rash moment—atoned for though it had been—preyed upon his mind. He became possessed with the idea that he had lowered himself forever in the estimation of his wife and daughter, and—

"He died," I cut in. "Yes, yes, we know that. Let's go back for a minute to the contrite and grateful letter that he wrote. My experience in the law, Mr. Frank, has convinced me that if every body burnt every body else's letters, half the Courts of Justice in this country might shut up shop. Do you happen to know whether the letter we are now speaking of contained any thing like an avowal or confession of the forgery?"

"Of course it did," says he. "Could the writer express his contrition properly without making some such confession?"

"Quite easy, if he had been a lawyer," says I. "But never mind that; I'm going to make a guess—a desperate guess, mind. Should I be altogether in error," says I, "if I thought that this letter had been stolen; and that the fingers of Mr. Davager, of suspicious commercial celebrity, might possibly be the fingers which took it?" says I.

"That is exactly what I tried to make you understand," cried Mr. Frank.

"How did he communicate that interesting fact to you?"

"He has not ventured into my presence. The scoundrel actually had the audacity—"

"Aha!" says I. "The young lady herself! Sharp practitioner, Mr. Davager."

"Early this morning, when she was walking alone in the shrubbery," Mr. Frank goes on, "he had the assurance to approach her, and to say that he had been watching his opportunity of getting a private interview for days past. He then showed her—actually showed her—her unfortunate father's letter; put into her hands another letter directed to me; bowed, and walked off; leaving her half dead with astonishment and terror."

"It was much better for you that you were not there," says I. "Have you got that other letter?"

He handed it to me. It was so extremely humorous and short, that I remember every word of it at this distance of time. It began in this way:

"To FRANCIS GATLIFFE, JUN., Esq.—Sir: I have an extremely curious autograph letter to sell. The price is a five hundred pound note. The young lady to whom you are to be married on Wednesday will inform you of the nature of the letter, and the genuineness of the autograph. If you refuse to deal, I shall send a copy to the local paper, and shall wait on your highly respected father with the original curiosity, on the afternoon of Tuesday next. Having come down here on family business, I have put up at the family hotel—being to be heard of at the Gatcliffe Arms.

"Your very obedient servant,

"ALFRED DAVAGER."

"A clever fellow, that," says I, putting the letter into my private drawer.

"Clever!" cries Mr. Frank, "he ought to be horsewhipped within an inch of his life. I would have done it myself, but she made me promise, before she told me a word of the matter, to come straight to you."

"That was one of the wisest promises you ever made," says I. "We can't afford to bully this fellow, whatever else we may do with him. Don't think I am saying any thing libelous against your excellent father's character when I assert that if he saw the letter he would certainly insist on your marriage being put off, at the very least."

"Feeling as my father does about my marriage, he would insist on its being dropped altogether, if he saw this letter," says Mr. Frank, with a groan. "But even that is not the worst of it. The generous, noble girl herself says, that if the letter appears in the paper, with all the unanswerable comments this scoundrel would be sure to add to it, she would rather die than hold me to my engagement—even if my father would let me keep it." He was a weak young fellow, and ridiculously fond of her. I brought him back to business with another rap of the paper-knife.

"Hold up, Mr. Frank," says I. "I have a question or two more. Did you think of asking the young lady whether, to the best of her knowledge, this infernal letter was the only written evidence of the forgery now in existence?"

"Yes, I did think directly of asking her that," says he; "and she told me she was quite certain that there was no written evidence of the forgery, except that one letter."

"Will you give Mr. Davager his price for it?" says I.

"Yes," says Mr. Frank, as quick as lightning.

"Mr. Frank," says I, "you came here to get my help and advice in this extremely ticklish business, and you are ready, as I know, without asking, to remunerate me for all and any of my services at the usual professional rate. Now, I've made up my mind to act boldly—desperately, if you like—on the hit or miss—win-all-or-lose-all principle—in dealing with this matter. Here is my proposal. I'm going to try if I can't do Mr. Davager out of his letter. If I don't succeed before to-morrow afternoon, you hand him the money, and I charge you nothing for professional services. If I do succeed, I hand you the letter instead of Mr. Davager; and you give me the money, instead of giving it to him. It's a precious risk for me, but I'm ready to run it. You must pay your five hundred any way. What do you say to my plan? Is it Yes—Mr. Frank—or No?"

"Hang your questions!" cries Mr. Frank, jumping up; "you know it's Yes, ten thousand times over. Only you earn the money and—"

"And you will be too glad to give it to me. Very good. Now go home. Comfort the young lady—don't let Mr. Davager so much as set eyes on you—keep quiet—leave every thing to me—and feel as certain as you please that all the letters in the world can't stop your being married on Wednesday." With these words I hustled him off out of the office; for I wanted to be left alone to make my mind up about what I should do.

The first thing, of course, was to have a look at the enemy. I wrote to Mr. Davager, telling him that I was privately appointed to arrange the little business-matter between himself and "another party" (no names!) on friendly terms; and begging him to call on me at his earliest convenience. At the very beginning of the case, Mr. Davager bothered me. His answer was that it would not be convenient to him to call till between six and seven in the evening. In this way, you see, he contrived to make me lose several precious hours, at a time when minutes almost were of importance. I had nothing for it but to be patient, and to give certain instructions, before Mr. Davager came, to my boy Tom.

There was never such a sharp boy of fourteen before, and there never will be again, as my boy Tom. A spy to look after Mr. Davager was, of course, the first requisite in a case of this kind; and Tom was the smallest, quickest, quietest, sharpest, stealthiest little snake of a chap that ever dogged a gentleman's steps and kept cleverly out of range of a gentleman's eyes. I settled it with the boy that he was not to show at all when Mr. Davager came; and that he was to wait to hear me ring the bell, when Mr. Davager left. If I rang twice, he was to show the gentleman out. If I rang once, he was to keep out of the way, and follow the gentleman wherever he went, till he got back to the inn. Those were the only preparations I could make to begin with; being obliged to wait, and let myself be guided by what turned up.

About a quarter to seven my gentleman came. In the profession of the law we get somehow quite remarkably mixed up with ugly people, blackguard people, and dirty people. But far away the ugliest and dirtiest blackguard I ever saw in my life was Mr. Alfred Davager. He had greasy white hair and a mottled face. He was low in the forehead, fat in the stomach, hoarse in the voice, and weak in the legs. Both his eyes were bloodshot, and one was fixed in his head. He smelt of spirits, and carried a toothpick in his mouth. "How are you? I've just done dinner," says he; and he lights a cigar, sits down with his legs crossed, and winks at me.

I tried at first to take the measure of him in a wheedling, confidential way; but it was no good. I asked him in a facetious, smiling manner, how he had got hold of the letter. He only told me in answer that he had been in the confidential employment of the writer of it, and that he had always been famous since infancy for a sharp eye to his own interests. I paid him some compliments; but he was not to be flattered. I tried to make him lose his temper; but he kept it in spite of me. It ended in his driving me to my last resource—I made an attempt to frighten him.

"Before we say a word about the money," I began, "let me put a case, Mr. Davager. The pull you have on Mr. Francis Gatcliffe is, that you can hinder his marriage on Wednesday. Now, suppose I have got a magistrate's warrant to apprehend you in my pocket? Suppose I have a constable to execute it in the next room? Suppose I bring you up to-morrow—the day before the marriage—charge you only generally with an attempt to extort money, and apply for a day's remand to complete the case? Suppose, as a suspicious stranger, you can't get bail in this town? Suppose—"

"Stop a bit," says Mr. Davager. "Suppose I should not be the greenest fool that ever stood in shoes? Suppose I should not carry the letter about me? Suppose I should have given a certain envelope to a certain friend of mine in a certain place in this town? Suppose the letter should be inside that envelope, directed to old Gatcliffe, side by side with a copy of the letter, directed to the editor of the local paper? Suppose my friend should be instructed to open the envelope, and take the letters to their right addresses, if I don't appear to claim them from him this evening? In short, my dear Sir, suppose you were born yesterday, and suppose I wasn't?" says Mr. Davager, and winks at me again.

He didn't take me by surprise, for I never expected that he had the letter about him. I made a pretense of being very much taken aback, and of being quite ready to give in. We settled our business about delivering the letter and handing over the money, in no time. I was to draw out a document, which he was to sign. He knew the document was stuff and nonsense just as well as I did; and told me I was only proposing it to swell my client's bill. Sharp as he was, he was wrong there. The document was not to be drawn out to gain money from Mr. Frank, but to gain time from Mr. Davager. It served me as an excuse to put off the payment of the five hundred pounds till three o'clock on the Tuesday afternoon. The Tuesday morning Mr. Davager said he should devote to his amusement, and asked me what sights were to be seen in the neighborhood of the town. When I had told him, he pitched his toothpick into my grate—yawned—and went out.

I rang the bell once; waited till he had passed the window; and then looked after Tom. There was my jewel of a boy on the opposite side of the street, just setting his top going in the most playful manner possible. Mr. Davager walked away up the street toward the market-place. Tom whipped his top up the street toward the market-place too.

In a quarter of an hour he came back, with all his evidence collected in a beautifully clear and compact state. Mr. Davager had walked to a public-house, just outside the town, in a lane leading to the high road. On a bench outside the public-house there sat a man smoking. He said, "All right?" and gave a letter to Mr. Davager, who answered, "All right," and walked back to the inn. In the hall he ordered hot rum and water, cigars, slippers, and a fire to be lit in his room. After that, he went up-stairs, and Tom came away.

I now saw my road clear before me—not very far on, but still clear. I had housed the letter, in all probability for that night, at the Gatcliffe Arms. After tipping Tom, I gave him directions to play about the door of the inn, and refresh himself, when he was tired, at the tart-shop opposite—eating as much as he pleased, on the understanding that he crammed all the time with his eye on the window. If Mr. Davager went out, or Mr. Davager's friend called on him, Tom was to let me know. He was also to take a little note from me to the head chamber-maid—an old friend of mine—asking her to step over to my office, on a private matter of business, as soon as her work was done for that night. After settling these little matters, having half an hour to spare, I turned to and did myself a bloater at the office-fire, and had a drop of gin and water, hot, and felt comparatively happy.

When the head chamber-maid came, it turned out, as good luck would have it, that Mr. Davager had offended her. I no sooner mentioned him than she flew into a passion; and when I added, by way of clinching the matter, that I was retained to defend the interests of a very beautiful and deserving young lady (name not referred to, of course), against the most cruel underhand treachery on the part of Mr. Davager, the head chamber-maid was ready to go any lengths that she could safely to serve my cause. In few words, I discovered that Boots was to call Mr. Davager at eight the next morning, and was to take his clothes down-stairs to brush as usual. If Mr. D. had not emptied his own pockets overnight, we arranged that Boots was to forget to empty them for him, and was to bring the clothes down-stairs just as he found them. If Mr. D.'s pockets were emptied, then, of course, it would be necessary to transfer the searching process to Mr. D.'s room. Under any circumstances, I was certain of the head chamber-maid; and under any circumstances also, the head chamber-maid was certain of Boots.

I waited till Tom came home, looking very puffy and bilious about the face; but as to his intellects, if any thing, rather sharper than ever. His report was uncommonly short and pleasant. The inn was shutting up; Mr. Davager was going to bed in rather a drunken condition; Mr. Davager's friend had never appeared. I sent Tom (properly instructed about keeping our man in view all the next morning) to his shake-down behind the office desk, where I heard him hiccuping half the night, as boys will, when over excited and too full of tarts.

At half past seven next morning, I slipped quietly into Boots's pantry. Down came the clothes. No pockets in trousers. Waistcoat pockets empty. Coat pockets with something in them. First, handkerchief; secondly, bunch of keys; thirdly, cigar-case; fourthly, pocketbook. Of course I wasn't such a fool as to expect to find the letter there; but I opened the pocket-book with a certain curiosity, notwithstanding.

Nothing in the two pockets of the book but some old advertisements cut out of newspapers, a lock of hair tied round with a dirty bit of ribbon, a circular letter about a loan society, and some copies of verses not likely to suit any company that was not of an extremely wicked description. On the leaves of the pocket-book, people's addresses scrawled in pencil, and bets jotted down in red ink. On one leaf, by itself, this queer inscription: "MEM. 5 ALONG. 4 ACROSS." I understood every thing but those words and figures; so of course I copied them out into my own book. Then I waited in the pantry till Boots had brushed the clothes and had taken them up-stairs. His report, when he came down was, that Mr. D. had asked if it was a fine morning. Being told that it was, he had ordered breakfast at nine, and a saddle-horse to be at the door at ten, to take him to Grimwith Abbey—one of the sights in our neighborhood which I had told him of the evening before.

"I'll be here, coming in by the back way at half past ten," says I to the head chamber-maid. "To take the responsibility of making Mr. Davager's bed off your hands for this morning only. I want to hire Sam for the morning. Put it down in the order-book that he's to be brought round to my office at ten."

Sam was a pony, and I'd made up my mind that it would be beneficial to Tom's health, after the tarts, if he took a constitutional airing on a nice hard saddle in the direction of Grimwith Abbey.

"Any thing else," says the head chamber-maid.

"Only one more favor," says I. "Would my boy Tom be very much in the way if he came, from now till ten, to help with the boots and shoes, and stood at his work close by this window which looks out on the staircase?"

"Not a bit," says the head chamber-maid.

"Thank you," says I; and stepped back to my office directly.

When I had sent Tom off to help with the boots and shoes, I reviewed the whole case exactly as it stood at that time. There were three things Mr. Davager might do with the letter. He might give it to his friend again before ten—in which case, Tom would most likely see the said friend on the stairs. He might take it to his friend, or to some other friend, after ten—in which case, Tom was ready to follow him on Sam the pony. And, lastly, he might leave it hidden somewhere in his room at the inn—in which case, I was all ready for him with a search-warrant of my own granting, under favor always of my friend the head chamber-maid. So far I had my business arrangements all gathered up nice and compact in my own hands. Only two things bothered me: the terrible shortness of the time at my disposal, in case I failed in my first experiments for getting hold of the letter, and that queer inscription which I had copied out of the pocket-book.

"MEM. 5 ALONG. 4 ACROSS." It was the measurement, most likely, of something, and he was afraid of forgetting it; therefore, it was something important. Query—something about himself? Say "5" (inches) "along"—he doesn't wear a wig. Say "5" (feet) "along"—it can't be coat, waistcoat, trowsers, or under-clothing. Say "5" (yards) "along"—it can't be any thing about himself, unless he wears round his body the rope that he's sure to be hanged with one of these days. Then it is not something about himself. What do I know of that is important to him besides? I know of nothing but the letter. Can the memorandum be connected with that? Say, yes. What do "5 along" and "4 across" mean, then? The measurement of something he carries about with him?—or the measurement of something in his room? I could get pretty satisfactorily to myself as far as that; but I could get no further.

Tom came back to the office, and reported him mounted for his ride. His friend had never appeared. I sent the boy off, with his proper instructions, on Sam's back—wrote an encouraging letter to Mr. Frank to keep him quiet—then slipped into the inn by the back way a little before half past ten. The head chamber-maid gave me a signal when the landing was clear. I got into his room without a soul but her seeing me, and locked the door immediately. The case was, to a certain extent, simplified now. Either Mr. Davager had ridden out with the letter about him, or he had left it in some safe hiding-place in his room. I suspected it to be in his room, for a reason that will a little astonish you—his trunk, his dressing-case, and all the drawers and cupboards were left open. I knew my customer, and I thought this extraordinary carelessness on his part rather suspicious.

Mr. Davager had taken one of the best bedrooms at the Gatcliffe Arms. Floor carpeted all over, walls beautifully papered, four-poster, and general furniture first-rate. I searched, to begin with, on the usual plan, examining every thing in every possible way, and taking more than an hour about it. No discovery. Then I pulled out a carpenter's rule which I had brought with me. Was there any thing in the room which—either in inches, feet, or yards—answered to "5 along" and "4 across?" Nothing. I put the rule back in my pocket—measurement was no good, evidently. Was there any thing in the room that would count up to 5 one way and 4 another, seeing that nothing would measure up to it? I had got obstinately persuaded by this time that the letter must be in the room—principally because of the trouble I had had in looking after it. And persuading myself of that, I took it into my head next, just as obstinately, that "5 along" and "4 across" must be the right clew to find the letter by—principally because I hadn't left myself, after all my searching and thinking, even so much as the vestige of another guide to go by. "5 along"—where could I count five along the room, in any part of it?

Not on the paper. The pattern there was pillars of trellis-work and flowers, inclosing a plain green ground—only four pillars along the wall and only two across. The furniture? There were not five chairs, or five separate pieces of any furniture in the room altogether. The fringes that hung from the cornice of the bed? Plenty of them, at any rate! Up I jumped on the counterpane, with my penknife in my hand. Every way that "5 along" and "4 across" could be reckoned on those unlucky fringes, I reckoned on them—probed with my penknife—scratched with my nails—crunched with my fingers. No use; not a sign of a letter; and the time was getting on—oh, Lord! how the time did get on in Mr. Davager's room that morning.

I jumped down from the bed, so desperate at my ill-luck that I hardly cared whether any body heard me or not. Quite a little cloud of dust rose at my feet as they thumped on the carpet. "Hallo!" thought I; "my friend the head chamber-maid takes it easy here. Nice state for a carpet to be in, in one of the best bedrooms at the Gatcliffe Arms." Carpet! I had been jumping up on the bed, and staring up at the walls, but I had never so much as given a glance down at the carpet. Think of me pretending to be a lawyer, and not knowing how to look low enough!

The carpet! It had been a stout article in its time; had evidently begun in a drawing-room, then descended to a coffee-room, then gone up-stairs altogether to a bedroom. The ground was brown, and the pattern was bunches of leaves and roses speckled over the ground at regular distances. I reckoned up the bunches. Ten along the room—eight across it. When I had stepped out five one way and four the other, and was down on my knees on the centre bunch, as true as I sit on this bench, I could hear my own heart beating so loud that it quite frightened me.

I looked narrowly all over the bunch, and I felt all over it with the ends of my fingers; and nothing came of that. Then I scraped it over slowly and gently with my nails. My second finger-nail stuck a little at one place. I parted the pile of the carpet over that place, and saw a thin slit, which had been hidden by the pile being smoothed over it—a slit about half an inch long, with a little end of brown thread, exactly the color of the carpet-ground, sticking out about a quarter of an inch from the middle of it. Just as I laid hold of the thread gently, I heard a footstep outside the door.

It was only the head chamber-maid. "Haven't you done yet?" she whispers.

"Give me two minutes," says I; "and don't let any body come near the door—whatever you do, don't let any body startle me again by coming near the door."

I took a little pull at the thread, and heard something rustle. I took a longer pull, and out came a piece of paper, rolled up tight like those candle-lighters that the ladies make. I unrolled it—and, by George! there was the letter!

The original letter!—I knew it by the color of the ink. The letter that was worth five hundred pounds to me! It was all I could do to keep myself at first from throwing my hat into the air and hooraying like mad. I had to take a chair and sit quiet in it for a minute or two, before I could cool myself down to my proper business level. I knew that I was safely down again when I found myself pondering how to let Mr. Davager know that he had been done by the innocent country attorney after all.

It was not long before a nice little irritating plan occurred to me. I tore a blank leaf out of my pocket-book, wrote on it with my pencil, "Change for a five hundred pound note," folded up the paper, tied the thread to it, poked it back into the hiding-place, smoothed over the pile of the carpet, and, as every reader guesses before I can tell them, bolted off to Mr. Frank. He, in his turn, bolted off to show the letter to the young lady, who first certified to its genuineness, then dropped it into the fire, and then took the initiative for the first time since her marriage engagement, by flinging her arms round his neck, kissing him with all her might, and going into hysterics in his arms. So, at least, Mr. Frank told me; but that's not evidence. It is evidence, however, that I saw them married with my own eyes on the Wednesday; and that while they went off in a carriage and four to spend the honeymoon, I went off on my own legs to open a credit at the Town and County Bank with a five hundred pound note in my pocket.

As to Mr. Davager, I can tell you nothing about him, except what is derived from hearsay evidence, which is always unsatisfactory evidence, even in a lawyer's mouth.

My boy Tom, although twice kicked off by Sam the pony, never lost hold of the bridle, and kept his man in sight from first to last. He had nothing particular to report, except that on the way out to the Abbey, Mr. Davager had stopped at the public-house, had spoken a word or two to his friend of the night before, and had handed him what looked like a bit of paper. This was no doubt a clew to the thread that held the letter, to be used in case of accidents. In every other respect Mr. D. had ridden out and ridden in like an ordinary sight-seer. Tom reported him to me as having dismounted at the hotel about two. At half-past I locked my office-door, nailed a card under the knocker, with "not at home till to-morrow" written on it, and retired to a friend's house, a mile or so out of the town, for the rest of the day.

Mr. Davager left the Gatcliffe Arms that night with his best clothes on his back, and with all the valuable contents of his dressing-case in his pockets. I am not in a condition to state whether he ever went through the form of asking for his bill or not; but I can positively testify that he never paid it, and that the effects left in his bedroom did not pay it either.

A SIMPLE STORY OF TO-DAY.

THESE is little romance in this iron-bound, gold-seeking age. We are becoming so arduous in the struggle for life, that we have no time for softer emotions. True, people love, court, and marry. They are as inconstant in these affairs, too, as ever, but somehow broken hearts are far more rare than formerly, or, at any rate, if they break, they cement again with such wonderful facility, that even the owners scarce know where the pieces have been united. Often there is such a superstructure of selfishness and worldliness encrusted over the ruptured organs, that they become almost as good as new. Perhaps it is good that it should be so; not that selfishness should be advanced or praised, but it is good that we should become a more vigorously-minded people, that we can shake off sentimental distresses, and not pine and wear ourselves to death, for that which so often turns out to be unworthy the sacrifice. It is more especially conducive to the interests of women, first, that they should not suffer their feelings to be enslaved by mere fancies, nor that, if they find themselves deceived in the worthiness or character of the lovers they have accepted, they should give up the energies of all their future lives to a hopeless, purposeless grief. Still here and there exist some natures of so deep, so exquisite a tenderness, that when they attach themselves to kindred spirits, they can not—if accident or circumstance separate them from the object of their existence—view life again hopefully. Rare, indeed, are minds so constituted; yet, occasionally, when fresh, sensitive, and youthful, that portion of our anatomy popularly supposed to sway the emotions of the soul, and to be the centre of intense feeling, receives a shock, which forbids all healing, showing scars and mutilation for the brief period of its rended existence. It is pleasant to witness true affection any where, in every age, every station; but in very youthful persons it has something so akin to the love which angels might entertain toward one another, that, viewed in a spirit of sympathy and kindness, it attracts universal admiration and respect. Pity that First Love is acknowledged to be of so transient a nature, for it is always invested with a purity, which, in after attachments, is so seldom retained. Men and women's fickleness is not always the cause of sudden ruptures of first affection; there is an enemy stern, implacable, relentless, severing the hearts of young lovers, but, nevertheless, not searing the bereaved, like human falsehood, or human treachery and baseness.

A very few months ago, a young man, just out of his apprenticeship, set up in business for himself as a grocer. In spite of his extreme youth, being steady, industrious, civil, and obliging, he thrived in his business, and, though oftener taken for the shopman than the master, gained the favorable opinion of his customers. A young girl, respectably connected, who resided near his shop, frequently came there for goods. She was about seventeen years old, and possessed that youthful girlish simplicity and purity of mind which once so universally characterized that poetical age, but which seems now all but obsolete. Both these young persons, in fact, were unsophisticated and truthful in a high degree; and when, after many interviews and harmless conversations, Robert Fisher felt and knew that love for this young girl filled his breast, and dwelt in his thoughts day and night, in the hours of silence and darkness, as well as amidst the busy glare and toil of the light, he could perceive no reason why he should not endeavor to impress the earnestness and importance of his hopes on the object of his sincere love. By this time, she, too, had become irresistibly attracted by the young tradesman, and when he hinted his attachment, she neither could see any cause or just impediment why they should not love and marry, as others had done before them. They, confiding in each other's tenderness and honesty of purpose, came to regard their acquaintance as a sacred bond, to be unbroken, if they were only true to each other. But there were others who constituted themselves judges in this case, and decided inexorably. Clara Penning lived with her sister and brother-in-law—nay, more, she was dependent on them. One unlucky evening, Clara, being sent to Robert's shop for some household articles, staid so long on her errand that her brother-in-law set out to seek her. He found her in the shop, deep in conversation with young Fisher (a girl's heedlessness, excusable when the circumstances were known); but, attending not to explanations, her choleric relation dragged Clara away with violence and degrading language. Robert told his love manfully, begged earnestly to keep her company, and stated honestly his fair prospects and hopes. It was all of no avail; reviling him in language fit only for a seducer of innocence, Clara was taken home by her incensed brother-in-law. A terrible domestic scene followed, which was only to be quieted by her promise not to converse again with Robert Fisher. Terrified, in delicate health, her nerves easily shaken, she gave at last this promise to speak to him no more without her friend's consent. She kept her word; she was too good to break it, once given. They would not allow her to go again to the shop, neither would they send any one else; but sometimes, when she went that way, she looked mournfully in, and when Robert caught her eye, he would smile all kinds of hope and consolation. They kept up an undying affection for each other; hope was strong in those young hearts, and Robert especially, nothing doubting but that he should ultimately conquer her brother-in-law's hard heart, thought of Clara, dreamed of Clara, lived on the sweet hope of calling Clara his own some happy day.

I have said this young girl was in delicate health; not that her friends gave themselves any uneasiness, for she had a habit of complain-
